

Si

AKRON, O.

LIBRARY
OF THE
UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA.

GIFT OF

E. W. Wilder U.C. '94

Received

June, 1898.

Accession No. 71742 . Class No.

Presented by

E. M. Volder.

W. C. '94

Quesada

Dr. J. J. J.

Dr. J. J. J.

C. Gattermole del.

J. E. Prichard sc.

Pym's farewell to Strafford

HARPER & BROTHERS

THE STATESMEN
OF THE
COMMONWEALTH OF ENGLAND; WITH A TREATISE ON THE POPULAR PROGRESS IN ENGLISH HISTORY.

BY JOHN FORSTER,

OF THE INNER TEMPLE.

EDITED BY J. O. CHOULES.

NEW-YORK:

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS,
No. 82 CLIFF-STREET.

1846.

DA377
F6

717842

Entered, according to Act of Congress, in the year 1816, by

HARPER & BROTHERS,

In the Clerk's Office of the Southern District of New York.

one

TO

THOMAS COLLEY GRATTAN,

HER BRITANNIC MAJESTY'S CONSUL AT BOSTON,

THIS EDITION

OF THE LIVES OF

THE STATESMEN OF THE COMMONWEALTH

Is Dedicated,

WITH SENTIMENTS OF ATTACHMENT AND RESPECT, BY

THE EDITOR.

History triumpheth over Time, which, besides it, nothing but Eternity hath triumphed over; for it carrieth our knowledge over vast and devouring space for many thousands of years, and giveth to our mind such fair and piercing eyes, that we plainly behold living now, as if we had lived then, that great world, MAGNI DEI SAPIENS OPUS. . . . It is not the least debt which we owe unto History, that it hath made us acquainted with our dead ancestors, and out of the depth and darkness of the earth delivered us their memory and fame. Out of History we may gather a policy no less wise than eternal, by the comparison and application of other men's forepast miseries with our own like errors and ill deservings.—WALTER RALEIGH.

P R E F A C E

TO THE AMERICAN EDITION.

AMERICAN citizens can never be indifferent to the history of the struggles for freedom in the land of their fathers; and there is no more appropriate study for our youth than a careful examination of the men and measures of that period which constituted the transition state of England, from the oppressive reigns of the Tudors and the Stuarts, to the Constitutional liberty which it afterward enjoyed. The close sympathy which was felt by our pilgrim ancestors with Eliot, Hampden, Milton, and Vane, gave an origin to our national existence, and planted the institutions of piety and learning on our shores. The Puritans were the conservators of civil and religious freedom, and to the days of the civil war we are indebted for the assertion of those political truths which we now cherish as our dearest inheritance. The glories of the English nation in the seventeenth century are our rightful patrimony, and New-Englanders, when they indulge a justifiable pride in the patriotism and statesmanship of Adams and Webster, may remember with exultation that they are the guardians of the same precious ark once watched over by Sidney, Russel, and their compeers.

The great merit of Mr. Forster's Lives of the Statesmen of the Commonwealth is, that he has afforded a life-like sketch of characters that will continue to appear more extraordinary to those who, by the march of time, are removed farther from the era in which they appeared on the stage of action. I mistake if this volume does not quicken much thought into activity, for it holds up to view the real life—the stirring, glowing, argumentative life of the days of the Protectorate. The thoughtful reader feels that he knows quite as much of the doings in St. Stephens at this period, as he does of the wrangling and personalities in the House of Representatives at Washington; and if it were possible for old Noll, or Eliot, or Pym to walk our globe again, he would not fail to recognise them. A perusal of this biography compels to the reflection, that faith in eternal verities is as important to nations as to individuals. The strong, earnest faith of England made her revolution at the death of Charles what it was, a blessing, then and forever, while the skepticism of France rendered the revolution at the death of Louis a living curse, a widespread damnation. The large sale of this work in America, notwithstanding the London edition in five volumes is so costly, affords gratifying evidence that the public mind is called out to the investigation of this period of time, and no part of English history is more deserving the profound attention of the " Sons of sires who baffled Crown'd and mitred tyranny," than the days of Charles I., and the devout, God-fearing, and strong-hearted Oliver Cromwell.

A careful revisal has been given to the work, notes have been added, but no alteration has been made in the text of the author.

JOHN. OVERTON. CHOULES.

June, 1846.

J. Cotton

THE STATESMEN OF THE COMMONWEALTH OF ENGLAND.

A DESIRE having been expressed that this portion of a series of British statesmen, originally published in the "Cabinet Cyclopædia," should be given to the world in a distinct form, that desire is here complied with. I seize, at the same time, the occasion it affords me of soliciting the reader's attention, on the threshold of the work, to some considerations of historical interest that may give greater completeness to its design. It is scarcely possible—without some such general view as history will rarely give of the social, political, and religious influences which, in their gradual action after the Norman Conquest, built up what we call the Constitution of the state—to understand the secret of the origin and power of that remarkable race of men by whom, on the awful stage of the old English Revolution, events of such influence to succeeding ages were created and controlled.

Any notice of the Saxon period would be foreign to this purpose, save in so far as the revival of the national spirit, after the Norman invasion, brought back the more sturdy features of our old national character with the better portions of free Saxon usage. As little needful is it to describe from its earlier beginnings the subversion of the feudal system, which gradually declined as towns arose, as municipal communities were formed, as capital was accumulated, and the arts cultivated with success. It is obvious that, with the enrichment of a mercantile or manufacturing class, the power of an aristocracy must decrease; and our country formed no exception to the rule. It will be more important to explain briefly to the reader the secret of that attachment to monarchy, which, without question, continued to prevail throughout the nation at the beginning of the struggle for liberty described in this volume, and a knowledge of which, while it reveals the less obvious difficulties that beset the struggle, and may refine and exalt our perceptions of the policy and statesmanship of its leaders, marks also, with singular precision, the commencement of Popular Progress in the Norman period of our history.

From no principle of passive obedience, but out of the simple instinct of self-preservation, that attachment arose. It is clearly indicated, in its relations both to king and people, in one of the proclamations of Henry the Third, first discovered and partly quoted by Sir Robert Cotton. From this we perceive that it was not till majesty had been driven to extremities by the barons that it bethought itself of the expediency of securing the affections of the people; and we observe farther, that the humble prostration of the commons before the feet of sovereignty had at once its motives and its reward in the assurance of a full and sufficient protection against the great lords. A common enemy had, in fact, made common cause between the highest and lowest states of the realm, and the dormant political rights of the people were suddenly roused into action on behalf of the endangered security at once of people and of king.

Gradual advances had been made in law and jurisprudence during the reign of the first in the great line of the Plantagenets, the wise and powerful administration of Henry the Second; the general adoption of juries had given justice to the commonalty, and the institution of circuits had carried it to each man's door. The Crusades, too, had served to reawaken the failing spirits of men, had loosened more and more the bondage of the feudal laws, and had opened to the new and enterprising race then peopling our English towns various and most profitable sources of commerce with other lands. Nor had a silently growing but very potent influence of a higher nature passed unheeded. The gay resources of religious chivalry implied nobler and more generous offices than the mere relaxation of crusading knights, or conciliation of their lady-loves. They scattered the seeds of a national literature, which, whether tracked through the wandering paths of Troubadour or Dominican, sprang up afterward, during the whole period of the thirteenth century, in silent but most significant places. Still had no distinct recognition of the people been heard. The thirteenth century opened, and, as an order of the state, they were still unknown.

But about then it was, and not till then, that, happily in one sense, if unsuccessfully in another, monarchy appealed to them in its despair. It was the weak and powerless John who first stretched out his hands to them, in fear of his barons, and implored them to lift up a distinct voice in the arrangement of public affairs. Strange and memorable for all ages were the events that followed. The success of the barons in the struggle was far from a popular success; but it was secretly acted upon by those passing, powerful, and silently expanding influences to which allusion has been made, and which shaped the mere exclusive claims of a powerful faction, as against their feudal lord, into an unconscious but eternal record of general rights, inalienable and imperishable, nor ever afterward to be denied to even the meanest Englishman. Little known to its framers were the mighty secrets included in the great Charter. Little did they suspect that, under words that were intended to limit the relations of feudal power, many of the grandest equitable truths of polity lay concealed, as though afraid to show themselves till a milder and more auspicious day. They denied protection to serfs, and knew not that the swords which gave them that very power of denial had already cut through forever the bonds of English serfdom. They protested against the power of taxation in a prince, while they reserved it in limitation for themselves, ignorant that the formidable principle would bear down the weak exception. They demanded the regular summoning of a great council to control the king, whether in imposition of new laws or administration of old; but they dreamed not that within fifty years the mere tenants of the crown, to whom they limited the commons' portion of that council, would almost insensibly yield to the admission of burgesses and knights by the forms of popular election. Of incalculable importance, for these reasons, is it to consider this great charter justly. A truth has not its fair side and its foul. A principle is not a convertible thing; nor could these iron barons of Merton, all-powerful as they were, claim its operation in the one case, and control it in the other. All was not done when their part was done. It was enough for them to have conceived the prudent thought that, when once the rust of the Norman Conquest had been worn out of the souls of men, the various and discordant elements of England could never be moulded into any safe political form without a distinct admission, however limited, of political privileges to every rank, and a nominal concession, however unfairly hampered, of civil rights of liberty and property to every class. The selfishness in which that thought began has not availed to check the reverence now fairly due to it. It was for future time to purge the selfishness and leave the greatness. It was for a posterity that has heaped upon these men praise they would have trampled on as insolence to demonstrate the inherent force and inexhaustible power of the simple spirit of resistance to irresponsible tyranny, whether lodged in the honest and manly warmth of a peasant's jerkin, or within the harsh and selfish links of a baron's mail. The five centuries that followed the scene at Runnymede were filled with the struggles of freedom, and never, at any new effort, were the provisions of that feudal charter appealed to in vain. Even when silent in themselves, the spirit out of which they were born still gave itself forth irresistibly in accents of warning and terror, of strength and consolation. Whether our thoughts have turned to the terrible death-field of Simon de Montfort; to the gray discrowned head of the second Richard; to the miserable fate of the first Charles; to the stakes of Ridley and Cranmer, or the as sublime sufferings of More; to the prisons of Eliot or of Marten; to the scaffold of Strafford or of Vane; to the glorious fall of Hampden, or the hopeless and irretrievable ascent of Cromwell; whether our hopes for English liberty beat high with the eloquence of Pym, or have been composed to a more sober assurance beneath the wigs of Somers, of Danby, or of Halifax, we have yet borne witness, at every new emotion, to the presence of that spirit of MAGNA CHARTA.

Ignorant of the extent of good which had been thus achieved for them, and still, by the influences I have named, controlling the power of the barons by dint of their superior attachment to the monarchy, the English people found themselves now, with the passage of each successive reign, more and more distinctly recognised as a power and a resource in the government. They were formally summoned to the legislature by John's successor; many of Henry the Third's writs for their election, directing "the sheriffs to elect and return two knights for each county, two citizens for each city, and two burgesses for every borough in the country," were discovered by Prynne; and in the reigns of the first and second Edwards and their successors, we find them a strong and efficient branch of the state.

That the compact was no slavish one by which the popular rights were thus revived and secured, sufficiently appears in a glance at these succeeding reigns. The sturdiest free Saxon need not have blushed, could he have lived them over. In all affairs of peace and war, in the marriages of princes, in a direct control of the domestic government, and in the formal tenure of the public purse, the commons of England, even thus early, claimed and accomplished the privilege of being consulted. Their existence once recognised, all else followed in its course. Not a reign passed that did not give them a more decisive position. With the help of the wiser princes, in despite of the weaker, THEIR power still grew.

In the reign of the first Edward, when so many great improvements in the laws were effected, that the somewhat too lofty title of the English Justinian has been claimed for that prince, they gave the residents of the various counties in which, at last, the jury system had been finally consolidated, the power, which was afterward lost, of electing their own sheriffs. They also claimed at this period a security for free and uninfluenced elections—sure evidence of a growing importance; and a remarkable statute, which dates in the third year of Edward, runs in these words: "And because elections ought to be free, the king commandeth, upon great forfeiture, that no man, by force of arms, nor by malice, or menacing, shall disturb any to make free election." The power of the purse was a more formidable claim; but, having wrested it in the weak government of this great monarch's successor, they always afterward, or at least with rare exceptions, made money supplies conditional, not only that the specific services for which they were voted might be secured, but that, as the voluntary gift of lords and commons, they should not by any pretence be drawn into forced precedents. In Edward the Second's time, we find them voting as a distinct house, apart from the temporal and spiritual barons. It is curious and significant, too, to mark in this short reign the commencement of the system of government boroughs. Edward the Second's counselors, acting upon a regular plan of strengthening the regal influence, erected no less than twenty-two new boroughs; and then it was that the lower house not only claimed, in a memorable statute, equal legislative power with the other estates of the realm, but declared that power to be a fundamental usage of England. "The matters," they said, "to be established for the estate of the king and of his heirs, and for the estate of the realm and of the people, shall be treated, accorded, and established in Parliament by the king, and by the assent of the prelates, earls, and barons, and the commonalty of the realm, according as hath been before accustomed." Then, too, the great Charter was again confirmed, and with the striking addition of "Forasmuch as many people be aggrieved by the king's ministers against right, in respect of which grievances no one can recover without a common Parliament, we do ordain that the king shall hold a Parliament once in the year, or twice, if need be." Six different statutes in the succeeding reign still more confirmed and enlarged its provisions. But the historical student should pause with pride at the name of Edward the Third.

During the brilliant fifty years' reign of that famous sovereign, seventy Parliaments were summoned, and by one of them, which in this may express the spirit of all, it was insisted that the nomination of the chancellor and other great public officers should be committed to itself; a claim which, though tolerated in effect in modern days, would, if formally advanced among us, be condemned as an invasion of regal prerogative. Then, too, was passed one of the most popular laws conceded by any prince, one of the most advantageous achieved by any people. This was the statute of treasons, which limited the crime, before vague and uncertain, to three principal heads: the conspiring the death of the king, the levying war against him, the adhering to his enemies; and which prohibited the judges, if any other cases should occur, from inflicting the penalty of treason without application to Parliament. Without a struggle, this famous statute was won. For Edward himself, he always conceded freely what weaker sovereigns would have perilled life to hold. He was too wise to mistake in any case a shadow for a substance, and too powerful to fear concessions that had a tendency, without danger to the throne, to conciliate the other authorities of the realm. Peace, therefore, had her victories for him not less renowned than even war. He could compose or amuse his restless lords by a politic foundation of their order of the Garter, as he would propitiate his discontented commons by a frank redress of their complaint or grievance. No manlier prince, and none more prudent or successful, occupied the English throne. No influence more brilliant or powerful, or having plainer tendencies to popular cultivation, survived to a succeeding age. It was Edward's object always to interest men in himself, but for no apparently selfish reasons; to justify his own ambition by the ambition of a common country; to aggrandize his own glory, but as the summit of the greater glory of the nation; and in this he rarely failed. Even his palaces taught something of elevation to his people. The magnificent structures of Westminster Hall and Windsor rank justly with the intellectual influences that were then diffused, and, as though an era of so much that was great should not pass without a mark to distinguish it among even the greatest of all future time, the poet Chaucer arose to charm and instruct his countrymen, and, by the purification of their native tongue, to complete the national glory. In the thirty-sixth of the third Edward, an act was passed declaring that the language so ennobled should be in future used as the language of legislation.

Every advance in intellect, how slight sover, unerringly marks the advance of a people. There are tens of thousands of listeners for every new thought, all sure to find it in their own good time, no matter where it was first dropped, or in what obscure corner lodged. Wicliff lived in this reign. Michael Scot and Duns Scotus had preceded him; and Friar Bacon had proclaimed the advent of the true philosophy, as the morning star the day.

An imbecile prince succeeded, but the strong or the weak would have been alike powerless in an age upon which such mighty agencies as those of the sway of Edward had, in so direct a shape, descended. The beginning and the close of that reign were, therefore, not unworthy of all that had preceded it. The one was marked by a wide revolt of the serf class, and the other by the formal deposition of a rightful king. This last event established on an irremovable base the political importance of the English people. A king was formally arraigned, with at least the nominal co-operation of the constituted authorities of his empire, for treason to the trust reposed in him; was convicted, and was punished. The terms of "divine right," or indefeasible power," were, from that instant, struck out for ever from the dictionary of the state. "I confess," said that humbled prince, to the men who had sternly and calmly laid down their allegiance, "I recognise, and, from certain knowledge conscientiously declare, that I consider myself to have been, and to be, insufficient for the government of this kingdom, and for my notorious demerits not undeserving of deposition." Nor was the voluntary abdication held sufficient. The houses of lords and commons, in solemn conclave in the hall at Westminster, made Richard the Second's renunciation of his crown their own compulsory act, and, amid the enthusiastic shouts of thousands of the common people who had there assembled, Henry of Lancaster was conducted to the vacant throne.

The popular power was, perhaps, seen and felt in more visible action on that momentous occasion than at any preceding period, even among the Saxons. It was only some years before that the exclusive pretensions of the barons had been invaded by admission of regal writs of summons into their hereditary house; and here they were now themselves inducing a new sovereign to the seat of supreme power, with less guarantee that he would found his future pretensions on the fidelity of their swords, than that he would rest it rather on even those commonest shouts of the people. From such shouts, in which the old Saxon liberty again seemed pealing through the air, there no doubt fell more safety on the ear of even the haughty Bolingbroke, than from the clanking armour of the barons who led him to Richard's chair. May we not even realize the thought which is left us by the poet whose genius takes rank with history, and suppose the new sovereign of the house of Lancaster, for years before this crowning day, an earnest and suppliant candidate for the popular shouts that now hailed, at last, the downfall of the family of York?

"Ourself and Bushy, Bagot here, and Green,
Observed his courtship to the common people
How he did seem to dive into their hearts,
With humble and familiar courtesy;
What reverence he did throw away on slaves, wooing poor craftsmen with the craft of smiles,
And patient underbearing of his fortune,
As 'twere to banish their affects with him.
Off goes his bonnet to an oyster wench;
A brace of draymen bid . . . God speed him well .
And had the tribute of his supple knee,
With . . . 'Thanks, my countrymen! my loving friends!'
As were our England in reversion his,
And he our subject's next degree in hope."

The first great object of these crafty courtesies attained, they did not cease as soon. Ever watchful, and wary as he was bold, the policy of the aspiring Bolingbroke continued the policy of the English king. The parliamentary authority which had given him power, the popular sympathies which had confirmed his title, were strengthened and promoted by every possible resource during fourteen years of great though still disputed rule. It was natural, in the circumstances of such a reign, that the question of succession should assume paramount importance, but the most enthusiastic student of popular progress is scarcely prepared for the elevated as well as resolute character of the measures it calmly originated.

Never, at any period of the reign, was it denied that the right of Parliament to alter the succession was the solid and single claim of the house of Lancaster. Henry's first house of commons asserted that great principle by formally taking on itself to recognise his son as Prince of Wales and heir-apparent to the throne. It was revived and confirmed in the year 1404, when the sovereign, all-powerful save in this, solicited and obtained from the Parliament a permission that the right of succession to the crown should be vested in the prince's brothers, if he himself should die without heirs. In 1406, another and a grander step was taken, by which the most essential principle of popular right was reached and consummated. The commons themselves in that year carried up a petition to Henry, limiting the succession expressly to his sons and their heirs male, and obtained its formal enactment. This was, in effect, a precedent for the settlement of the crown in after years on the house of Hanover.

Other precedents, scarcely less illustrious, date from this reign. In the first session of Henry the Fourth, a law was passed that no judge should be released from the penalty affixed to the sanction of an iniquitous measure, by pleading the orders of the king, or even the danger of his own life from the sovereign's menaces. In the second year of the reign, that practice, which was afterward one of the strongest bulwarks of popular privilege, was formally insisted on as a right, and a necessary supply was proposed to be withheld from the prince until he had answered a petition of the subject. Three years after this, the king was desired to remove from his household four officers, one of them even his own confessor, who had given offence to the commons; and Henry, that he might gratify the wishes of his faithful subjects, complied with the request, though he told them that he knew of no offence which the persons complained of had committed. In the sixth year of the same reign, while they voted the king supplies, they appointed treasurers of their own, whom they instructed to see the money disbursed for the purposes intended, and required to deliver in regular accounts to the house. In that year, also, new laws to regulate parliamentary elections attested the rapidly-increasing strength of the commons. An important statute—on “the grievous complaints of the commons against undue elections for shires from the partiality of sheriffs,” and directing “that the next county court, after writs for Parliament are delivered, proclamation shall be made of the day and place of the Parliament, and that all they that be there present, as well suiters duly summoned as others, shall proceed to the election freely and indifferently, notwithstanding any request or command to the contrary”—bears date in the year 1406.

That was the ever-memorable year, too, in which the House of Commons, having been asked to grant supplies, startled the king with a plain proposal that he should seize all the temporalities of the Church, and employ them as a perpetual fund to serve the exigencies of the state. It is needless to describe what the Church was then, or the extent to which the enormous and ill-gotten wealth of the regular clergy had at last attained. Its accumulation had been somewhat checked by statutes of mortmain under the first and third Edwards, but these were again eluded by licenses of alienation; and the hand of a churchman, according to the competent evidence of Bishop Burnet, is particularly famous for the habit of never once letting go what it has once firmly grasped. Equally objectionable with the extent of this wealth was its unequal apportionment. While such abbots as those of Reading, or Glastonbury, or Battle lived with the riotous pomp of princes, and passed their days in feasting, thousands of monks were labouring with the lowest poverty, and toiling after the loftiest learning. The project of the commons included, therefore, a general and reasonable endowment of all the clergy to precede any state appropriation of the enormous surplus of ecclesiastical revenues. The argument they urged for it, and returned to again and again with a resolute energy, was, that the exorbitant riches, no less than the too scanty earnings of churchmen, could tend only to disqualify them for performing the ministerial functions with proper zeal and attention; and though they failed in their immediate purpose, and had a heretic or two burned in their faces by way of archiepiscopal revenge, and were dubbed by the higher clergy, in scorn, a lack-learning Parliament, they might have felt that, by the very agitation of such a question, the seeds were sown of no partial gain for posterity. The feeling it left behind shows the deep impression it had made, and in a manner fore-shadows all that followed. “The fat abbots swet,” says Halle, “the proude priors frowned, the poor friers cursed, the sely nonnes wept, and al together wer nothing pleased nor yet content.”

It was in the eighth year of this same great reign, however, that the most striking advance was made towards the freedom of a thoroughly and decisively limited monarchy. Thirty very important articles were then proposed and conceded for the regulation of the king's household and government, and the momentous principle of ministerial responsibility was distinctly set forth in them. Henry was required, and he consented, to govern the realm by the advice of a permanent council; and this council was, at the same time, obliged, with all the judges and all the officers of the royal household, to take a solemn oath in Parliament to observe and defend the amended institutions. This reformation has been termed, on authority well entitled to respect, a noble fabric of constitutional liberty, hardly inferior to the petition of right.

It is vain to say that many of these vast advantages were, in later years, obscured or disregarded. To show that they were once achieved, and that the principle involved in them was solemnly recognised and acted on, is to demonstrate all. There are truths in politics as in morals which, when once revealed to the light, no after darkness suffices to obscure. Seeming dead, they yet speak from what men think to be their graves. He who outrages or denies them does so at his own peril; no common practice will justify him, no precedent absolve him. A king who continued strong enough to rule by the strict right of the Norman Conquest, fairly measured his reign and its immunities by the length and temper of his sword; but he who surrendered that right to either prayers or threatenings, and flung back to his people any portion of the freedom which had been theirs before, which was theirs still, and which no act of theirs could waste or alienate, barred himself and his descendants forever from the resumption of a conqueror's claims. The struggle between two such principles as tyranny and freedom, once set on foot, admits no compromise. A generation of men who have insisted upon certain rights for themselves, cannot, by subsequent indolence or indifference, be said to have bargained away those rights from a succeeding generation; nor, when the theft of a people's liberties has been confessed by one restoration of them to the just possessors, can any prince, into whose violent keeping they may again have fallen, claim exemption from the penalties of political crime. The thief and the receiver are classed together by our laws.

When Henry the Fifth took up the crown from off his father's deathbed, he said that, as the sword had won it, the sword should keep it still. But in that crown was now implied the popular sanction, and this the generous and impetuous prince well knew the value of preserving. It was not the crown of William the Norman, and the sword that was to keep it did not turn itself against English breasts. By the splendour of foreign conquests, Henry sought to dazzle or propitiate such doubts as were still thought by some to lurk about his title; but, with the vast majority of his people, none knew better than he that his best security was a fair administration of the laws, equitable concessions to his Parliament, and protection to the poor from the oppression of those above them. As little was he wanting in these, therefore, as in the brilliancy of success in battle, and the year which witnessed the victory of Agincourt completed also, and finally secured, the legislative rights of the English House of Commons.

It had been found that the privilege left by the commons to the judges, to clothe in the formal terms of legal language, at the close of each session, the various bills and petitions passed in its course, had opened many opportunities to fraud on the part of the lawyers. The usage had originally risen from the desire of the house, in those days of imperfect education, to achieve, as far as possible, brevity and precision in the language of their statutes. In very many cases, however, the judges were discovered to have deliberately arrested the purpose of the commons to their own ends or those of the sovereign, and to have substituted for popular protection a popular snare. Therefore it was that an act was now introduced and passed, providing that "from this time forward, by complaint of the commons asking remedy for any mischief, there be no law made thereupon which should change the meaning by addition or by diminution, or by any manner of term or terms." A formal and solemn grant, in the name of the king, was at the same time appended to it, stating that from thenceforth nothing "be enacted to be petitions of his commons that be contrary to their asking, whereby they should be bound without their assent." The effect was to secure to the house an unrestricted power over everything that belonged to the sacred trust of legislation.

What followed was the necessary incident to such a power. Authority, without the means for its sharp and decisive enforcement, is the most dangerous weakness known to a state. The commons claimed, therefore, in the name and for the protection of the people, certain exclusive rights and exemptions needful to the fearless discharge of the popular trust, to last as long as that trust lasted, and to cease when it was laid down. Among other things, they demanded personal release from such judicial proceedings as might be in danger of impeding parliamentary functions. They asserted their right to an absolute despotism concerning everything that passed within their own walls. In especial, they solemnly exacted the exclusive jurisdiction of offences, whether committed by their own members or by others, which peculiarly and manifestly tended to impair the powers they held in trust as deputed from the people, and which were, in fact, the people's own, or threatened in any way to obstruct the public duties they were by them called on to discharge. In a word, they achieved what was thenceforward known by the formidable name of PRIVILEGE OF PARLIAMENT—the shield and buckler under whose protection all the battles of liberty were fought in after ages, and by whose assistance they were mainly won. An attempt to drag the adjudication of this privilege into the courts of law followed; when, in the famous case of Thorpe the speaker, the judges declared "that they would not determine the privilege of the high court of Parliament, of which the knowledge belongeth to the lords of Parliament, and not the justices." It may be safely predicted, that when this privilege is in the smallest degree forfeited or abandoned, we have lost the best security of true political freedom. When once the deputed privileges of the people are assailed successfully, the absolute rights of the people are safe no longer. That Parliaments without parliamentary liberties are but a fair and plausible way into bondage, was the saying of one who passed his life in the illustration and enforcement of this and every other truth which could affect the happiness of the English people. First established in practice, as I have thus described it, by this Parliament of Henry the Fifth—and a more enduring honour to that reign than any of Henry's warlike triumphs—it served to herald the way for a yet more tremendous concession to the popular element in the state. It was followed, not many years afterward, by the awful right of IMPEACHMENT.

The reign of Henry the Sixth began in doubt and disaster, as it continued and closed in bloodshed; yet it began, too, in a formidable assertion of the independent power of Parliament; and one of its latest statutes bore testimony to the still increasing interest and importance of popular representation.

The first thing done after the death of the hero of Agincourt was an alteration of that form of government, during the minority of the young king, which had been settled by Henry's will. Without paying any regard to the latter, the lords and commons at once assumed a power of giving a new arrangement to the whole administration. They would not suffer even the name of regent, as implying too much dignity in the state, apart from the individual claims of a king. The title of protector or guardian was supposed to express a more limited authority, and this they substituted. In order, also, to limit the protectoral power still farther, they named a council, without whose advice and approbation no measure of importance was ever to be determined. Nor less striking or decisive than these are what I have referred to as the later evidences of parliamentary power afforded even by this disastrous reign. They lie in the form and preamble of a statute "for the due election of members of Parliament in counties." I have noted the rapid precipitation of the fall of the feudal system, and of its great distinctions of tenure, after the concession of Magna Charta. I have described that enactment of Henry the Fourth (one of the first advantages which accrued to the people from the doubtful title of the house of Lancaster) by which clandestine elections were restrained, and the power given to every freeholder present at the place of election—for that seems to be the true construction of the words used, and certainly not any implication of a right of universal suffrage—to give their votes, whether summoned or not, freely and indifferently. The statute now passed, while professing to limit this right to a certain extent of freehold, offers a priceless proof, in the very terms of its preamble, of how much the commonest orders of the English people had in late years risen; in all that gives the sense of personal power, the knowledge of political privileges, the gradual means to estimate them, and, in the end, the strength to win them.

This is that famous preamble: "Whereas the election of knights has of late, in many counties of England, been made by outrageous and excessive numbers of people, many of them of small substance and value [an expression confirmatory of the above construction of Henry the Fourth's statute], yet pretending to a right equal to the best knights and esquires, whereby manslaughters, riots, batteries, and divisions among the gentlemen and other people of the same counties shall very likely rise and be, unless due remedy be provided in this behalf." Even our greatest anti-popular historian may here feel impelled to exclaim, What an important matter the election of a member of Parliament was now become! The "remedy provided" was a limitation of the right of suffrage, exclusively settled by the act on such as possessed forty shillings a year in land free from all burden within the county; and it was a remedy which happily left untouched the very seat and core of the disease. When a people have once been thoroughly recognised, it is a worse than vain attempt to seek to thrust them back into obscurity.

Before describing other passages in this reign, which, in the very centre of all its horrors, its confusions, its desolating streams of blood in field or on scaffold, is to be noted here for its unacknowledged services to civilization and humanity, it will be well to transcribe, from the works of Sir John Fortescue, certain brief passages which, in effect, describe the nature of the settled political advantages achieved before Henry the Sixth's accession. Fortescue was chief justice for many years in this prince's reign; became his chancellor; and, having been driven by the civil wars into France, with his royal master's wife and son, employed his leisure in the composition of learned works, which rendered him, to succeeding times, a great Constitutional authority. The chief object of the principal of these was to contrast the political Constitution of England with that of France, and to impress upon the mind of the young prince of the house of Lancaster the nature of his legal tenure as a political magistrate in precepts which, it is right to add, Fortescue was not called upon to change when he afterward entered the service of a prince of the house of York. They were precepts recognised by both parties in the nation. This was the "De Laudibus Legum Angliæ," the republication of which, some years ago, with the learned notes of Mr. Amos—now chief commissioner in India, and whose name I can never mention without confessing the warmest and most lasting obligations which a pupil can owe to his teacher—conferred an inexpressible benefit on every student of English history. Its results may be briefly stated before the extracts are submitted to the reader, since their testimony to at least the comparative happiness and freedom of all classes of Englishmen under the Plantagenet rule is strong and incontestable. In France, according to this work—and its contents are more than warranted by Philip de Comines—the principle of the civil code, that the will of the monarch is law, prevailed, while in England the people lived under the protection of laws of their own enactment. In England they paid taxes of their own imposing, while in France the people were plundered at the sole discretion of their prince, who at the same time granted the nobility an immunity of taxation, lest he should drive them into rebellion. In England a man, upon any charge of crime, had the benefit of trial by a jury of his peers, while in France confession was extorted by the rack: “a custom which is not to be accounted law, but rather the high road to the devil.” An independent middle class of society also existed in England, while in France there existed only the two great divisions of a noblesse and a wretched peasantry. In England, in short, the people lived in reasonable political security, and in circumstances of social comfort; in France they were in the most debased and most deplorable misery.

“A king of England,” says Fortescue—and he speaks of two hundred years before the sixth Henry, as well as of that prince’s time—“a king of England cannot, at his pleasure, make any alterations in the laws of the land, for the nature of his government is not only regal, but political. Had it been merely regal, he would have a power to make what innovations and alterations he pleased in the laws of the kingdom, impose tallages and other hardships upon the people, whether they would or no, without their consent. . . . But it is much otherwise with a king whose government is political, because he can neither make any alteration or change in the laws of the realm without the consent of the subject, nor burden them against their wills with strange impositions; so that a people governed by such laws as are made by their own consent and approbation enjoy their properties securely, and without the hazard of being deprived of them, either by the king or any other. . . . As the head of the body natural cannot change its nerves or sinews—cannot deny to the several parts their proper energy, their due proportion and aliment of blood, neither can a king, who is the head of the body politic, change the laws thereof, nor take from the people what is theirs by right, against their consent. . . . For he is appointed to protect his subjects in their lives, properties, and laws; for this very end and purpose he has the delegation of power from the people, and he has no just claim to any other power but this. . . . The statutes of England are not enacted by the sole will of the prince, but with the concurrent consent of the whole kingdom, by their representatives in Parliament. And if any bills passed into a law, enacted with so much solemnity and foresight, should happen not to answer the intention of the legislators, they can immediately be amended and repealed, in the whole or in part; that is, with the same consent and in the same manner as they were at first enacted into a law. . . . By the laws of England the truth of any matter cannot appear to a judge but upon the oath of twelve men of the neighbourhood where the fact is supposed to be done. . . . What evidence witnesses give in must be in open court, in the presence and hearing of a jury of twelve men, persons of good character, neighbours where the fact was committed, apprized of the circumstances in question, and well acquainted with the lives and conversations of the witnesses; especially as they be near neighbours, and cannot but know whether they be worthy of credit or not; it cannot be a secret to every one of the jury what is done by or among their neighbours. . . . A king of England does not bear sway over his subjects as a king merely, but in a mixed political capacity; he is obliged by his coronation oath to the observance of the laws, which some of our kings have not been well able to digest, because thereby they are deprived of that free exercise of dominion over their subjects, in that full, extensive manner, as those kings have who preside and govern by an absolute regal power. . . . In England, no one takes up his abode in another man’s house without leave of the owner first had. . . . Neither is it lawful to take away another man’s goods without the consent of the proprietor, or being liable to be called to an account for it. . . . The king cannot despoil the subject without making ample satisfaction for the same; he cannot, by himself or his ministry, lay taxes, subsidies, or any impositions of what kind soever upon the subject; he cannot alter the laws, or make new ones, without the express consent of the whole kingdom in Parliament assembled. . . . The inhabitants of England are not sued at law but before the ordinary judge, where they are treated with mercy and justice, according to the laws of the land; neither are they impleaded in point of property, or arraigned for any capital crime, how heinous soever, but before the king’s judges, and according to the laws of the land. These are the advantages consequent from that political mixed government which obtains in England; and from hence it is plain what the effects of that law are in practice, which some of your ancestors [the treatise is addressed to the chancellor’s pupil, Henry the Sixth’s son], kings of England, have endeavoured to abrogate. . . . That must needs be judged to be an hard and unjust law which tends to increase the servitude, and to lessen the liberty of mankind; for human nature is evermore an advocate for liberty. God Almighty has declared himself the God of liberty; this being the gift of God to man in his creation, the other is introduced into the world by means of his own sin and folly; whence it is that everything in nature is so desirous of liberty, as being a sort of restitution to its primitive state: so that to go about to lessen this is to touch men in the tenderest point. It is upon such considerations as these that the laws of England, in all cases, declare in favour of liberty."

Such is the ancient chancellor's testimony to the truth of the popular progress in England, appealed to triumphantly in after years by Cotton, Coke, and Selden, when they first began to fight with the bloodless weapons of moral and intellectual truth, and under the invincible shield of those laws whose nature it was to "declare in all cases in favour of liberty," the great battle of the people. It is simple, manly, plain, and unaffected by any of those preposterous doubts and mysteries about prerogative which were started in later days. Be it observed, at the same time, that the advantages it so forcibly commemorates did not by any means at once embrace within their sphere all the various classes that were soon after known by the name of the people. Even while Fortescue wrote, a vast body of mere men-at-arms and feudal retainers, of peasants and of vassals, remained to be merged into that recognised class; but it is no less certain that a larger admission of these within the constitutional pale was effected by circumstances between the accessions of Henry the Sixth and Henry the Seventh than in any previous age.

This period divides itself into two epochs. The first comprises the melancholy conduct and ignominious close of the second war for the establishment of the Plantagenets in France. But, as in the affairs of men, it is often with the business of nations, that there is a providence which shapes our ends, rough-hew them how we will. Every leaf that was lost from the laurels of Henry the Fifth was a security gained for the internal welfare of England in the rule of his successors; for by the loss of the last, in which, with such apparent ignominy, the contest ended, all projects of territorial aggrandizement on the European Continent were happily ended also, and with them those accessions to the power of conquering kings that were incompatible with a moderate system of political liberty, as well as that attention given to desired acquisitions abroad which had become inconsistent with a due regard to the subject's interests at home. The second epoch includes the wars of the white and red Roses, and to this it is more important to direct the attention of the reader.

The dispute of the rival houses of York and Lancaster implied at its origin the popular acquiescence and assistance in a change of regal succession, and it exerted a proportionate influence on the political position of the people. When the barons of the Yorkist party revived the dispute in a more bloody form—after that temporary insanity of Henry the Sixth, into which his constant imbecility, aggravated by illness, had driven him—the influence it exerted, though in another form, was of a character still more beneficial. It at once engaged the two great aristocratic factions in a self-exhausting struggle, while it enabled, in the interval, a great mass of the people, who stood almost quite aloof from the contest, to improve largely, not only by the exhaustion of the strength of their noble adversaries, but by their own plebeian successes in commerce and the arts, the powers and rights of the commonalty of England.

There is not a matter of more curious contemplation in our history than these wars of the white and red Roses. They raged only upon the surface of the land; the peaceful current beneath ran on as peacefully as before. No burnings, no plunderings, no devastations, reached the towns. When we look within the latter for evidence of the desolating strife which was deluging the country round in blood, we behold commerce increasing; the arts thriving; schools for education in progress (after the first endowments in London in the twenty-fifth of Henry the Sixth, the foundation of grammar schools increased rapidly everywhere); and, in the only sign of outward danger, a still surer symbol of inner and lasting safety, since the town combinations against possible outrage from the barons took the form of guilds, of corporations, and of those other municipal safeguards which now for the first time arose in the Norman period, and which are the schools, or small republics, in which a people are best taught not only the art of self-government, but its priceless value, its independence, and its honour. The few legislative enactments of this singular period, passed when parliaments were at leisure from raising or putting down the rival sovereigns, sufficiently prove the importance into which commerce had risen. It is unfortunate that they do not also prove a knowledge of its true interests, or of the means of best promoting them. It was a Parliament of Edward the Fourth which—after confirming the statutes of the fourth, fifth, and sixth Henries, with the impolitic and dangerous distinction of "late, in fact but not of right, kings of England"—prohibited the importation of foreign corn; and it is an unhappy circumstance that the idea of a people being ruined by making their food too cheap did not remain the peculiar property of the fifteenth century. It was in parliaments of Edward the Fourth and Richard the Third that importations of foreign manufacture were forbidden, where the like articles could be produced at home. And it was by Richard the Third himself that the practice of extorting money from merchants and citizens, on pretence of loans and benevolences, was abolished, for which the usurper has obtained the honourable praise of Lord Bacon "as a prince in militar virtue approved, jealous of the honour of the English nation, and likewise a good law-maker for the ease and solace of the common people."

But even the lowest ranks of that common people — the common men-at-arms themselves — were able, out of these wars of York and Lancaster, to snatch a way to rise in. Their actual loss of life in the struggle was nothing in proportion to that of their chiefs; and the result of the final victory was such as mainly to withdraw their services from the aristocracy, and attach them to the people and the king. When Stowe tells us of the battle of Northampton, he adds, that "the earles of Marche and Warwecke let cry, thorow the field, that no man should lay hand upon the king, ne on the common people, but on the lords, knights, and esquires." When we read of the results of the battle of Bosworth, we find victory in the hands of Henry and the smaller baronial faction of the Lancasters, and observe the instant commencement of a system by which the preponderating Yorkist aristocrats were sought to be depressed, by which severe statutes against the farther prevalence of armed retainers were freshly enacted or revived, restrictions on the devising of land, in effect, removed, and all things directed towards an ultimate transfer of the old baronial strength into new and, as it was supposed, less formidable channels. Large numbers of the baronial vassals took refuge in the towns, increasing their power and privileges; large numbers, unhappily, still remained upon the soil; and these, no longer necessary for the shows of pomp or the realities of war, suffered the worst horrors of destitution, were driven to its last resources, became incendiaries or thieves, overran the land as beggars, and, in the end, rendered necessary that great social change which took the name of a Poor Law in the reign of Elizabeth.

With the battle of Bosworth Field the civil wars were finally closed, and with them the illustrious line of the Plantagenets. The pretensions of York and Lancaster were compromised by Richmond's marriage with the heiress of the house of York; and in the person of Henry the Seventh the line of the Tudor princes assumed sovereign rule in England. The strife had lasted upward of thirty years; twelve great pitched battles had been fought in it; eighty princes of the blood had fallen; the ancient nobility had been almost entirely annihilated; and in the renowned and powerful Earl of Warwick — who was said to have daily feasted at his board, in the different manors and castles he possessed, upward of thirty thousand persons — there had fallen the greatest and the last of those mighty barons by whom the crown had in former times been checked and overawed, and in whom, less happily, a serious obstruction had always existed to the political advancement of the mass of the people. Such, indeed, had been this deluge of noble blood in the field or on the scaffold, that Henry the Seventh could find only twenty-eight temporal peers to summon to his first Parliament; and such the change effected by it, in a political sense, on the management of public affairs, that the accession of the first Tudor is considered the origin of the modern system, and from it the constitutional historian of England has dated the commencement of his history.

It is not in itself, however, but by peculiar accidents alone, entitled to this distinction. The time at which Henry the Seventh ascended the throne marks the exact date, not only of the revival of ancient literature, but of the time when the old Continental system was broken up, and foundations laid for the modern political arrangement of the European commonwealth. His reign itself includes a period of transition which will be lastingly memorable, not in the annals of England only; but in the history of the world. Great things had been begun, but their completion was waited for; great men had risen, but the greater, of whom they were the heralds, had yet to come. I have described the rise of an industrious commercial class, but not the discovery of a new continent and of Eastern commerce. The mariner's compass had guided the eager and adventurous Portuguese to distant points of Africa, and to regions more profitable still; but there was also living one calm and courageous Spaniard, by whom a new world was about to be disclosed to the rising hopes or the failing energies of the old. The printing-press of Gutenberg had begun to reveal its might and its mysteries, but William Caxton's was yet silent. Wicliff had taught great doctrines, but the name of Luther was still unheard. The monks had tortured Roger Bacon, and Francis Bacon had not risen to torture the monks.

What an entire world of intellect lives within these last two names alone. What far-extending views of philosophy and reason. What an elevation of the hopes of men, and a sharpening of the intellect to achieve them, may be said to have gone forth from the grave of the first of these daring philosophers. A final verdict was then passed against the tricks of Church impostors, against the pretences of magic, against the delusions of abstract reason, against all the bad devices by which craft and hypocrisy are from age to age sustained. It seems a simple thing to have said that no man could be so thoroughly convinced by argument that fire will burn as by thrusting his hand into the flames; yet there lay the ominous germe of that Baconian philosophy which taught the vast superiority of one simple interrogation of nature, by actual experiment, over all the cobweb quibbles of all the schools. It is as easy now to laugh at the brazen head of Friar Bacon, as it was easy in his day to invent the story, or to bury the philosopher himself for upward of twenty years in the living grave of a convent prison; but let the more thoughtful reader imagine what the effect must have been of only one half page of the first circulated "Epistola" of this astonishing genius, as I shall quote its translation here, communicated, as it necessarily was, to many active spirits of the time; and communicated, not as a tale of wonder or of prodigy, but as the simple revelation of science; not as a mystery of secret and miraculous art to astonish or amuse mankind, but as an honest and plain announcement of the wonders nature had in store for all who could be excited and encouraged to a vigorous search after knowledge.

"I will mention," he says, "things which may be done without the help of magic, such as, indeed, magic is unable and incapable of performing; for a vessel may be so constructed as to make more way with one man in her than another vessel fully manned. It is possible to make a chariot which, without any assistance of animals, shall move with that irresistible force which is ascribed to those scythed chariots in which the ancients fought. It is possible, also, to make instruments for flying, so that a man sitting in the middle thereof, and steering with a kind of rudder, may manage what is contrived to answer the end of wings, so as to divide and pass through the air. It is no less possible to make a machine of a very small size, and yet capable of raising or sinking the greatest weights, which may be of infinite use on certain occasions, for by the help of such an instrument, not above three inches high, or less, a man may be able to deliver himself and his companions out of prison, and to ascend or descend at pleasure. Yea, instruments may be fabricated by which one man shall draw a thousand men to him by force and against their will, as also machines which will enable men to walk without danger at the bottom of seas and rivers." It was not a mere matter of accident that a friar so wonderful should have risen at such a time.

In the still and wearied pause which had followed a storm of strife, and before these intellectual influences appeared in action on the scene, the first Tudor began his reign. It is useless to disguise the fact that, notwithstanding many great principles asserted and advantages achieved, it was not, in its immediate course, favourable to liberty. But a distinction of vast importance is, at the same time, to be carefully noted. The defection from popular progress did not lie with the people themselves, but with their natural leaders in the state, the House of Commons. Risings in the commonalty were frequent, remonstrances in the commons were few. In the early years of the reign Henry appealed directly to the country for a loan, leviable at a certain rate, but was flatly refused it. In a Parliament of a few years later he found more compliance. The truth was, that, relatively to what is called the state, circumstances had thrown an overbalance of power into the hands of Henry, while to the mass of the people these very circumstances rendered him the unconscious instrument of transition and of progress. Nor less was this the destiny of all the Tudors. The position they occupy in history, and the rights they exercised, were peculiar to a great social mission which began and ended with their race.

Lord Bacon has pronounced the laws of Henry the Seventh to be "deep, and not vulgar." They were not vulgar, but it may be fairly made a question if they were very deep; just as Henry himself was by no means a great man, and yet very far from a little one. The act which worked most permanently and for great results, was one from which nothing but the most temporary advantages seem to have been originally contemplated; and it is a question whether the first idea of it is due to Henry the Seventh or to Richard the Third. This was the statute of Fines, as it is generally called; the act out of which arose greater facilities of alienating entailed lands, and which has therefore been ascribed to Henry's sagacious and politic desire still farther to reduce the aristocratic influence, and divert it into new channels. Here, however, as in other things, there cannot be a doubt that the king was quite unconscious of the mighty change he was the means of effecting. He knew it as little as that the new powers he first gave to the old Consilium Regis would in after years, under the name of the Star Chamber, strike, by their vicious uses, at the very heart of the monarchy itself.

That a more direct power of alienation was never aimed at by the framer of this statute of fines, will appear from a brief mention of the state of the law at the time. Edward the First's act, De Donis Conditionalibus, had declared that lands given to a man and the heirs of his body, with remainder to other persons, or reversion to the donor, could not be alienated, either from his own issue or from those who were to succeed them by the possessor for the time being; but the courts of justice in subsequent reigns made many strong efforts to relax the strictness of these entails, not out of any hatred to them on the score of principle, but rather because they had been also held incapable of forfeiture for felony or treason; and ultimately, in the reign of Edward the Fourth, the judges held, in the celebrated case of Taltarum, that a tenant in tail might, by means of an imaginary device of law, which was termed suffering a common recovery, divest all who were to follow him of their succession, and become absolute owner of the fee simple. This unwarrantable stretch of judicial authority having been recognised, and often acted upon afterward, the intention of Henry the Seventh's statute was merely to throw greater obstructions in the way of those suits for the recovery of lands, which the recent civil turmoil had rendered very frequent, by establishing a short term of prescription. Its effect, at the same time, was to give a great impulse and a more decided efficacy to the power of alienation. It enacted, on the old principle of favouring possession, that a fine levied with proclamations in a public court of justice should, after five years, be a bar to all claims upon lands.

The history of the House of Commons in this reign is not to be contemplated without pain and sorrow, natural as, perhaps, it was in the new position of the king, and necessary to what followed in the government of his successor: yet it passed two statutes which are not undeserving of honourable mention. The first was that of Henry's settlement, which "ordained and enacted by the assent of the lords and at the request of the commons, that the inheritance of the crowns of England and France, and all dominions appertaining to them, should remain in Henry the Seventh and the heirs of his body for ever, and in none other." These words are admirably fitted for the occasion. The reader need not be reminded that, though Henry was the only surviving heir of the house of Lancaster, the illegitimacy of the ancestor from whom he derived the inheritance precluded its assertion as a just right. This, therefore, is artfully avoided in the words quoted, which, while they neither assert nor contradict the pretensions of lineal descent, are framed with a view to the creation of a parliamentary title. At the same time, however, a marriage with the only surviving issue of Edward the Fourth was forced upon Tudor, as though the house really feared to see a "spectre of indefeasible right standing once more in arms on the tomb of the house of York." The other statute referred to bore upon this subject also, and was framed to place the subject's duty of allegiance on a solid ground of reason and justice. Its language is such as a free people had the right to claim. It enacted, after reciting that subjects are by their allegiance bound to serve their prince, for the time being, against every power and rebellion raised against him, that "no person attending upon the king and sovereign lord of this land for the time being, and doing him true and faithful service, shall be convicted of high treason, by act of Parliament or other process of law, nor suffer any forfeiture or punishment; but that every act made contrary to this statute should be void and of no effect." The latter provision was, of course, idle, since the laws of one generation cannot bar the legislation of another; but it shows from what an earnest and passionate experience of the horrors of disputed allegiance this act had risen: an experience well justified in later ages, when the statute was appealed to again and again, and too often vainly.

The hoards of money amassed by Henry the Seventh through a long and lucky life, with the spirit of an extortioner and the care of a miser, are said to have amounted at his death to a sum that in our days would be tantamount to sixteen millions. With a treasury so enriched, with a title altogether undisputed, with extreme youth and a robust health, with a very handsome person and a more than average intellect, Henry the Eighth succeeded to his father's throne.

Events of vast importance to mankind do not steal into the world like thieves in the night, though men seldom recognise, till all is over, the heralds that preceded them. Invisible messengers might they have been, that gave the tidings of their coming; but these were not felt the less, nor the less welcomed: men's souls were stirred, their brains made busy, and their hearts set strongly yearning. Such a ferment was in England long before the voice of Luther was heard from out of Germany. It began with the heresy of Wicliff, a hundred and fifty years before Luther was born. Its workings were at first obscure, but by the light of the fagots that burned the followers of Wicliff they were slowly and surely revealed.

"Horsed on the sightless couriers of the air,"

The martyrdom of a few of these Lollards marks the beginning of Henry's reign. It is not my intention to dwell in detail upon any part of its course. The House of Commons became more servile; the few ancient lords that remained carried on an ignoble struggle with the new lords Henry created, as to which should surpass the other in servility; the nation looked on in a strange and uncertain attitude of complaisance and disgust; while above all there rose, in the festive, riotous, and burly form of Henry, a power of a kind that had been till then unknown—a power of unlimited passion; of unrestricted indulgence; of daily humours that availed against centuries of right and law; of caprices and lusts before which intellect was nothing, virtue nothing, life or love nothing; in whose presence even the genius of Wolsey and of More weighed lighter than dust, and at whose slightest frown the perfect graces of Anne Boleyn changed to a bloody horror. And this power, such and so terrible, existed for a purpose far greater and more lasting than its cruelties or crimes could be, and therefore it was permitted to exist. Be it only kept in mind that with the political Constitution of England it had no natural alliance or connexion, and that with the Progress of the People it only became identified by the vast results for which Providence suffered its continuance during a space of forty years.

Twelve of those years had passed when Martin Luther appeared before the diet at Worms and flung defiance at the pope. The nations of Europe were not unprepared for this, even from an obscure and apparently powerless monk. Gregory the Seventh's vast structure of theocratical power had long been broken down, and the various popes after his time, who made such strenuous efforts to excommunicate each other, had been more successful in excommunicating from popular deference or respect the faith which they professed. "Brother Martin has a fine genius," said the dainty and dilettanti Leo, "but these are the squabbles of friars." They were the muttered thunders of nations. England was lying in wait to swell the sound; the world was ripe to echo it. The civil governments of Europe had long impressed upon the governed that there was something rotten in them all. A new interest was wanted to engage and elevate men's hearts and souls. Nothing in which the higher nature or faculties of men could participate seemed to be going on in any part of Europe. What was Italy with its Cambray leagues? What Spain and its Cortes under Ferdinand and Isabella, or their successors? What was France with its States-General under Louis the Twelfth? What England, with its degenerate House of Commons, in waiting on the lusts of Henry? The same word suffices for all. The whole was a cheat which men, without resistance, could endure no more.

Henry himself was one of the first to resist—Luther, not the pope. This only marks the more truly what a mere brutal instrument he was—a mass of passion and will that were convertible for other uses, and in which even the grossest and most indecent inconsistency was suffered to take the shape of power. The title of Defender of the Faith, conferred upon him by Leo, he turned into a battering-ram against Clement. With it he even propitiated large masses of the moderate Catholics in England who did not pin their doctrines implicitly to the skirts of the Roman See, but were ready to offer homage to a new pope in the person of Henry himself.

This was, in fact, Henry's own most passionate desire. It was well that it was so, or Protestantism might never have been established as it was in his great daughter's reign. He had himself no regard for the truth in anything he did. The Gospel light as little beamed on him from Boleyn's laughing eyes, when she was about to mount his bed, as from her serene and patient look when she was about to mount his scaffold. The Gospel light has nothing to do with lust, has no sympathy for satisfied cruelty, takes no regard of personal interests, sheds no virtue upon ambitious passions, and could find in the whole huge bulk of Henry not a crevice or a corner into which it might cast even one of its diviner rays. Yet who, save Henry, could have done what the time cried out for? What, save his reckless brutality, could have discharged that painful but imperative work? Who could so have thrust down the monasteries, and hunted out the priests? Who would have dared, save he, to cram his own exchequer with their enormous revenues? Above all, what prince or priest, acting sincerely as a reformer of the faith and a champion of Luther's doctrines, could have done what was absolutely needful at the first flinging down of the national allegiance to Rome: could have kept in resolute check both Protestant and Catholic; could have persecuted with an equal hand the Romanist and the Lutheran; could have passed as an adherent to Catholic doctrines while he spurned the papal authority, and have loudly declared his passion for transubstantiation, while he still more loudly shouted forth his abhorrence of submission to a court at Rome. Be it assuredly believed that all was more wisely ordered than the mere wisdom of ordinary policy could presume to have foreseen. This broad and vicious body of Henry the Eighth was as the bridge between the old and the new religions.

It is fearful, but not unsalutary, to cast a parting glance at it after its great work upon the earth was done. It lay immovable and helpless, a mere corrupt and bloated ed mass of dying tyranny. No friend was near to comfort it; not even a courtier dared to warn it of its coming hour. The men whom it had gorged with the offal of its plunder hung back in affright from its perishing agonies, in disgust from its ulcerous sores. It could not move a limb nor lift a hand. The palace doors were made wider for its passage through them; and it could only then pass by means of machinery. Yet to the last it kept its ghastly state, descended daily from bed-chamber into room of kingly audience through a hole in the palace ceiling, and was nightly, by the same means, lifted back again to its sleepless bed. And to the last, unhappily for the world, it had its horrible indulgences. Before stretched in that helpless state of horror, its latest victim had been a Plantagenet. Nearest to itself in blood of all its living kindred, the Countess of Salisbury was, in her eightieth year, dragged to the scaffold for no pretended crime save that of corresponding with her son, and, having refused to lay her head upon the block (it was for traitors to do so, she said, which she was not), but moving swiftly round, and tossing it from side to side to avoid the executioner, she was struck down by the weapons of the neighbouring men-at-arms; and while her gray hairs streamed with blood, and her neck was forcibly held down, the axe discharged, at length, its dreadful office. The last victim of all followed in the graceful and gallant person of the young Lord Surrey. The dying tyranny, speechless and incapable of motion, had its hand lifted up to affix the formal seal to the death-warrant of the poet, the soldier, the statesman, and scholar; and, on the "day of the execution," according to Holinshed, was itself "lying in the agonies of death." Its miserable comfort, then, was the thought that youth was dying too; that the grave which yawned for abused health, indulged lusts, and monstrous crimes, had in the same instant opened at the feet of manly health, of generous grace, of exquisite genius, and modest virtue. And so perished Henry the Eighth.

Not so perished all his passions, or the penalties which are exacted for them in this world. He left children who inherited both, and pursued each other with an unnatural hatred. The legitimacy of Mary branded Elizabeth as illegitimate; the legitimacy of Elizabeth affixed a stain on the birth of Mary; and both were subject to that stain in the presence of their brother Edward. It had been made treason to hold the marriages both of Catharine of Arragon and Anne Boleyn to be legal; treason to hold the children by those marriages illegitimate; treason to be silent on the subject; and treason to refuse to take an oath upon it when required. One statute disabled Mary from the succession to make way for Elizabeth; another set aside Elizabeth to make room for Edward; a third, in raising that prince to a settled superiority in law, confirmed both his sisters in the imputation of disgrace. What but misery and hate could follow all this? And hate and misery followed hard indeed. Mary was thirty-two years old when her father died; Elizabeth was fourteen; Edward scarcely nine. What wonder that the persecution of Mary by the authority of her boy-brother tended to change into gall the distempered blood she had inherited! or that the after persecution of Elizabeth by Mary forced forth the less loving qualities of that greater woman Tudor! Very painful is it to contemplate all this, but far more painful would it be to speak in reprobation of what was vile and cruel, nor care to discriminate the sources to which it owed existence.

I have refrained from any remark on the popular progress in the civil government of this reign, apart from the great event of the beginning of the Reformation. A word concerning the House of Commons will yet be not without its use, low as the condition was to which it had servilely descended. Even in its mean and unworthy office of subserving to the interests and wishes of a tyrant, nobler duties were implied; the idea of higher functions was, at least, never lost; nor the sense that, however unworthy the immediate agent, it alone could be the instrument, of changes that affected the people. Towards that house the people were still instructed to look for good or evil. They saw it still grant subsidies which could not be raised by any other course; they saw it still used in the proposal of statutes which, without its consent, could never have been binding. Even the worst infringements of public liberty were but confessions of its power. When the sole proclamations of Henry the Eighth received, under penalty of fine and imprisonment, the force of statutes ("provided they should not be prejudicial to any person's inheritance, offices, liberties, goods, and chattels, or infringe the established laws"), it was the House of Commons which enacted it; declaring thus that without its authority no royal prerogative dared ever soar so high, that without its assistance liberty could never have fallen under such a fatal wound. When one fifth of the landed property of the nation passed from the possession of its owners, it was by the act of the House of Commons. When bills of attainder struck down the guilty, or shed the blood of the innocent, still it was from that house they came. The king may have been, indeed, all-powerful, but it was in the omnipotence of the parliamentary authority which had been suffered by base servility to descend upon him.

Finally, two direct cases of constitutional advantage were achieved in this reign, of which some mention should here be made. The first was the extension of parliamentary representation to the entire principality of Wales, on the basis of certain great and important principles laid down in the preamble of the bill which granted it—that it is disadvantageous to any place to be unrepresented; that representation is essential to good government; and that those who are bound by the laws should have a direct influence in the enactment of those laws. All this is distinctly laid down in the thirteenth chapter of the thirty-fourth and thirty-fifth of Henry the Eighth, by which upward of thirty members were added to the lower house. The second advantage was in support of privilege of Parliament. A burgess of the name of Ferrers had been arrested on his way to the house. The sergeant was at once sent with the mace to the prison to demand his immediate release. The sheriffs in whose names the arrest had been made, as well as the jailer who refused to comply with the demand of the sergeant, were subsequently brought to the bar and punished with imprisonment, while the king himself, in the presence of his judges, confirmed in the strongest manner this great assertion of privilege. Holinshed, who relates the incident, says, in reference to this demand for release of a party from prison at the mere demand of the sergeant of the house, that “the chancellor offered to grant them a writ of privilege, which they of the Commons’ House refused, being of a clear opinion that all commandments and other acts proceeding from the nether house were to be done and executed by their sergeant without writ, only by show of his mace, which was his warrant.”

In the short reign of Edward the Sixth, the Reformation was really introduced in England, and Protestantism established upon the soil. But the edifice was yet feeble, and was indeed far from completion, when the sudden accession of Mary, on her brother's premature death, overthrew it altogether. The last effort of the Reformers, before that event occurred, may be even said to have constituted the most essential stone of the building; and this was not quite accomplished at its fall. Edward the Sixth, after the example of his father, had been placed in the exact position of the pope; and Cranmer, with other bishops, had contented themselves with again taking out the commissions conceded to the tyranny of the old king, by which their sees were merely held during pleasure. A new scheme of ecclesiastical laws had been drawn up, when the young king was thrown upon his deathbed.

One thing is quite certain in any careful consideration of the tendencies of this short reign. The Reformation was pushed on after Henry the Eighth's death much too precipitately, and the Catholics, in consequence, began to recover ground. In vain did the Princess Mary herself implore to have the exercise of the old religion, to which she clung, conceded to her at home; in vain did Gardiner and Bonner protest against their unmerited deprivation of liberty and property; in vain did even Heath and Day, worthy and moderate bishops, who had gone as far as the Reformers should have wished, and only stopped where they also should have been content with making a temporary pause—in vain did even these solicit charity or justice. Some indulgences there were which Cranmer and Ridley would have granted, but the young king stood firm against all, and against his sister Mary with an obdurate harshness.

Much misery had meanwhile been attendant on the new distribution of the Church lands, and insurrections everywhere told of want and of despair. The comfortable dish at the convent-door was sighed for again. The blessings of the new faith had not fallen according to the promise. The waverers from the old system began to retrace their steps, the protectors of the new to abate their enthusiasm. What was it that was wanted, then? Something that should display the worst vices of the Romanist faith, the bigotry, the intolerance, the spiritual slavery, the lower deep than that lowest into which conscience seemed threatening to return. And then Mary ascended the throne. Still there was something wanted. A translation of the Bible had for some years been offered for sale in the parish churches, but men seemed yet to need an incentive to its study—a light to read it by; and within two years the fires began in Smithfield. No light of greater efficacy could have been devised to show the moderation of its doctrine, the gentleness of its wisdom, the all-embracing charities of its love. As hundreds perished in the flames, thousands upon tens of thousands began to breathe with ardent hope the name of Anne Boleyn's daughter.

This is all that need be said of the deplorable reign of Mary, save an important reference to one or two strong intimations of reviving independence in members of the House of Commons. In these the people seemed rising on the scene once more. No sovereign packed that house more sedulously with the creatures of the crown than Mary did. Men of the new faith were driven from the places of election by force and terror; foreign gold was distributed in profusion; pensions and bribes universally rewarded political profligacy; and a forcible exclusion from the house, even after regular election, was the common tribute to political honour. With all this, Mary approached her first Parliament in fear. She met them with affected moderation on her lips, though the fever of bigotry already consumed her heart. Nor did the result prove the fear misplaced. This first Parliament was speedily dissolved for thwarting her in her marriage negotiations. Another was summoned, and shared the same fate. Within two years she had summoned three Parliaments, which, though subject to heavy responsibility for many crimes, are not, in some respects, undeserving of most honourable mention.

In respect to the Spanish marriage, for example, nothing could induce them to give way to Mary's passionate desire for Philip, by conceding to that prince a dignity which they believed to be incompatible with the independence of the English crown, or by conferring a political authority upon him which might involve danger to the privileges and laws of the English people. They gave him, indeed, the empty title of king, which was due to his own independent rank, and in everything else exacted much and gave nothing. Commendable spirit was also shown in the repeated negotiations concerning the old property of the Church; and guilty as these Parliaments of Mary were in much that has disgraced them with posterity, it is a memorable circumstance to record that a band of patriots absolutely existed in one of them who, having publicly declared that all their efforts to serve the country were unavailing in that assembly, and that they would no longer remain to countenance what they would rather curse, openly and deliberately seceded from the house. Mary's attorney-general filed an information against them, but it was not pursued, and the reign soon after saw its close. Its work had not been left undone. For the advent of Elizabeth, all parties were now thoroughly prepared.

The glory of this extraordinary woman's reign was the final uprooting of the Roman Catholic faith, and the establishment of Protestantism. Amid many passions she indulged, and more over which she exercised a great control; amid many crimes she committed, and many from which she most magnanimously refrained, this has consecrated her memory. It was a policy not restricted to the country which she governed: she championed it throughout the world. All who were carrying on, against overwhelming numbers, the struggle of the new faith in other lands, were taught, not vainly, to appeal to her; and as it was one of the grand peculiarities of the Reformation to have given a new interest to ordinary politics, by lifting them out of the selfish regions of factious party into the nobler and serener atmosphere of conscience and religion, the English queen, while she deservedly won the fame of a defender of mental freedom, assumed, without desert, to be entitled to the office and the praise of a defender of political freedom also. Nor was this delusion practised unsuccessfully. It lasted for at least the half of her entire reign. The delusion was then discovered, and in the other half a difference arose.

The political position of Elizabeth at her accession was in all respects very striking. She at once entered on the easy inheritance of that estate which the singular stewardship of her father and grandfather had been cultivating and improving for upward of seventy years, and, as it might now almost seem, for her use alone. But the tenure of the estate was not less singular than its growth or its extent. Once carried to its highest point of cultivation, it was doomed to inevitable and speedy decay; its ripeness and its rottenness must appear together. Elizabeth lived to enjoy the one, and not altogether to escape the other. The state in the first period of her reign? That was Elizabeth. The state in the second period? That was a combination of Elizabeth, the House of Commons, the rack, and the scaffold.

Her desire and resolve to work out the problem of the political system of her father and grandfather appeared immediately on her accession. Everything was in favour of the plan. The House of Lords had now no power independent of the crown, for by the sole pleasure and will of the sovereign it had of late existed; the fear of confiscation and the scaffold on one hand, the hope of influence and Church property on the other, dealt out with a most impartial regard to the regal interest from the steps of the Tudor throne, held that house, from the beginning to the close of the reign, in the humblest subjection to Elizabeth—a nullity, a negation in the state. For the House of Commons, there was every reason to suppose that the business of the establishment of Protestantism would so far occupy the members as to leave undisputedly, at the first, a dictation of the main branch of the civil government in the queen's own hands. And this was a just belief; the members were so propitiated. "I have heard of old Parliament men," said Peter Wentworth, from his place in that house, twenty years afterward, "that the banishment of the pope and popery, and the restoring of true religion, had their beginning from this house, and not from the bishops." With regard to the people, it was always Elizabeth's fondest purpose to place herself at their head. The idea which had entered her great spirit seems to have been, that she could fling down every barrier between the sovereign authority and the popular allegiance. Her subjects she would have made her children. Her kingdom was to be to her as her own palace. It might be said, even, that she did not so much desire to be a sovereign prince as to be a sovereign demagogue. She would mix with the people, gladly make their interests hers, condescend to their amusements, uphold their prejudices, gossip with them, joke with them, swear with them, but never, on any pretence, suffer them to mount higher than her knee. Their aspiring tendencies she never countenanced. While she patted a mayor or an alderman on the head, she disdained to lift her finger for the support of a Spenser or a Shakspeare. The man of genius found no protection in her, nor did she ever give any direct encouragement to the cultivation of literature. The reverse of this has been stated so confidently and so long, that it is hazardous to replace it by the truth. Sad and sorry as it may be, it is the truth notwithstanding.

But the people, in her despite, had their Spensers and their Shakspeares; they had their translation of the Bible, with its lessons of brotherhood and charity; they had their tales of a New World, their lessons from the Old; they had as free an access to the great literature of the ancient writers as to that of the living and surpassing genius which surrounded them; they had poetry in thought, and poetry in action; adventure and chivalry moved in living realities through the land; and the commonest people might lift caps, as they passed along the streets, to a Drake, a Sidney, or a Raleigh. It was only necessary that the rising influences which marked the accession of the Tudor family should thus appear in full and active operation on the minds of the English people, to sentence to a gradual but certain downfall the half political, half patriarchal system of this famous woman, by far the greatest of the race.

Discontent directed itself first against the weakest and most ominous quarter. In the year 1570, the institution of episcopacy in the Protestant Church was openly assailed by the Lady Margaret's professor of divinity at Cambridge. There had been an active discussion going on for some years on matters of minor consideration. Tippets had been violently contested, and sad and serious had been disputes on the surplice. But now, to the amazement of the imperious Parker, who had declared that he would maintain to the death these essentials of the new religion, all farther mention of such matters ceased, and the archbishop was summoned to maintain to the death neither tippet nor surplice, but the whole ecclesiastical hierarchy of England. This was sudden, but the people did not seem to be taken suddenly. Cartwright's lectures were as a match to a train, and a formidable party of Puritans forthwith started up in England.

It was obvious, at the commencement of Elizabeth's reign, that the great danger lay here. It was, of course, an essential feature in the Tudor system, that the framework of the ancient hierarchy of Rome should be left untouched. At a time when politics had suddenly become, as it were, only a part and parcel of religion, the idea of unlimited spiritual dominion was too valuable to be surrendered, implying, as by a very simple analogy it did, unlimited temporal dominion also. This dominion, again, by the acts of supremacy and uniformity, was placed at the absolute use and disposal of the sovereign, who thus formally assumed the cast-off robes of the pope. But such an assumption, even so early, scattered the seeds of discontent in fruitful places. The very Catholics assumed a virtue in the eyes of the more pure religious Reformers, when they saw the peculiar nature of the persecution with which the queen indiscreetly visited them, and felt, as in the instance of the Act of Uniformity, that even they themselves would not be able altogether to escape its penalties.

It was prohibited by that statute, under pain of forfeiting goods and chattels for the first offence, a year's imprisonment for the second, and imprisonment during life for the third, that a minister should, whether benefited or not, use any but the established Liturgy; and a fine was, at the same time, imposed on all who should absent themselves from church on Sundays and holydays. The act of supremacy was much more atrocious. It enacted, with what has been truly termed an iniquitous and sanguinary retrospect, that all persons who had ever taken holy orders, or any degree in the universities, or had been admitted to the practice of the laws, or held any office in their execution, should be bound to take the oath of supremacy when tendered to them by a bishop, or by commissioners appointed under the great seal. A præmunire was the penalty for the first refusal; death, under the pains of high treason, for a second.

Not without a manly protest did these statutes pass at the time. "I say," exclaimed Lord Montagu, in his place in Parliament, "that this law that is pretended is not necessary; forasmuch as the Catholics of this realm disturb not, nor hinder the public affairs of the realm, neither spiritual nor temporal. They dispute not, they preach not, they disobey not the queen, they cause no trouble nor tumults among the people. . . . I do entreat whether it be just to make this penal statute to force the subjects of this realm to receive and believe the religion of the Protestants upon pain of death. This, I say, is a thing most unjust. For that it is repugnant to the law of nature, and all civil laws. The reason is, for that naturally no man can, or ought to be constrained to take for certain that which he holdeth to be uncertain. For this repugneth to the natural liberty of man's understanding. For understanding may be persecuted, but not forced. It is sufficient and enough for Protestants to keep possession of the churches, and the authority to preach and excommunicate, not to seek to force and strain men to do or believe, by compulsion, what they believe not; and not to swear, and to make God witness of their lie." This was spoken in 1562, while, at the same time, Mr. Atkinson vainly adjured the House of Commons with equal eloquence, and as fine a sense of philosophic toleration, to listen to like reason. "Is it not," he asked, "a sufficient punishment for a man that he shall not, by his wit and learning, so long as he continueth a certain opinion, bear any office, or have any countenance in this commonwealth? What better proof can you have of the goodness of the law, that you see, since that time, no great breach of the law; no seditious congregations, no tumult, but the common peace well kept! . . . Suppose you that the greatest part will refuse the oath? Think you that all that take it change their consciences? Nay, many a false shrew there is, that will lay his hand to the book when his heart shall be far off. Of this hath this house full experience. If men, for trifles, will forswear themselves, it cannot choose but be perilous when their goods, lands, liberties, and lives shall depend upon it. And if men were seditious before, now will they become ten times more seditious. And if any were rebellious before, now will his heart become more rebellious; for that he is enforced to perjury. . . I beseech you," concluded this admirable speaker, in a tone of prophetic warning, "I beseech you that you will well remember the trust that your country putteth in you; and, since you have the sword in your hand to strike, be well ware whom you strike. For some shall you strike that are your near friends, some your kinsmen, but all your countrymen, and even Christians. And though you may like these doings, yet may it be that your heirs after you may mislike them; and then farewell your name and worship."

The dangers thus predicted fell even more heavily than had been foreseen. The sword struck, and recoiled from the breasts of friends as well as foes. Persecution, insurrection, and the scaffold went on, after Protestantism had been immoveably established, in a continual round. Not the admirable and devoted attitude of the Catholics on the threatened approach of the armada, when, in that "agony of the Protestant faith and name," they flocked in every county to the lord-lieutenant's standard, and implored to be allowed to prove that the national glory of England was dearer to them than their religion itself: not even this abated the severities against them. On the other hand, not even the hatred borne by the purer order of the Reformers to Romanism and its professors in the slightest degree tended to the toleration of Protestant nonconformity. Indeed, the spirit of persecution in the last case was perhaps more keen and personal than in the first. Elizabeth loved, to the latest moment of her life, the gorgeous ceremonials of religion, as she cherished all that placed in subjection to authority the senses and the faith of men. It was with this feeling that she clothed her own bishops in such supreme authority; that she adhered to forms and ceremonies which, but for this, her masculine sense would have put aside in scorn; that she called in to a constant share in her government, during its later period, the rack and the scaffold, and bequeathed to her successors a regal inheritance rotting to its very core. No bishop, no king, was a dangerous, and, indeed, fatal maxim. Its very form implied not only an endeavour to check the great impulses of the Reformation, but also the possibility of a rebound from that endeavour which would involve ruin to both bishop and king. And so it proved.

Cartwright's lectures at Oxford were followed by an immediate movement in the House of Commons. A few days after the opening of the session, in the Parliament which met in April, 1571, Mr. Strickland, "a grave and ancient man of great zeal," rose and addressed the house at great length, and with great temper, on the abuses of the Church, and presented a bill for the reformation of the Common Prayer. This was followed, a few days after, by a bill to take away the granting of licenses and dispensations by the Archbishop of Canterbury. The queen, upon this, interfered, in great anger. Mr. Strickland's bills were arrested, and himself too. He was summoned before the council, and commanded not to return to the house till their farther pleasure. This was resented with spirit and success; and Mr. Strickland, in despite of queen and council, resumed his seat next day, when, in the course of a debate on the subject, Mr. Yelverton said, "that all matters not treason, or too much to the derogation of the imperial crown, were tolerable there, where all things came to be considered of, and where there was such fullness of power as even the right of the crown to be determined; and by warrant whereof we had so resolved, that to say the Parliament had no power to determine of the crown was high treason. He remembered how that men are not there for themselves, but for their counties. He showed it was fit for princes to have their prerogatives, but yet the same to be straitened within reasonable limits. The prince, he showed, could not herself make laws, neither ought she, by the same reason, break laws." He concluded with defending both Mr. Strickland and his bills.

Such expressions may well startle the believers in that kind of history which compares England and Elizabeth to Turkey and its sultan. But they were not then uttered for the first time in this reign. The political achievements of the days of the elder Henrys and Edwards were not to be so soon forgotten. The principles implied had been laid down over and over again, though the peculiar crisis of affairs at Elizabeth's accession enabled her, as I have shown, to dispense with them largely in her practice. As early as 1566, Onslow, then speaker of the House of Commons, thus referred to the authority of the common law, in his sessional address to the throne. "For, by our common law," he said, "although there be for the prince provided many princely prerogatives and royalties, yet it is not such as the prince can take money or other things, or do as he will, at his own pleasure, without order; but quietly to suffer his subjects to enjoy their own, without wrongful oppression, wherein other princes, by their liberty, do take as pleaseth them." He next proceeded to tell the queen "that, as a good prince, she was not given to tyranny contrary to the laws, had not attempted to make laws contrary to order, but had orderly called this Parliament, who perceived certain wants, and thereunto had put their helping hand." Onslow was at this time the queen's solicitor as well as speaker of the house, and Elizabeth offered no denial to his claims either for the house or the common law.

Harrison, who was a writer of some authority, used still stronger language a little later in the reign. "This house," he said, referring to the commons, "hath the most high and absolute power of the realme; for thereby kings and mightie princes have from time to time been deposed from their thrones; laws either enacted or abrogated; offenders of all sorts punished; and corrupted religion either disannulled or reformed. To be short, whatsoever the people of Rome did in their centuriatis or tribunitiis comitiis, the same is and may be done by authoritie of our Parlement House, which is the head and body of all the realme, and the place wherein everie particular person is intended to be present, if not by himselfe, yet by his advocate or attornie. For this cause, also, anything her enacted is not to be disliked, but obeyed of all men without contradiction or grudge." The noble language employed by Hooker, in his "Ecclesiastical Polity," is more accessible, and need not be repeated here. He anticipates in that the whole theory of Locke; in every part of it derives the origin of government explicitly, both in right and in fact, from a primary contract; enlarges on the advantages of a limited monarchy, and expressly lays down that of Elizabeth as a government restrained by law.

But, finally, I may quote the striking expressions of Aylmer, afterward Bishop of London, as early as 1559, when he answered Knox's "Blast of the Trumpet against the monstrous Regiment of Women." The blast had been blown against Mary, but the echo of the sound loitered disagreeably in the ears of the new queen. "Well," says Aylmer, "a woman may not reigne in England: better in England than anywhere, as it shall wel appere to him that withoute affection will consider the kinde of regiment; while I conferre ours with other as it is in it selfe, and not maymed by usurpacion, I can find none either so good or so indifferent. The regiment of England is not a mere monarchie, as some, for lack of consideracion, thinke, nor a mere oligarchie, nor democratie, but a rule mixte of all those, wherein each one of these have or should have like authoritie. Thimage whereof, and not the image, but the thing in dede, it is to be sene in the Parliament Hous, wherein you shall find these three estats: the king or quene, which representeth the monarche; the noble men, which be the aristocratie; and the burgesses and knights, the democratie. The verye same had Lacedemonia, the noblest and best city governed that ever was; thei had theire kings, theire senate and Hippagretes, which wer for the people. As in Lacedemonia none of these could make or break laws, order for warre or peac, or do any thing without thother; the king nothing without the senate and commons, nor either of them or both withoute the king (albeit the senate and the ephori had greater authoritie than the king had). In like manner, if the Parliament use theire privileges, the king can ordein nothing withoute them. If he do, it is his fault in usurping it, and theire follye in permitting it. . . But to what purpose is all this? To declare that it is not in England so daungerous a matter to have a woman ruler as men take it to be. For, first: it is not she that ruleth, but the laws, the executors whereof be her judges appointed by her, her justices, and such other officers. Secondly: she maketh no statutes or laws, but the honorable court of Parliament; she breaketh none, but it must be she and they together, or else not. If, on the other part, the regiment were such, as all hanged upon the king's or quene's wil, and not upon the lawes wrytten; if she might decre, and make lawes alone, without her senate; if she judged offences according to her wisdom, and not by limitation of statutes and laws; if she might dispose alone of warre and peace; if, to be short, she wer a mere monark, and not a mixt ruler, you might, peradventure, make me to feare the matter the more, and the les to defend the cause. But the state being as it is or ought to be (if men wer worth their eares), I can see no cause of feare." And no fear there was. The slumber was only for a time. Men were worth their ears, and had resolved that neither pillory nor rack should continue to make light of them.

After Strickland's return to the house, a very bold step was taken, and taken successfully. It had been found necessary that the Articles of the English Church, as altered from those of Edward the Sixth, and settled in the convocation of 1562, should receive the sanction of Parliament to make them more binding on the clergy. They were now introduced. On those that related to matters of faith no discussion arose; while, on those that declared the lawfulness of the established form of consecrating bishops and priests, the supremacy of the crown, and the power of the Church to order rites and ceremonies, an opposition started up of so decided a character, that the house eventually withheld its assent to them, and the insertion of the word "only" into a portion of the statute excluded those articles from legislative assent. Peter Wentworth, one of Strickland's supporters and fellow-patriots, and the most distinguished assertor of civil liberty in Elizabeth's reign, described in a subsequent Parliament his conversation on this subject with Archbishop Parker: "I was," said this bold and honest speaker, "among others, the last Parliament sent for unto the Bishop of Canterbury, for the Articles of Religion that then passed this house. He asked us why we did put out of the book the articles for the homilies, consecrating of bishops, and such like? 'Surely, sir,' said I, 'because we were so occupied in other matters, that we had no time to examine them how they agreed with the Word of God.' 'What,' said he, 'surely you mistook the matter; you will refer yourselves wholly to us therein?' 'No, by the faith I bear to God,' said I, 'we will pass nothing before we understand what it is; for that were but to make you popes; make you popes who list,' said I, 'for we will make you none.' And sure, Mr. Speaker, the speech seemed to me a pope-like speech, and I fear lest our bishops do attribute this of the pope's canons unto themselves, Papa non potest errare; for surely, if they did not, they would reform things amiss, and not to spurn against God's people for writing therein as they do: but I can tell them news; they do but kick against the pricks, for undoubtedly they both have, and do err."

Make you popes who list, for we will make you none, is, in a single sentence, a whole history. The people were taught to reject the false dogma of a papal supremacy, and suddenly found a High Church principle of a character scarcely less offensive lifting up its insolent head among them. Having achieved the sacred right of private judgment and national independence in the all-important matter of religion, they were instantly required to submit to an ecclesiastical usurpation of civil power and conscientious belief almost less tolerable than that which they so reluctantly bore in the days of papal slavery. The intellect and chivalry of the land, its earnest and serious persuasions, alike forbade it. And now a sudden encounter of both gave birth to a new race of men, who were soon destined to start forth, still affronted by that No king, no bishop cry, bear down both Church and throne into the dust. The sons and daughters of the Arcadia were the parents of the men of Charles and Cromwell.

Meanwhile the struggle which began against Elizabeth herself was so far conducted with spirit and with boldness, as to achieve many very solid and large accessions to the privileges of the House of Commons (which it is not necessary to make farther reference to), as well as to leave on lasting record a valuable protest against the Tudor system, as one which centuries of English history rejected and disclaimed. It was in vain that Elizabeth packed the house with placemen; in vain she flooded the country party with upward of sixty-two new members. The Wentworths and Stricklands still remained, and still in every session proclaimed at least the duty and the right of Parliament to inquire into every public matter, to remedy every public abuse, to avert, as far as possible, every public mischief. The cry of English liberty was never raised more piercingly, though it remained for later days to send back to it a louder and more terrible echo.

"Two things, Mr. Speaker," said Peter Wentworth, in the session of 1575, "two things do great hurt in this place, of the which I do mean to speak. The one is a rumour which runneth about the house, and this it is: 'take heed what you do; the queen's majesty liketh not such a matter; whosoever preferreth it, she will be offended with him.' Or the contrary: 'her majesty liketh of such a matter; whosoever speaketh against it, she will be much offended with him.' The other is, that sometimes a message is brought into the house, either of commanding or inhibiting, very injurious to the freedom of speech and consultation. I would to God, Mr. Speaker, that these two were buried in hell; I mean rumours and messages. . . I will show you a reason," continued this honest orator, and he had a brother, Paul Wentworth, worthy of him, "I will show you a reason to prove it perilous always to follow the prince's mind. Many times it falleth out that a prince may favour a cause perilous to himself and the whole state. What are we, then, if we follow the prince's mind? Are we not unfaithful unto God, our prince, and state? Yes, truly; for we are chosen of the whole realm, of a special trust and confidence by them reposed in us. . . . Sir, I will discharge my conscience and duties to God, my prince, and country. Certain it is, Mr. Speaker, that none is without fault, no, not our noble queen, sith her majesty hath committed great fault, yea, dangerous faults to herself. . . . No estate can stand where the prince will not be governed by advice." For these daring references to the sovereign, Wentworth was summoned before the council, justified all he had uttered, and was flung into the Tower. The house obtained his release after a month's imprisonment; but shortly after his reappearance he was again arrested and committed, with several friends and supporters; again released; and, on resuming his seat, again in bitter opposition. The spirit which animated him could not be repressed by bonds, could not by death be extinguished.

How, it may be asked, did Elizabeth resist it so long? Because she had wily counsellors, and, in everything that directly affected the comforts of the great mass of the people, was a wise and prudent princess. She husbanded her tyranny, and, for the most part, laid its finger lightly on the commonalty of England. She would have treated them, in more senses than one, as though they were her own. She was frugal in her personal wants, and never kept an ill-supplied exchequer. In the first session after Wentworth's more determined resistance, she had generously remitted one subsidy voted to her, and was yet able, after the close of that session, which had been more than commonly distasteful, to dispense with farther subsidies for the space of five years, during which she refrained from summoning another Parliament. When compelled, at last, to do so, the invincible Wentworth again presented himself, with a still stronger and more compact band of allies, and again the remonstrances began.

Her last House of Commons met in 1601, and its proceedings imply a serious advance of hostile temper, as well in the country as the house. I quote a singular extract from one of the debates on subsidies—which had been rendered more needful to Elizabeth by a foreign war, an Irish rebellion, and a sudden depreciation in the value of money—from a report of the time. "Then Sergeant Heyle: 'Mr. Speaker, I marvel much that the house will stand upon granting of a subsidy, or the time of payment, when all we have is her majesty's; and she may lawfully, at her pleasure, take it from us.

Yea, she hath as much right to all our lands and goods as to any revenue of her crown.' At which all the house hemmed, and laughed, and talked. 'Well,' quoth Sergeant Heyle, 'all your hemming shall not put me out of countenance.' So Mr. Speaker stood up and said, 'It is a great disorder that this should be used; for it is the ancient use of every man to be silent when any one speaketh; and he that is speaking should be suffered to deliver his mind without interruption.' So the sergeant proceeded; and when he had spoken a little while, the house hemmed again, and so he sat down. In his latter speech he said, 'he could prove his former position by precedent in the times of Henry the Third, King John, King Stephen,' &c., which was the occasion of their hemming." It is significant to mark in this that the worthy sergeant stands alone in his obsolete views and obsolete precedents. All the house laughed at him. How short the time that had elapsed since the sergeant might have been coughing at the house, and the house complaining of the sergeant!

But out of doors there is laughter too, and remark upon public affairs. Gathering clusters of common men discuss the doings of Parliament, even as Mr. Secretary Cecil passes along in his carriage. Mob orators are collecting; eager faces are turned to them. The common people themselves, at last, seem to be taking politics in hand. "I must needs give you this for a future caution," said Cecil to the assembled commons, on the 25th of November, 1601, "that whatsoever is subject to public expectation cannot be good, while the Parliament matters are ordinary talk in the street. I have heard myself, being in my coach, these words spoken aloud: 'God prosper those that further the overthrow of these monopolies! God send the prerogative touch not our liberty!' I think those persons would be glad that all sovereignty were converted into popularity; we being here but the popular mouth, and our liberty the liberty of the subject."

And Cecil might the less inaptly think so, since his mistress had sent him there with a conciliatory message from the throne, freely surrendering her demand of certain monopolies, in consequence of their having occasioned several fierce debates of resistance in the house. It is a memorable thing that this should have been one of the last public acts of the great Elizabeth. It illustrates her system of government, the means by which she had sustained it so long, and the inevitable certainty that it could not be sustained much longer. Her mission had reached its close. She went down to the House of Commons a few days afterward, and spoke to them in a gentle and melancholy tone, as though conscious the meeting would be their last.

"Of myself," she said, in a spirit of self-vindication, and she might say it with truth and pride, "I must say this: I never was any greedy, scraping grasper, nor a strait, fast-holding prince, nor yet a waster; my heart was never set on worldly goods, but only for my subjects' good. What you do bestow on me, I will not hoard it up, but receive it to bestow on you again. Yea, mine own properties I account yours. Since I was queen," she continued, "yet never did I put my pen to any grant, but that upon pretext and semblance made unto me that it was both good and beneficial to the subjects in general, though a private profit to some of my ancient servants, who had deserved it well. But the contrary being found by experience, I am exceeding beholden to such subjects as would move the same at first. . . . And if my kingly bounty hath been abused, and my grants turned to the hurt of my people, contrary to my will and meaning, or if any in authority under me have neglected or perverted what I have committed to them, I hope God will not lay their culps and offences to my charge. . . . To be a king," she added, with an eloquent and even affecting protest against any harsh judgment in posterity, "to be a king and wear a crown is more glorious to them that see it than it is pleasure to them that bear it. For myself, I was never so much enticed with the glorious name of a king, or royal authority of a queen, as delighted that God hath made me his instrument to maintain his truth and glory, and to defend this kingdom from peril, dishonour, tyranny, and oppression. There will never queen sit in my seat with more zeal to my country or care to my subjects, and that will sooner, with willingness, yield and venture her life for your good and safety, than myself. And though you have had, and may have, many princes more mighty and wise sitting in this seat, yet you never had, or shall have, any that will be more careful and loving. Should I ascribe anything to myself and my sexly weakness, I were not worthy to live then, and, of all, most unworthy of the mercies I have had from God, who hath ever yet given me a heart which never yet feared foreign or home enemies. . . . And so I commit you all to your best fortunes and farther councils. And I pray you, Mr. Comptroller, Mr. Secretary, and you of my council, that before these gentlemen depart into their counties, you bring them all to kiss my hand."

And having so spoken, this lion-hearted woman returned to her palace, passed a few more months there in depression and in sorrow, and, dying, bequeathed her crown to her "cousin of Scotland." The Stuart race at once and undisputedly ascended the English throne.

The movement which hurled them from it, and led to the temporary establishment of a republic in our country, is described in this volume. The biographies it contains are so eventful, that the history of the age itself might well be written in it; for the times, awful as they were, were not greater than the men. The ideas of both present themselves to us at once, like shadowy and solid giants standing together, and hardly letting us discern which leads the other.

The subjects have been selected with reference to the various stages in the struggle, from the opposition in the reign of James to the breaking out of the civil war, and thence to the execution of Charles, the erection of a republic, the usurpation of Cromwell, and the resumption of power by the Republicans on the abdication of his son. I have included the principal person who adhered to Charles. The exertions of the great men who founded the Commonwealth of England required illustration from those of the only great man who made a brave resistance to them.

Four lives out of the seven are here written in a detached shape for the first time; for, though few have been able to dispute the celebrated saying of Bishop Warburton, that, at the period they illustrate, the spirit of liberty was at its height in this country, "and its interests were conducted and supported by a set of the greatest geniuses for government that the world ever saw embarked together in one common cause," the number of those who have troubled themselves to inquire into the reason or precise value of this saying have been fewer still. It is a grave reproach to English political biography, that the attention so richly due to the statesmen who opposed Charles I., in themselves the most remarkable men of any age or nation, should have been suffered to be borne away by the poorer imitators of their memorable deeds, the authors of the imperfect settlement of 1688.

I may, perhaps, be allowed to add, that the latter part of that portion of this work devoted to the life of Cromwell contains what I have endeavoured to render as clear and faithful a statement as it was possible to make of the case of the Republican statesmen who opposed him.

The portrait of Eliot has been engraved by the courtesy of Lord St. Germain's, the patriot's lineal descendant. It is the first published portrait of Sir John Eliot. I am also indebted to the same obliging courtesy for the noble contemporary portrait of Hampden, which, having passed from the possession of Hampden's son as a gift to the son of Eliot, has been carefully preserved among the heirlooms of that family.

T A B L E,

ANALYTICAL AND CHRONOLOGICAL,

TO THE

STATESMEN OF THE COMMONWEALTH OF ENGLAND.

SIR JOHN ELIOT.

A.D.	1590-1632.	Page	A.D.	1626.	Page
	His Family and Descent	1		Buckingham impeached by the Commons on twelve Articles	14
1590.	(20th of April.) His Birth	1		Speech of Sir Dudley Digges	14
	Painful Incident of his early Life taken advantage of by his political Enemies	1		Extraordinary oratorical Display of Eliot on this Occasion	14
1607.	Enters College	2		Rage of the King when told of Eliot's Speech	15
1609.	Death of his Father	2		Eliot committed to the Tower	15
	His Apology to Mr. Moyle; Extracts from his Letters	2		Memorable expostulation of Sir Dudley Carleton to the House of Commons	16
	His Studies at the University	3		Eliot released: his Reappearance in the House	16
	Visits the Continent; his first Meeting with George Villiers	3		Buckingham elected Chancellor of Cambridge	16
	Returns from the Continent	3		Stormy Debate in the Commons	16
	Marries	3		Parliament dissolved	17
	Loses his Wife	4		Oppressive Measures of Charles I.	17
	Resumes his Intercourse with Villiers	4		His Instructions to the Clergy	17
	Villiers succeeds Somerset in the royal Favour	4		Eliot a Prisoner in the Gatehouse	18
	Eliot made Vice-admiral of Devonshire, and appointed Chairman of the Committee of Stannaries	4		His able Argument against the forced Loan	18
	False Charges of his political Enemies	4		Buckingham undertakes the Command of the Expedition for the Relief of Rochelle	19
1623.	(8th of November.) His Letter to the Duke of Buckingham, Lord High Admiral of England	5		Disastrous Results of this Expedition; Writs for a new Parliament issued	19
	Remarks on this Letter	5	1628.	(17th of March.) The famous Third Parliament opened by the King at Westminster in a Speech of insolent Menace	19
	Aspect of public Affairs at the Meeting of the Parliament which introduced Eliot to public Life	5		A Resolution passed to grant no less than five Subsidies to be paid within twelve Months	20
	Ignominious Defeat of the Elector Palatine by Spinola	5		Sir John Eliot again in Parliament; acts in all Respects as the Leader of the House	20
	Deadly Jealousy between Buckingham and the Spanish Minister Olivarez	6		Extract from a Speech characteristic of his Style	21
1623.	A Parliament summoned; Dissolution of the Spanish Treaty	6		Resolutions passed in the Commons declaratory of the Rights of the People	21
	Eliot returned for the Borough of Newport in Cornwall	6		Conference between the Lords and the Commons	21
	Distinguishes himself, and is received as the Leader of the Country Party	6		Messages from the King to the Commons	22
	(1st of March.) His Speech on the Question of the Spanish Treaties	6		Resistance of the Commons to the Measures of the King	22
	Opposes any Attempt to move from the constitutional Usages of the House	7		The King's Letter to the Lords	22
	His unceasing Exertions against Monopolies	7		The Petition of Right adopted by both Houses now presented to the King	23
	His Speech on the Question of the Appeal against the long Delays of the Court of Chancery	8		(3d of June.) The King's Answer to the Petition of Right read in the House of Commons	23
	Terms on which he and his Friends consented to furnish Supplies for the Spanish War	8		Sir John Eliot's Speech on this Occasion	24
	Measures passed to reform many Grievances in the Law, and in prevention of vexatious Prosecutions	8		Proceeds to open the Question of "Insincerity and doubling in Religion;" "Want of Councils"	24
	James I. remonstrates with Buckingham	9		Develops to the House the Principles of Elizabeth's Policy in singularly opposite and pitiful Contrast to the prevailing Policy	25
1624.	(29th of October.) Dissolution of Parliament	9		Tremendous Effect of his Speech upon Buckingham and the Ministers	25
	Sudden and mysterious Death of James I.	9		Resumes his Speech, and continues to urge the Madness of breaking Peace with France at a Time so strangely unfortunate	25
1625.	(18th of June.) Meeting of Parliament; Eliot again at his Post	9		Third Division of his Argument, "The Insufficiency and Unfaithfulness of our Generals"	25
	Unwise Measures of Charles I.	10		Consideration of "the Ignorance and Corruption of our Ministers"	26
	Efforts of the Parliament to secure the future Safety of the People by an Enlargement of the Basis of popular Representation	10		Concludes his Speech with a Proposition for a Remonstrance to the King	27
	Motion of Sir John Eliot	10		Effects produced by his Speech; royal Message to the House	27
	Origin of Sir Thomas Wentworth's Dislike of him	10		Extraordinary Scene in the House	27
	Cessation of his personal Intercourse with Buckingham	11		Sir John Eliot accused of having given Offence to his Majesty in his recent Speech	28
	Charges against him	11		Buckingham named as the "Grievance of Grievances," the Commons' Petition "for a clear and satisfactory Answer in full Parliament to the Petition of Rights"	28
	His Opposition to the Measures of the King and Buckingham on the Subject of Subsidies	12		The Commons summoned to meet the King in the Upper House	28
	(12th of August.) Parliament dismissed; disgraceful Scenes	12		The King gives his Assent to the Petition of Rights	28
1625.	(6th of February.) A Parliament assembled; the King's Message to the House	13		Remonstrance against certain Proceedings of Buckingham	29
	Eliot's Speech in answer to his Majesty's Message; his bitter Taunt against Buckingham	13		The King's Speech; Parliament prorogued	29
	The Commons vote for the Grant of three Subsidies and three Fifteenths	14		Eliot retires into Cornwall; his Letter to Sir John Cotton	29

A.D.		Page	A.D.		Page
1628.	Assassination of Buckingham	29	1614.	Letter to his early Tutor, Mr. Greenwood	60
	Arminianism; arbitrary Measures of the King	30		Death of his Father; takes his Seat in Parliament as Member for Yorkshire	61
1629.	(20th of January.) Meeting of Parliament; Tonnage and Poundage	30		State of Parties; Dissolution of Parliament	61
	Motion of Sir John Eliot	30	1615.	Appointed to the Office of Custos Rotulorum, or Keeper of the Archives for the West Riding	61
	(27th.) His Speech during the Debate on Religious Grievances	31	1617.	Receives a Letter from the Duke of Buckingham requiring him to resign his Office	62
	Effects of his Speech	32		Continues in his Place; meets with strong Opposition from the Savile Party	62
	The Question of Religion surrendered to a Subcommittee	32		Disgraceful Occurrences during the Interval between the two Parliaments	62
	(25th of February.) Report of the Committee	32	1621.	Assembling of Parliament; early Sitzings of this Parliament distinguished by active and resolute Steps in behalf of Privilege	63
	Remonstrance concerning Tonnage and Poundage (2d of March.) Eliot's Speech on presenting his Remonstrance	33		Wentworth takes no Part in these Proceedings	63
	The House in violent and open Disorder	33	1622-31.	His Illness; Death of his Wife	63
	Steady and undaunted Conduct of Eliot	33		His Exertions in Behalf of his Brothers	63
	Dissolution of Parliament; Sir John Eliot summoned to appear before the Council Table	34		Extracts from his Correspondence with Sir George Calvert, the King's Secretary of State	64
	Proceedings against him	34		Playful and confidential Style of his Letters	64
	Sentenced to be imprisoned during the King's Pleasure, and to be fined £2000	34		He ventures more openly among the popular Party; his second Marriage with Lady Arabella Hollis	65
	Committed a close Prisoner to the Tower	35		His extreme Moderation; he advises a Grant of Subsidies; Adjournment of the Parliament to Oxford	65
	Occupies the Hours of his Imprisonment with a Work having for its Object the Establishment of the Independence of Man's Mind	35		Disabled from sitting in Parliament by being appointed Sheriff of Yorkshire	65
	His Letter of Advice to his Sons	36		His Letter to his Kinsman Wandesford	66
	His Pain on hearing of the Irregularities of his eldest Son	36		Receives the King's Warrant dismissing him from the Office of Custos Rotulorum	67
	His Letter to his Son Richard	37		His Letter to Sir Richard Weston, Chancellor of the Exchequer, on this Subject	67
	His Letter to Hampden; Advice and Instruction to his Son respecting a Course and Object of Travel	37		Buckingham's violent Dislike to him	68
	Passage from Hampden's Reply on these Points	37		The second Parliament dissolved; Privy Seals issued	68
	His Letter to Sir Oliver Luke	38		Wentworth receives a Privy Seal; Anxiety of his Friends	68
	To his Kinsman Knightley, describing the Commencement of his Disorder	38		Refuses the Loan; summoned to the Council Table at London	69
	His Letter to Bevil Grenville	38		Committed to the Marshalsea; Extracts from the Letters of his Brother-in-law Denzil Hollis	69
1631.	(26th of December.) His Letter to Hampden complaining of being put under new Restraints by Warrant from the King	39		Is released	69
	Finds Consolation and Sustainment in the philosophical Work in which he had engaged	39		His Speech in the Third Parliament on the Discussion of the general Question of Grievances	69
	Compared to Sir Walter Raleigh	39		His Speech on one of Secretary Cooke's pressing Applications for Subsidies	70
	His increasing Illness; petitions the King to set him at Liberty	40		Proposes a Committee for Grievances; Effect of his Speeches	70
	Sends for a Painter to the Tower, and has his Portrait painted exactly as he then appeared	40		(26th of June.) Parliament prorogued	70
	His last Moments present the perfect Pattern of a Christian Philosopher; Quotations from his last Letters to Hampden	40		(14th of July.) Created Baron Wentworth, and called to the Privy Council	70
1632.	(27th of November.) His Death	41		Preliminary Remarks previous to entering on the History of his political Life	71
	His Son refused Permission to carry his Body into Cornwall to be buried	41		His deep Esteem for Mr. Greenwood, his early Tutor	72
	His Character as a Statesman	41		His Method of Study transmitted to us by Sir George Radcliffe	72

APPENDIX.

Some Account of an unpublished philosophical Treatise, entitled "The Monarchy of Man," written by Sir John Eliot during his last Imprisonment

43

THOMAS WENTWORTH, EARL OF STRAFFORD.

1593-1641.

1593.	(13th of April.) His Birth and Parentage; receives his earliest and strongest Impressions in the Midst of aristocratic Influences	55		Proceedings cited in proof of his excessive Vanity	76
	Little Account of his early Education; sent to St. John's College, Cambridge	55		We resume the Progress of his Fortunes	77
	Acquires the Honour of Knighthood	55		Surprise excited by his Elevation to his Presidency in the North	77
1611.	His Marriage with Frances, Daughter of the Earl of Cumberland	56		Character of the important Office intrusted to him; defers his Departure to the North until after the Dissolution of Parliament	77
	(November.) Proceeds to France; strange Events in France at this Period	56		His first Proceedings on succeeding to this enormous Power	77
	Events in England	56		Claims for himself, as the Representative of absolute Royalty, the most absolute Reverence and Respect	78
	Character of James I.	56		His arbitrary Measures	78
	His unwise Measures	57		Case of Sir David Foulis	78
	State of Parties	57		Wentworth's Letter to Lord Cottington on the Subject	79
	RETROSPECT. The Parliament summoned in 1610; Impositions by Prerogative; growing Spirit and Power of the Commons; a Bill passed against Impositions	58		Foulis degraded from his various Offices, fined £5000 to the King, £3000 to Wentworth, and committed to the Fleet during his Majesty's Pleasure	79
	Farther Allusion to the Proceedings of this distinguished Session	58		Wentworth in his domestic Circle	80
	Negotiation between James and the Commons	58		Death of his Wife, the Lady Arabella; his Letter to Sir E. Stanhope on the Subject	80
	Shameful Expedient resorted to by the Court	59		Reappears in his Court at York, and pursues with startling Energy some of his most resolute Measures	81
1614.	Wentworth returned Knight of the Shire for Yorkshire	59		His characteristic Letter to Weston on being ac-
	The "Strafford Papers," the Source whereof we derive our Information of the public and private Character of this Statesman	59

A.D.	Page	A.D.	Page
	81	1634.	105
cused of intriguing for the Staff of the Lord-treasurer	81	Extracts from his Letter to Mr. Greenwood on the Subject	105
1632. Appointed to the Government of Ireland	81	The whole Production impressed with the Peculiarities of his Subtle and energetic Genius	106
Condition of Ireland at this Time in the highest degree difficult and dangerous	81	Thwarted by the King in his Desire to continue the Parliament	107
Energy and Prudence of Wentworth ; the Treasury Necessities and Means of Supply his primary Care	83	Follows up his Plans for increasing the Estates of the Crown by a Search after defective Titles	107
His vigorous Despatch to Lord Cottington	83	Opposition of the Roman Catholics	107
Follows his Despatch in Person, and prevails on the Council to enter into his Design	84	Proceedings against Lord Mountnorris	108
Extract from his Letter to the Lord-justices	84	Sentence passed	108
His meditated financial Projects	84	Receives a Remission of his Sentence	109
Establishes a Scheme of absolute Power in Ireland	85	Enmity provoked against Wentworth by the Case of Lord Mountnorris	109
Stipulations assented to ; characteristic of his Sagacity no less than his Ambition	85	1636. (May.) Obtains Permission from the King to appear at the English Court	109
Resolves not to resign his Presidency of Yorkshire	86	Gives a detailed Account of all the Measures he had accomplished during his Administration in Ireland	110
His Prosecution of apparent personal Resentments, what this was	86	Leaves the Court for Wentworth Woodhouse ; loaded with the Applause of the King and his Lords of the Council, and followed by the awful Gaze of doubting Multitudes	110
Commencement of his official Connexion with Lord Mountnorris, Treasurer of Ireland	87	Re-appears in York ; his vigorous Measures with respect to the Collection of the famous Tax of Ship-money	110
His third Marriage with Elizabeth Rhodes	87	A second Time entreats from Charles the Honour of an Earldom, and is refused	111
Extracts from some curious Letters relating to this Marriage	88	Returns to his Government in Ireland, and resumes his Measures precisely at the Point at which he had left them	111
His Gallantries	89	A loud and violent Voice of Clamour raised against him by the popular Party in England	112
His Person	89	His Letter to the King	112
Lady Carlisle, Lady Loftus, Lady Carnarvon	90	His Letter to Archbishop Laud	112
Wentworth unexpectedly delayed in his Departure for Ireland	91	Builds two royal Residences	112
1633 (July.) His Arrival in Dublin forms a new Era in the Government of Ireland	92	His Mode of living equal in Magnificence to the Houses themselves	113
He orders the Ceremonial of the British Court to be observed within the Castle	92	His private Habits	113
Extract from his first Despatch	92	His Advice to the King on the Subject of the Affairs of Scotland	114
His Law Reforms	93	Forces down some rising Commotions among the 60,000 Scottish Settlers in Ulster	114
His Exactions	93	Openly expresses his Censure of the royal Scheme that had prevailed since the Death of Buckingham	115
Calls his first Privy Council	93	His Despatches on the Subject of the "Antrim Negotiations"	115
Proceedings of the Council	93	His Letter to his Mother-in-Law Lady Clara	115
They propose a Parliament	93	1639. (November.) Appears in London	117
Power the great Law of Wentworth's Being, how mistaken	94	Created Earl of Strafford and Baron of Raby ; adorned with the Garter, and invested with the Title of Lord-lieutenant or Lieutenant-general of Ireland	117
His Despatch urging the Necessity of calling a Parliament instantly	95	1640. (March.) Arrives again in Ireland ; Proceedings of the Irish Parliament	117
Obtains a reluctant Consent from Charles I.	96	Progress of his Infirmitas	118
Issues his Writs for a Parliament to be instantly held in Dublin	96	(4th of April.) Arrives at Chester	118
Summons a Privy Council to deliberate on the Propositions to be transmitted to England as Subjects for Discussion in the Session	96	Dictates a long Despatch to the Earl of Northumberland	118
1634. (July.) Meeting of Parliament ; an admirably balanced Party of Catholics and Protestants assemble in the Irish House of Commons	97	Extraordinary Incident illustrating his unrelenting Vigilance	118
Speech of the Lord-deputy	97	His characteristic Letter to Windebanke	119
Demands at once the enormous Grant of six Subsidies	97	Proceeds by easy Journeys to London ; takes his Seat in the House of Lords	120
The Subsidies granted unconditionally	98	Appointed to the Command of the Army in the Place of Northumberland	120
Proceedings of the House of Lords ; Delight and Astonishment of the English Ministers	98	Disgraceful Intrigues against him	120
Overbearing Energy of Wentworth's Measures during the Sitting of the second Session of the Irish Parliament	99	Arrives in London ; enters the House of Peers ; impeached of high Treason in the Name of the Commons of England	121
Extracts from his Despatches at this Time	99	His Letters to Lady Strafford after his Arrest	121
Extracts from his Correspondence with Laud	99	Preliminary Proceedings	122
Introduces into Ireland the Court of High Commission	100	Articles of Accusation against him	122
Measures by which he sought to reduce the People of Ireland to a Conformity in Religion	100	1641. (24th of February.) His Answers in detail to the Charges of the Commons read to the House (22d of March.) Fixed for his Trial ; his Letter to his Wife	122
Removes the Decision of ecclesiastical Rights from the Courts of Common Law to the Castle Chamber	102	Short Summary of the Charges against him	123
Issues a Commission for the Repair of Churches	102	(23d of March.) Case opened against him at Westminster Hall by Pym	123
Writes to the King to solicit an Earldom, and is refused	102	His uncomplaining Composure during his Trial	124
Presents the Irish common Lawyers with the Majority of the English Statutes that had been passed since the Time of Poynings	103	He addresses the Lords	124
Turns his Attention to the Army ; strengthens them in Numbers and in Discipline	103	Interest excited in his Favour	125
His increasing Reputation	103	The Evidence finally admitted against him ; called upon to make his general Defence in Person against the Facts, leaving the Law to his Counsel	125
Death of Weston ; Wentworth offered the Treasurer's Staff	103	He argues against the Doctrine of arbitrary and constructive Treason	126
Establishes a permanent Revenue in Ireland	104	The Triumph of Pym as unparalleled as the Overthrow of Strafford	126
A Mint erected in Ireland, in spite of the desperate Opposition from the Officers of the English Mint	104	Defence of the Accused and the Accusers	126
Wentworth's Measures for improving the Commerce of Ireland	104	Strafford condemned	127
Introduces the general Cultivation of Flax to induce the Manufacture of Linen	105
Announces to the King that the annual Revenue should exceed the Expenditure by £60,000	105
His minute Attention to his private Affairs in England	105

A.D.	A.D.
1641. (21st of April.) The Bill of Attainder passed; the King addresses the House in his Favour . . . 127	1628. The Result of these Debates; the famous Vow or Declaration respecting Religion . . . 154
His Letter to the King, releasing him from his pledged Word . . . 128	Apocasy of Wentworth . . . 154
Farther Efforts of the King to save him . . . 128	Charles I. governs by prerogative; Measures adopted by the Executive to enslave the People . . . 155
Remarks on the Conduct of the King . . . 129	Illegal Impost . . . 155
Strafford employs the three more Days of Existence granted to him in the Arrangement of his Affairs . . . 129	A few of these shocking Enormities illustrated by Extracts from the Rev. Mr. Garrard's Letters to the Lord-deputy . . . 155, 156
His Letter of Advice to his Son . . . 130	First Introduction of Hackney-coaches commemorated by Mr. Garrard . . . 156
His Speech at the Scaffold . . . 130	Enforcement of illegal Patents and Proclamations of the King . . . 157
(12th of May.) His Execution . . . 131	Extract from Clarendon relative to the civil Government of England at this Period . . . 15
In the succeeding Reign the Attainder reversed; the Proceedings obliterated; and his Son restored to the Earldom . . . 131	Ship-money; Extract from Garrard's Letters illustrating the Manner in which this Tax was worked . . . 158
	Opposition to the Payment of this Tax; Case of Hampden . . . 159
APPENDIX	Brief Review of Laud's Administration of religious Affairs . . . 160
My humble Opinion concerning a Parliament in this your Majesty's Kingdom of Ireland . . . 132	1638. (1st of May.) Eight Ships bound for New-England, and filled with Puritan Families, arrested in the Thames by an Order from the Council; Plans for the Colonization of Part of the North American Continent . . . 161
A Copy of the Paper containing the Heads of the Lord Strafford's last Speech, written by his own Hand, as it was left upon the Scaffold . . . 134	1638. Brief Mention of the Affairs of Scotland . . . 162
	1640. (3d of April.) Meeting of Parliament; Speeches of the King and the Lord-keeper . . . 162
JOHN PYM.	Pym again in Parliament; becomes a Leader by the common Consent of all . . . 163
1584-1643.	Petitioning Parliament first organized as a System by Pym and Hampden . . . 163
His Birth, Parentage, and Education . . . 135	Speech of Pym on the Subject of Grievances . . . 163
His Marriage with Anna Hooker; her Death . . . 135	Extraordinary Effects of this Speech throughout England . . . 163
Sketch of the Character of this Lady . . . 135	Extracts from this Speech . . . 163
His affectionate Care towards his Children . . . 136	He propounds divers particular Points wherein the Privilege of the Parliament had been broken . . . 165
1690. Takes his Seat in Parliament for Calne . . . 136	Proceeds to the next Sort of Grievances concerning Religion . . . 165
State of Parties at this Time . . . 137	Proceeds to the third Kind of Grievances, the civil Oppressions of the State . . . 166
The King's Speech; Proceedings of the Commons Committees of Inquiry . . . 137	Begins with Tonnage and Poundage, and other Impositions not warranted by Law . . . 167
Pym an active and zealous promoter of these Committees . . . 138	Of enforcing Men to compound for Knighthood . . . 168
(15th of March.) Accusation of Lord Bacon . . . 138	The great Inundation of Monopolies . . . 168
His Defence . . . 138	Ship-money . . . 169
The Commons vote a solemn Declaration of their Resolve to spend their Lives and Fortunes in Defence of the Protestant Cause . . . 139	Enlargement of the Forests beyond the Bounds and Perambulations appointed and established by Act of Parliament . . . 169
Both Houses adjourned by royal Commission . . . 139	The military Charges laid upon the several Counties of the Kingdom . . . 170
Proceedings against Archbishop Abbot (November.) Assembling of Parliament . . . 140	Extra-judicial Declarations of Judges . . . 170
Remonstrance to the King . . . 140	That the Authority and Wisdom of the Council-table have been applied to the contriving and managing of several Monopolies and other great Grievances . . . 170
621. (3d of December.) The King's Letter to the Speaker . . . 140	Tenth, eleventh, and twelfth Head of civil Grievances . . . 171
Commencement of that open Warfare which ended in the Destruction of the Stuart Race . . . 140	These Extracts as important as they are interesting . . . 171
Reply of the Commons to the King's Letter . . . 141	Second and main Branch of his Speech, that the Disorders from whence these Grievances issued were as hurtful to the King as to the People . . . 171
This Declaration carried to the King at Newmarket, by Pym and eleven other Members deputed by the House . . . 141	Pym resumes his Seat. Extraordinary Impression made by his Speech. Resolution of the Commons to address the Lords . . . 173
The King's Rejoinder . . . 141, 142	Proceeds to the Lords with the Address; memorable Words uttered by him on this Occasion . . . 173
Symptoms of Alarm at the Court . . . 142	Conference between the Lords and Commons; Debates on Ship-money; Dissolution of Parliament . . . 174
The memorable Protest of the Commons . . . 143	Commitment of individual Members . . . 174
Torn out of the Journals by the King . . . 143	Extraordinary Exertions of Pym . . . 175
Arrest and Imprisonment of some of the leading Members; Dissolution of Parliament . . . 143	Disastrous War with Scotland drags the King daily more near to the Feet of his Subjects . . . 175
Petition from Francis Philips to King James, praying for the Release of his Brother, Sir Robert . . . 143	Council of Peers summoned to York . . . 175
Pym again in Parliament; his Exertions chiefly employed upon the Declaratory Statute against Monopolies, and against the Delinquencies of the Lord-treasurer, Middleton . . . 144	Petition from Pym praying for a Parliament, subscribed by 10,000 Citizens of London . . . 176
1625. Takes his Seat for the first Time as Member for the Borough of Tavistock, in the first Parliament of Charles I. . . 144	(3d of November.) Writs issued for a new Parliament . . . 176
Case of the King's Chaplain, Doctor Montague . . . 145	Character of the Long Parliament . . . 176
Pym appointed one of the secret Managers of an impeachment against the Duke of Buckingham . . . 145	The Patriot Leaders . . . 177
Proceeds to point out the fatal Consequences to the well-being of the State, no less than to the Morals of the Subject, which must result from the Continuance of such Practices as those of the Duke . . . 145	The Commons debate with closed Doors; Pym's Speech . . . 177
Extract from his Speech . . . 146-148	Message from the Lords desiring instant Conference on a Treaty with the Scots . . . 178
1628. Thrown into Prison; is released on his Return to the third Parliament for Tavistock . . . 148	Impeachment of Strafford resolved . . . 178
His Speech on the Motion for the Grant of Subsidies . . . 148	Pym made choice of for the Messenger to perform that Office in the House of Lords . . . 178
His indefatigable Exertions during the Progress and Preparation of the Petition of Rights . . . 149	Accusations against the Bishops . . . 178
His general Principle of Parliamentary Interference in religious Affairs . . . 149
(4th of June.) His Speech on the Case of Doctor Mainwaring; Division of his Subject . . . 150-153
Effects produced by this Speech . . . 153
Sentence pronounced against Mainwaring . . . 154
Takes an active Part in the Debates on the Spread of Arminianism . . . 154

A.D.	Page	A.D.	Page
1640.	Impeachment and Escape of Windebanke and Finch	1642.	Articles of Impeachment presented against him by the King's Attorney
	The Judges called to Account; Sir Robert Berkeley impeached of Treason; publicly arrested in the King's Bench Court		The Rest of the accused Members rise successively and refute the alleged Charges against themselves
	(2d of December.) Extract from Mr. Pym's Speech on this Occasion		The King enters the House; his Violence
	A Vote passed by the Commons decreeing £300,000 for the friendly Relief and Aid, and towards the Losses and Necessities of their Brethren the Scots		Rushworth's Account of this extraordinary and unparalleled Scene
	Triennial Bill		The King proceeds in his Search of the Five Members
	Pym's Speech on presenting the Articles of Impeachment against Strafford		Petition drawn up in Defence of Pym
	The King makes an Effort to save him by a Compromise with the Leaders of the Opposition		The House of Commons complete their open Defence of Charles by adjourning till the 11th of January, and ordering the accused Members on that Day to attend in their Places at Westminster, and resume their public Duties
	Extracts from this Negotiation		The King offers to compromise (11th of January.) Triumph and Return of the Five Members
1641	Nature and Conduct of the Compromise (22d of March.) Trial of Strafford opened at Westminster Hall		Energetic Measures of the Commons
	Mr. Pym's Speech		Pym's Speech during the Conference with the Lords
	Presents to the House certain weighty Reasons for closing the Proceedings against the Earl by the legislative Enactment of a Bill of Attainder		Effect of this Speech
	His Motives for this sudden Course		The King's Letter to the Speaker complaining of it
	His Speech on the last Day of the Trial; combining the Splendour of one of the Common-places of Cicero with the logical Force of Lord Bacon's profound Meditations		Answer of the Commons
	Incidents connected with the Plots for Strafford's Rescue, illustrating Pym's Character		Second Letter from the King; vigorous Remonstrance, recommended in an earnest and forcible Speech by Pym, forwarded to Charles
	Army Plot; Effects of Pym's Speech		Agitation of the Question of the Command of the Militia of the Kingdom
	(9th of May.) The King signs the Bill of Attainder against Strafford		Resolutions passed by the Commons; the Militia Ordinance denounced as illegal by the King
	Pym's Speech justifying the Impeachment and Detention of Laud		Petition of Sir Edward Dering against the Militia Ordinance; Pym's Speech on this Occasion (22d of August.) Charles I. erects his Standard at Nottingham
	This Speech remarkable for the absence of all Sectarian Intolerance		Pym intrusted with the momentous Duty of watching over and conducting the Affairs of Parliament and the Executive, while the Majority of his Friends were absent in the War
	Review of the Times, and Position of the leading Men		Spirit of the Public Journals
	Abolition of the Star Chamber and High Commission Courts		Pym presents himself at Guildhall; his Address to the Authorities
	The "Root and Branch" Petition revived in the House of Commons		The King addresses a Manifesto to the City of London in the highest Style of a Conqueror
	Bishops' Votes; Division between the Lords and Commons		Mr. Pym's Speech commenting on the various Allegations of Charles
	Debates on the Bill for the Extirpation of Episcopacy		The Effect of this Speech strikingly described by the Reporter
	Extract from Mr. Pym's Speech pointing out the Propriety of impeaching the thirteen Prelates who had been most active in framing the Canons		Discovery and Suppression of Waller's Plot
	The King's Visit to Scotland; Purposes of this Journey; narrowly and jealously watched by the Patriots		Successes of the King; he issues a free Pardon to all, with some few Exceptions, on the laying down of Arms
	(9th of September.) Adjournment of Parliament		Impeachment against the Queen
	Increasing Popularity of Pym		Extracts from the "Mercurius Aulicus"
	Lucy Percy, Countess of Carlisle		Charges against Pym
	Pym's Movements during the short Recess of Parliament		Voted by the Commons to be false and scandalous
	Intrigues of Charles I. in Scotland		His Illness; Death of Hampden
	(20th of October.) Reassembling of Parliament "The Incident"		The Office of Lieutenant-general of the Ordinance of the Kingdom conferred on him by the House of Commons
	Pym reports the Proceedings of the Committee during the Recess	1643.	(8th of December.) His Death; Account of his last Moments
	Extracts from the Letters of the King to Sir Edward Nicholas		Respect showed to his Memory by the House of Commons
	The Irish Rebellion; cold and laconic Remark of the King respecting it		(15th of December.) His Funeral
	Mr. Pym appears at the Head of the Commons in Conference with the Upper House		Extracts from the Funeral Sermon preached by Mr. Marshall
	His grave and condensed Statement of the Danger accruing to the Kingdom from the evil Counsellors of the King		Account of his Family and Descendants
	Conspiracies against his Life (22d of November.) Presents to the House the grand Remonstrance on the State of the Kingdom
	Violent and long Debate on its Introduction
	Tumults in the Houses of Parliament (25th of November.) Return of the King
	The grand Remonstrance presented to him at Hampton Court
	Bill in the Lower House for raising Soldiers by Impressment; Conference between the Lords and Commons Protest of the Bishops
	The Commons debate with closed Doors; Impeachment and Committal of the Twelve Bishops
1642.	Disturbance in London and Westminster (3d of January.) The King attempts to seize the Five leading Members of the Commons
	(4th.) Mr. Pym addresses the Speaker on the

APPENDIX.

- A Discovery of the great Plot for the utter Ruin of the City of London and the Parliament; as it was at large made known by John Pym, Esq., on Thursday, being the 8th of June, 1643, at a Common Hall, and afterward corrected by his own Hand for the Press
- Some Extracts from the Sense of the House, or the Opinion of some Lords and Commons concerning the Londoners' Petition for Peace
- Certain select Observations on the several Offices and Officers in the Militia of England, with the Power of the Parliament to raise the same as they shall judge expedient, &c., collected from the Papers of the late Mr. John Pym, a Member of the House of Commons, writ in the Year 1641, MS.
- A Sketch of English Affairs from the Dissolution of the Third Parliament to the raising of the King's Standard at Nottingham, from a Speech by Sir Arthur Hazlerig on the 7th of February, 1658
- A Declaration and Vindication of John Pym, Esq

A.D.		Page	A.D.		Page
F.	A Narrative of the Disease and Death of John Pym, Esq., late a Member of the honourable House of Commons, attested under the Hands of his Physicians, Chirurgeons, and Apothecary	240	1642.	Letter of Essex to the Speaker of the House of Commons	261
JOHN HAMPDEN.			SIR HENRY VANE.
1594-1643.			1612-1662.
	Preliminary Remarks	241	1612.	His Birth and Parentage	265
1594.	His Birth and Parentage	241		A brief Review of the chief Incidents of the Life of Sir Henry Vane the Elder	265
	Tradition respecting his Family	241		Early Education of Sir Henry Vane	266
1619.	His early Education; his Marriage	242		Becomes a Gentleman-Commoner of Magdalen Hall; visits Geneva	266
1620.	Takes his Seat in Parliament for the Borough of Crampound	242		Returns to England; his Prejudice and Bitterness against the Church; rebuked by the Bishop of London	266
	Attaches himself at once to the popular Party	242		The opening Passages of his Life decisive evidences of his Greatness	266
	Makes himself a prominent Member of the famous Glanville Committee, in the first Parliament of Charles	242		Vane announces his Determination to leave his Country, and seek the Liberty of Conscience denied him here, in the New World beyond the Waters of the Atlantic	267
	His Opposition to the proposed Loan to the King Committed to a close and rigorous Imprisonment in the Gate-house	243		Interest and Curiosity excited throughout Europe by the Progress of Colonization in America	267
	Returned for the Borough of Wendover, and takes his Seat in the celebrated Third Parliament	243		Vane embarks for America; characteristic Circumstance on board the Passage Ship	267
	Achieves the entire Confidence of the popular Party, and takes Part in the Preparation of the Petition of Rights	243	1635.	Arrives at Boston (3d of March.) Admitted to the Freedom of Massachusetts	268
	Intrusted with the Guardianship of Eliot's two Sons during his Imprisonment	244	1636.	Elected Governor of the Colony; Detail of his short Administration	268
	Extracts from his Correspondence with Eliot during his Imprisonment in the Tower	244-247		Difficulties which he had to contend with even before a single Act of his Government was known	268
	His Letter in Allusion to Eliot's younger Son, and to the Passages of the "Monarchy of Man," forwarded for his Perusal	244		His Measure for the Prevention of the Evils arising from the Number of foreign Vessels in the Harbour	269
	His Criticism on the "Monarchy of Man," illustrating his literary Taste and Skill	245		Incident of his Government furnishing a striking Illustration of his own Character, no less than the Character of the Men he had to deal with, and who were necessarily associated with him in the Government	269
	His last Letter, a noble Compliment to the Genius of Eliot	247		He summons the Officers of the British Vessels in the Port to a Conference with himself and the Magistrates of the Colony	269
	Melancholy Progress of public Affairs; Hampden becomes one of the acknowledged Leaders of the People	247		The Conference reopened the following Day with greater Violence	270
1635.	His Opposition to the Payment of Ship-money	247		The Case and its Result submitted to the Consideration of the Clergy	270
1636.	Sir Peter Temple, High Sheriff of Bucks, summoned before the Council-table for his Default of Arrears; his Letter to his Mother an Illustration of the Occasion and the Time	247		Commencement of that Hostility which ultimately brought his Administration to a close; Extracts from Sikes's Tribute to his Friend	270
	Hampden's Trial	248		His great Influence with the People of the Colony enables him for some time to withstand effectually the Hostility of its Chiefs	271
	Returned Member for Buckinghamshire; has left no Record of his Eloquence behind him	248		Commencement of Occurrences which led to the Pequot War	271
	Clarendon's Account of him at this momentous Period	248		The Antinomian Controversy	271
	Zeal with which he applied himself to the Business Affairs of this Parliament	249		Mrs. Anne Hutchinson; her Arrival in Boston	272
	His Letter to the Archbishop of York	249		Her uncontrolled and irresistible Influence upon the whole Community	272
	Is again returned for Buckinghamshire; his second Marriage	249		Accused of Heresy; Vane interferes; the ever gallant and generous Defender of the Rights of Faith and Conscience	272
	Retires from the Division on the Attainder of Lord Strafford	250		Her Doctrines explained	273
	His Conduct on that Attainder discussed	250		Many of her Doctrines become the ruling Principle of the Life and the Faith of Vane	274
	Hampden the first who dared to anticipate a broader Field of Warfare than the Floor of the House of Commons, and to prepare himself for a more real Struggle	251		Description of the Divisions and conflicting Parties in Christendom, quoted by Sikes from one of Vane's religious Essays	275
	An earnest Promoter of the grand Remonstrance and of the anti-episcopal Measures	251		His Advocacy of Mrs. Hutchinson only in accordance with the Principles which governed every Passage in his Life	276
	His Speech on the Morning after the Impeachment of the Five Members	251		Winthrop elected Governor, and Vane and his Friends left out of Office	276
	Mr. Southey's Opinion of this Speech refuted	252		His Controversy with Vane	277
	Buckinghamshire Petition in Defence of Hampden Commencement of the Civil War; Hampden subscribes £2000 to the Wants of the Parliament, and accepts the Commission of a Colonel in the Parliamentarian Army	253		This Discussion only to be alluded to here in so far as it illustrates the Character of Vane as a Statesman	277
	Divisions of the Parliamentarian Army	253	1637.	Extracts from Vane's Answers to Winthrop's "Defence of an Order of the Court, explaining its Intent, and illustrating its Equity"	277, 278
	The King's Forces	255		(August.) Vane embarks for England	278
	Occasional Skirmishes on both Sides	255		His Letters to his old and active Enemy, Winthrop	279
1642.	(23d of October.) Battle of Edgehill; Address of the King to his Officers	256		Brief Review of his colonial Residence and Administration	280
	Both Sides claim the Victory; Hampden's Letter to the Lieutenants of Buckinghamshire	256		His Marriage with Frances, Daughter of Sir Christopher Wray	280
	Reverses of the Parliamentarians	257
	Close of the first Year of the War; brilliant Successes of Hampden, and great Opportunities lost by Essex	257
	Extract from the "Mercurius Aulicus"	258
	Vile Insinuations against Hampden's Honesty and Virtue	258
	Successes of the Royalists	258
	Serious Discontents in the Parliamentarian Regiments	258
	Wise Measures of Hampden	259
	Receives his Death Wound	259
	A true Relation of this Affair, abridged from the King's Collection of Pamphlets	260

A.D.	Page	A.D.	Page
1640. (April.) Returned Member of Parliament for the Borough of Kingston-upon-Hull	280	1649. Proceedings of the Council of State; Bradshaw elected President of the Council	306
Appointed Treasurer of the Navy	280	Milton made Secretary to the Council for Foreign Tongues	306
Receives the Dignity of Knighthood from the Hands of Charles I.	280	Question considered in the Council—the Dismiss- sion of the present Parliament, and the sum- moning of another	306
(1st of November.) Again elected Member for the Borough of Kingston-upon-Hull, and takes his Seat at Westminster as a Member of the memorable Long Parliament	280	Objects of Vane; the Administration of a State without the Intervention of a Sovereign and a Court, and the free and full Toleration of all Modes of religious Worship and Opinion	307
His Conduct in the Affair of Lord Strafford's Trial	281	Steps taken to strengthen the present Parliament Temporary Arrangement effected	308
Distinguishes himself in all Matters of religious Reform; one of the greatest Supporters of the "Root and Branch" Petition against Prelacy	282	1650. Close of the first Year of the Commonwealth; Reduction of the Rebellion in Ireland	308
Reappointed Treasurer of the Navy by the Par- liament; memorable Circumstance in connex- ion with this Reappointment	283	Trial and Acquittal of Lilburne	309
Severe Reverses suffered by the Parliament dur- ing the second Year of the Civil War	283	Vane takes his Seat in the second Year's Council of State; gradual Construction of the Naval Administration	309
Fervour and Determination of the Adherents of the Parliament	283	Excellence of the Administration; System of the Commonwealth	309
1643. (July.) The Parliament negotiate with the Scots; four Commissioners appointed; Vane principally confided in	284	Fairfax resigns the Commander-in-chiefship	309
Clarendon's Description of this Embassy	284	1651. Battle of Worcester	309
Serious Difficulty occurs in Vane's Departure from London	284	The restless Movements again resumed in the House of Commons on the Question of Dissolu- tion and a new House	309
His Arrival in Edinburgh; "a solemn League and Covenant effected"	284	(15th of May.) A Committee appointed to take the Subject into Consideration	309
The treacherous Intrigues of the Duke of Hamil- ton foiled on this remarkable Occasion by Vane's Article respecting Religion	285	1652. (24th of September.) The Subject again discus- ed in the House	310
(17th of August.) The solemn League and Coven- ant voted by the Legislature and the Assem- bly of the Church at Edinburgh	285	Incorporation of Scotland with the English Legis- lature	310
Vane exposed to a more violent Hatred from the Royalists than he had yet experienced	285	Speech of Sir Henry Vane on the Subject of the Union	310
Commencement of his Intimacy with the Marquis of Argyll	286	His unparalleled Efforts to increase the Navy	312
(25th of September.) The solemn League and Covenant adopted in England	286	Sonnet addressed to him by Milton	312
1644. The Opening of the Campaign strengthened by the Accession of the Army from Scotland	286	1653. His Exertions to avert the Despotism of Cromwell Cromwell's Plan for dissolving the Parliament	313
Vane in the Camp of Manchester	286	(20th of April.) Vane hurries down to the House, to make a last Effort to sustain the Republic	314
Remonstrance and Discontent of the Presbyter- ians in the Debates in the House of Commons	287	Cromwell with an armed Force dissolves the Par- liament	314
Peculiar religious Opinions of Sir Henry Vane	287	Cromwell arrives at Whitehall the absolute Dic- tator of three Kingdoms; Vane at his private Home, a private Man	315
Extract from his "Retired Man's Meditations"	287	Brief Review of the Proceedings of the Long Par- liament	315
A Portion of his Prayer the Night before his Death	288	Provisions of the Bill on which Vane was content to rest his Case with the People and Posterity	316
Different Opinions respecting his religious Opin- ions	289	Vane, a few Days after the Usurpation, settles quietly at Raby Castle	317
Extracts from his religious Essays	290	Proceedings of Cromwell	318
State of Parties	293	Vane publishes his "Retired Man's Meditations" Enters the Field after his noble Fashion against the Dictator of the Commonwealth; Extracts from his Political Treatises	319
Treaty of Uxbridge	294	"England's Remembrancer" published; Vane summoned before the Council	320
The King's Letter to the Queen	294	(21st of August.) Appears before the Council	320
Proceedings of the Parliament	295	(9th of September.) Sent a Prisoner to the Isle of Wight	321
The Self-denying Ordinance	295	1656. (31st of December.) Is Released	321
The New Model	295	Measures adopted to involve his Estates in the Meshes of the Law	321
A second Self-denying Ordinance transmitted to the Lords	296	1658. (3d of September.) Death of Cromwell	321
Forces of the Parliament and of the King	296	1659. (27th of January.) Writes for a Parliament issued by the Council of his Son and Successor Rich- ard Cromwell	321
Battle of Naseby	297	Extraordinary and extreme Measures to prevent the Election of Sir Henry Vane	322
Defeat of the Royalists the first Result of Vane's Policy in the Matter of the Self-denying Ord- nance and the New Model	298	Vane once more takes his Seat in the House of Commons	322
Vane directs his Attention to the State of the Representation in the House of Commons	298	(9th of February.) His Speech during the De- bate on the Question of the Recognition of Richard Cromwell	322
Cromwell's Letter to the Parliament	299	The Republicans beaten; the Government vested in a single Person	324
Charles endeavours to negotiate with the Parlia- ment	299	(18th of February.) Vane again addresses the House on this Point	324
Origin of Vane's Conversion to Republicanism	300	(21st of February.) His next Effort against Rich- ard Cromwell, aimed at him through his Ad- ministration	325
Extract from his Essay on Government	300	His Speech on the Proposition of sending as much Shipping and Forces as might be necessary to promote the Success of a Mediation in the Af- fairs of the Kings of Sweden and Denmark	325
Petition secretly got up by the Presbyterians in the Name of the City carried into Parliament	302	Effect produced by this Speech; its Recommenda- tion most subtly and effectively aimed	326
Mr. Godwin's Description of the Statesmen that flourished at this Time	302	(1st of March.) His Speech during the Debate on the famous "Petition and Advice"	327
Vane's Position that of the greatest Difficulty	303	(9th of March.) Directs his Assaults against the Scotch and Irish Nominees	328
Whitelecke's Description of the Troops raised by Cromwell	303	His Speech on the Presentation of the Petition from seventy Royalist Prisoners, who had some
Disgraceful London Riots in Favour of the Pres- byterians	303
Vane in Fairfax's Camp at Hounslow	303
Flight of the King from Hampton Court	304
1648. Treaty at the Isle of Wight arranged	304
Result of the Treaty; Debate in the House of Commons on the Subject	304
Speech of Sir Henry Vane	304
Pride's Purge; Vane refusing to share in a Tri- umph obtained by such Means, retires to Raby	305
1649. (26th of February.) Leaves his Retirement and again joins his old Friends and Associates	305
Elected one of the Members of the Council of State; refuses to take the Oath expressing Ap- probation of the King's Trial and Execution	306

A.D.		Page	A.D.		Page
1659.	Years before sent to Barbadoes and sold as Slaves	328	1640.	The first who is reported to have avowed Republican Principles	354
	Extraordinary Party formed without the Doors of the House; Richard Cromwell attempts to dissolve the Parliament	328		Anecdote relating to this Fact	354
	They debate with closed Doors	329		Clarendon's Imputations on his good Faith respecting his great political Associates have no Warrant or Authority	355
	Vane addresses the Speaker	329	1640, 1641.	He takes a most prominent Part in all the Consultations of the Liberal Leaders, and in all their most memorable Actions	355
	Formal Abdication of Richard Cromwell; Resuscitation of the famous Long Parliament; Administration of the Government for a short Period on Republican Principles	329	1642.	Simple Frame of the first Executive Government of the Parliament; Marten appointed one of the Committee of Safety	355
	Rapid Sketch of the general Features of Vane's Conduct before his Arrest	329		A Colonel's Commission granted to him by the Parliament	355
1660.	RESTORATION. (July.) Arrested at Hampstead, and flung into the Tower	330		More successful as a Civilian than a Soldier; once more at Westminster engaged in fierce Contests and Disputes with the House of Lords	355
	Debates in the Commons on the Act of Indemnity	330		Disputes between the two Houses respecting two young Horses taken out of the King's Stables by a Person of the Name of De Luke	356
	Vane removed to a solitary Castle on one of the Isles of Scilly	330		Anecdote of Marten, said to belong to this Period, related by Doctor Peter Heylin	356
1662.	(7th of March.) His Letter to his Wife	332	1643.	(16th of August.) Expelled from the House and committed to the Tower	357
	Removed to the Tower of London, the Grand Jury having found a Bill against him as a false Traitor	333		Discharged after a Fortnight, without paying any Fees for his Imprisonment	357
	(2d of June.) Arraigned before the Court of King's Bench	333		Contributes out of his own Resources upward of £3000 to the parliamentary Commissioners for the Maintenance of the War	357
	The Indictment read to him twice in English	333		During his Absence from the House the Self-denying Ordinance debated and passed	357
	Refused the Assistance of Counsel	333	1646.	(16th of January.) A Resolution passed for his Reinstatement in the House	357
	His Address to his Judges	333		Received with an enthusiastic Welcome on re-entering the House of Commons	357
	Before resuming his Seat once more claims the Benefit of Counsel; refused; brought up to Trial	334		His Interference in behalf of Lilburne	358
	Substance of the Evidence in Support of the Prosecution	334		Anecdotes of his Wit	358
	Sir Henry Vane called upon for his Defence	334		Case of Judge Jenkins and Sir Francis Butler	358
	Extracts from this immortal Defence, in which he illustrated the emphatic Differences which separated his Case from that of almost every other Supporter of the Cause	335		Humane Interference of Henry Marten	359
	Proves by a few Witnesses the utter Falseness of much of the Crown Evidence	336		Speech intended to have been spoken by Jenkins at the Place of Execution	359
	A Verdict of Guilty found against him; carried back to the Tower	336		Another Instance of Marten's humane Interference in the Case of the Poet Davenant	359
	The King's Letter to Clarendon the Day after Vane's Trial	337		Strife between the Independents and the Presbyterians; Marten the most active and persevering of the Opponents of the King	360
	(11th of June.) Vane brought up to receive his Sentence	337	1647.	The Scots Commissioners claim the Right of Interference and Dictation in the Terms of Peace proposed to the royal Prisoner	360
	His Reasons why Sentence of Death should not be passed upon him	337		Marten's Argument on this Occasion	360
	Sentenced to be executed on Tower Hill	339		The Pretences of the Scots and the serious Evolutions they implied against the newly-achieved Freedom of England ably exposed	361
	Passages from his Prayer with his Family the Night before his Execution	339		The altered Position of the Scots since the Conclusion of the War exquisitely illustrated in the Answer to their first Argument	362
	His Conversation with the Sheriff the Morning of his Execution	340		He describes the wise and tolerant Faith of the Independents with a careless yet noble Simplicity	362
	His triumphal Progress from the Tower to the Scaffold	340		The general Case of the Independents against all their Opponents, whether of England or Scotland, stated with inimitable Ease and Clearness	363
	His Address to the People	341		His Treatment of the fifth and last Argument of the Scots Commissioners	364
	His Execution; Remark of Sikes on this infamous Murder	342		The Close of this Argument remarkable as illustrating, with superior Force, the Republican Ferour of Marten's Views, the various Wit of his Illustrations, and the Republican Plainness and Strength of his Style	365
	His eldest Son sworn into William's Privy Council at the Revolution of 1688, which banished forever from England the detested Family of the Stuarts	342		Four Bills, embodying the Conditions of Treaty, sent by Parliament to the King for his Assent	366

APPENDIX.

A.	A Healing Question propounded and resolved, upon Occasion of the late public and reasonable Call to Humiliation, in order to Love and Union among the honest Party, and with a Desire to apply Balm to the Wound before it become incurable	343		He rejects the Bills of the Parliament, and signs a secret Treaty with the Scots, by which he binds himself to renounce Episcopacy and accept the Covenant in solemn Parliament of both Kingdoms	366
B.	The People's Case stated	347		Commencement of Operations for changing the Form of Government from a Monarchy into a Republic	366
C.	Vanity of Vanities, or Sir Harry Vane's Picture	351		Debates on this Subject; Cromwell's Speech	366
D.	Sir Harry Vane's Speech at a Committee for the Bill against Episcopal Government, June 11th, 1641	351		Advance of Fairfax upon London; is joined by Marten in his capacity as Colonel	367
E.	A Letter from a Person of Quality to a Relation of Sir Harry Vane, a Week after the Execution	352		Extracts from Ireton's famous Papers and Remonstrances to the House of Commons, shown up in behalf of the Army	367

HENRY MARTEN.

1602—1660.

1602.	His Birth and Parentage	353		The Parliament renews a friendly Negotiation with the King	268
	His early Education	353		He rejects their Proposals with insatuated Scorn	368
1619.	The Degree of Bachelor of Arts conferred on him by the University of Oxford	353		Extracts from these Proposals	368
	His Marriage	353		The Army send up a Remonstrance to the House, calling for the immediate breaking up of the Treaty, and for Justice on the King, as the "capital Source of all Grievances"	370
1640.	Chosen to represent the County of Berkshire in Parliament	353
	(April.) The Long Parliament summoned; Marten a second Time returned with Enthusiasm	354

4. D.
1647.	Pride's Purge	370
1648.	(23d of December.) First Step against the Life of the King attempted in the House of Commons	371
	A Committee of Thirty-eight appointed to prepare Charges against him	371
	Anecdote of Marten's Share in these Deliberations (28th of December.) An Ordinance for the King's Trial carried into the House of Commons	371
1649.	(1st of January.) Charge against the King reported by the Committee of Thirty-eight	371
	(2d of January.) The Ordinance and the Charge sent up to the Lords	371
	(6th of January.) The Ordinance read a third time and passed; the Number of Commissioners named in it a hundred and thirty-five	372
	(8th of January.) Proclamation made in Westminster Hall by the Sergeant-at-arms of the coming Trial of the King	372
	(9th of January.) Reports of the Committee for the Construction of the Great Seal carried into the House of Commons by Henry Marten	372
	The Instructions of the Committee adopted, and the new Seal ordered to be prepared with all convenient Despatch	372
	(10th of January.) The Commissioners again meet; Bradshaw chosen President of the Court Counsel for the Prosecution fixed upon; the King brought privately from Windsor to St. James's	373
	(20th of January.) Conducted by Colonel Harrison from St. James's to Westminster	373
	The Charge delivered in Writing by Coke, and read by the Clerk	374
	The King replies in a grave and collected Manner	374
	Progress of the Trial; the Duty of preparing the Draught of a final Sentence intrusted to Henry Marten	374
	Sentence pronounced on him by Bradshaw	375
	Receives the farewell Visit of his Children	375
	(29th of January.) The Warrant for his Execution signed by the fifty-nine Commissioners	375
	Extraordinary scene between Marten and Cromwell, said to have occurred on the signing of this Warrant	376
	(30th of January.) Execution of the King its Effect on the Kingdom	377
	The Business of the Commonwealth resumed with quiet and resolved Deliberation	377
	A Vote passed in the Commons declaring Monarchy extinguished in England	378
	Marten the most prominent Actor in all the Proceedings of the Parliament at this Period	378
	(17th of February.) An Executive Council of State installed	378
	Proceedings of the Council; Repeal of the Statute of Banishment against the Jews	378
	Difficulties which beset the Commonwealth relating to the Question of a Dissolution of the Parliament	379
	Speech of Marten during the Debate in the House of Commons on this Subject	379
	Dissensions in the Army promoted by Lilburne	379
	Losses endured by Marten in the Public Service taken into consideration by the House of Commons	380
	One thousand Pounds per Annum settled on him by the Parliament	380
	His Disputes with Cromwell	380
1650.	Excluded from the Council of State	381
	Instances of his happy Humour during the serious Debates of this Period	381
	His Name again appears in the Council of State Last Scene of the Council of State, as described by Godwin; brief and concentrated Remonstrance of Bradshaw	381
	Marten thrown into Prison	382
1657-1658.	Extracts from Scott's Speeches in Oliver Cromwell's last Parliament	382, 384
	Death of Oliver Cromwell; Resumption of Power by the Republicans	384
	Thurloe's Proposition in Richard Cromwell's first Parliament	384
	Scott's Speech in Vindication of the Intentions of the Long Parliament	385
	Richard Cromwell driven from the Protectorate; Henry Marten once more takes his Seat in the House of Commons	386
	Restoration of Charles II.; Henry Marten surrenders, and resolves to stand his Trial	387
1660.	(10th of October.) Placed at the Bar of the Old Bailey, and required to plead	387
	Questions put to him by the Court	387

A.D.		Page
1660.	The Case opened by the Crown Counsel	387
	Examination of Witnesses	388
	Sir Parbeck Temple's Evidence	388
	The Solicitor-general addresses the Jury	388
	Marten called upon for his Defence; he addresses the Court	389
	The Solicitor-general follows in Aggravation of the Case	389
	The Lord-chief-baron delivers the Charge; a Verdict of Guilty returned by the Jury	389
	Discussion of the Matter in the House of Commons	390
1660-61.	Imprisoned in the Castle of Chepstow, in Monmouthshire	390
	Anecdote of his long Imprisonment	390
	His Death in the seventy-eighth Year of his Age	391

OLIVER CROMWELL.

1599-1658.

1599.	(25th of April.)	His Birth	392
		His Family	392
		Descended from the Royal Family of the Stuarts	394
		Amiable Character of his Mother	394
		Oliver Cromwell baptized in the Parish Church of St. John	395
		Marvellous Stories of his Youth	395
		Anecdote relative to his first Meeting with Charles I.	395
		Singular and awful Incidents connecting his Childhood with the mighty Future that awaited him	396
		Description of his School Days	397
1616.	(23d of April.)	Enters Sidney Sussex College as a Fellow Commoner	398
		Notices of his boyish Irregularities	399
1617.	(June.)	Death of his Father, Robert Cromwell	400
		Enters as a Member of Lincoln's Inn	400
		Returns to Huntingdon; his wild, dissolute Character	400
		His Lawsuit with his Uncle, Sir Thomas Steward	401
1620.	(29d of August.)	His Marriage with Elizabeth Bourchier	402
		Her amiable Character	403
		Fixes his Residence in his native Town of Huntingdon, and addresses himself to those Studies and Pursuits which were to pave his Way to Greatness	403
		His House becomes notorious as the Refuge of the Nonconformist Ministers	403
		He encourages them in their Opposition, proclaims their Wrongs, and urges the Necessity of Redress	404
		Dates of the Births of his Children	404
1626.	(14th of October.)	His Letter to Mr. Henry Downtell, of St. John's College, Cambridge, characteristic of his Mind at this Period	405
1628.	(March.)	Takes his Seat in the Third Parliament of Charles I., as Member for the Borough of Huntingdon	406
		Is introduced to the House by Hampden	406
		His Speech during the Debate in the Case of Mainwaring	406
		Striking Effect which his Speech created	406
		Dissolution of the Parliament; Cromwell returns to Huntingdon	406
		Appointed Justice of the Peace under the New Charter granted at this Time to the Huntingdon Corporation	407
1631.		Sells his small Patrimony, and removes with his Wife and Children to St. Ives	407
		Achieves an Influence through the Neighbourhood, unequalled for Piety and Self-denying Virtue	408
1635.		His Letter to Mr. Stone during his Residence at St. Ives	408
1636.	(June.)	Removes to the City of Ely on the Death of his Uncle, Sir Thomas Steward	409
		Appointed to the Trusteeship of some important Charities in the City	409
		Attacked by one of his worst hypochondriacal Distempers	409
1638.	(13th of October.)	His deeply interesting Letter to his Cousin, Mrs. St. John	410
		Slight Allusion in this Letter to his domestic Concerns	410
		His Eagerness in watching the Progress of Events towards the now inevitable Long Parliament	411
		Occasion whereof he most skillfully avails himself in furtherance of his eager Hopes and Wishes	411
		Indames the People everywhere against the greedy Claims of Royalty, and gross Exactions of the Royal Commission	411

A.D.	Page	A.D.	Page
1638.	Completion of the Bedford Level; popular Discontent	1644.	(27th of October.) Serious Fight between the Royalists and Parliamentarians at Dennington
1640.	(November.) Cromwell offers himself as a Candidate for the Representation of Cambridge		Cromwell seeks Counsel and Co-operation from the Genius of the Younger Vane
	Is returned after a formidable Opposition by a Majority of a single Vote		Resolves to venture a decisive Stroke against the Presbyterian Councils and their Favourers in the Parliamentary Army
	(11th of November.) Opening of the Parliament		The first startling Exhibition of the legislative Influence of the Independents
	Arrest of the Earl of Strafford		Eve and Origin of Cromwell's Greatness and Influence as a Politician
	Sir Philip Warwick's Description of Oliver Cromwell at the Beginning of this Parliament		Cowley's "Vision," Extracts from
1642.	Proceedings of the Commons		His Division of the Men whom Cromwell deceived
	Letters of Charles Louis, Prince Elector of the Palatinate, to his Mother the Queen of Bohemia, illustrating the Character and Events of the Time		Sir Harbottle Grimston
	Impoverished State of the Exchequer		Bishop Burnet; his Account of Cromwell's Conduct in the House of Commons
	Reckless Extravagance of the King		Extract from Holli's Memoirs
1643.	Passage from Clarendon referring to the latter part of this Year		Craft and Duplicity of Cromwell
1647.	(12th of November.) Letter of Charles Louis, detailing an Interview with his imprisoned Uncle, Charles I.		His Conversation with Ludlow
	Cold and unfeeling Strain of his Letters within a Month of his Uncle's Execution		He endeavours to accomplish a Reconciliation between the Presbyterians and Independents
	Remonstrance of the Commons		His Character that of a deliberate Usurper
	Commencement of the Civil War		Extract from Ludlow at the time of Cromwell's Return from his Government in Ireland
	Decisive Movements of Cromwell		Enthusiastic Democracy of the Army, and its fiercely Republican Officers
	Organization of his immortal Troop of Ironsides		The Army the first Power of the State
	Excellence of his military Discipline		Major-general Harrison; his Reasons for joining Cromwell
	Sir Philip Warwick; his Account of Cromwell's Regiment of Ironsides		Extract from Bishop Burnet illustrating Cromwell's Character
	Cromwell's last Instruction to this celebrated Regiment		Major Sreater, Colonel Okey
	Their determined Zeal		Cromwell's Letter to the Governor of the Castle of Edinburgh
	Movements of the King's Troops		Style adopted towards Cromwell by indifferent Persons, whom he had obliged, or who hoped for Favours from him
	Sir Bevil Grenville; his Letters to his Wife		Straits to which he was reduced on the Eve of the Battle of Dunbar
	Seizure of Sir Thomas Conisby		His Letter to Fairfax on his recovering from Illness
	First pitched Battle between Charles and his Subjects		His Letter to Lord Wharton
	Cromwell's Letter to the Speaker describing this Battle		His Letter to Mr. Cotton, Pastor at Boston; a striking Illustration of certain eminent Peculiarities which lay at the very Root of the Strength and Weakness of his Character
	Defeat of the Royalists		His Letter to his eldest Daughter, containing several characteristic Points
	Colonel Thornhaugh; Ireton; Beginning of his Intimacy with Cromwell		Extracts from Letters of Harrison and Bradshaw Anecdote of Cromwell related by Whitelocke in his "Memorials"
	Success of the Royal Troops; Rout of the Parliamentarians at Braddock Down		Anecdote of Cromwell related in the Life of Waller
	Siege of Plymouth		General Affairs of his Household; his Strictness in religious Observances
	Battle of Lansdowne		Religion with him rather a Matter of Policy than Persuasion
	The Cause of the Parliament in Danger; fatal Imbecility, and suspected Treachery of Essex; Death of Hampden		Selection of his Chaplains
	Settlement of the Solemn League and Covenant		His remarkable Fondness for Buffoonery
	Jealousies in the King's Troops		Extract from a Loyalist Pamphlet, entitled "The Court and Kitchen of Mrs. Joan Cromwell"
	Battle of Newbury		Anecdotes of Cromwell related in Whitelocke's "Memorials"
	Description of this Battle		General Remarks on his Character and Abilities for Statesmanship
	Lord Falkland slain; his Character		His Want of Truth
	Cromwell in Lincolnshire		Close of the Notices of Cromwell's more familiar Habits
1643.	(9th of October.) Is joined by Fairfax; his extraordinary Influence over his determined Ironsides		(23d of November.) Discontent of the House of Commons with the Affair of Dennington Castle; Cromwell's Speech on this Occasion
	Close of the Campaign		Lord Manchester's Narrative of this Affair, in the House of Lords
	Cromwell appointed Lieutenant-governor of the Isle of Ely; his Exertions in Cambridge		(2d of December.) Measures against Cromwell
	Parliamentary Commission for effecting a Reform in the Universities of Cambridge		(9th of December.) The Project of the Self-denying Ordinance brought forward in the Commons; Cromwell's Speech
1644.	(19th of January.) Commencement of the tremendous Campaign of 1644		Progress of this Measure; its Defeat by the Lords
	Distribution of the Forces of the Parliament and of the King	1645.	A second Measure introduced
	The Royalists defeated at York		(3d of April.) Passed into a Law; Reduction of the Army
	Siege of York; Movements of the Midland and Western Forces		Sir Thomas Fairfax appointed Commander-in-chief
	(4th of June.) The King's Letter to his Nephew, Prince Rupert		(10th of June.) Cromwell appointed a Lieutenant-general of Cavalry
1644.	Admirable military Movements by the King		His Success at Islip Bridge
	The Parliamentarians under Waller defeated on the Banks of the Charwell		Successful Movements of the King
	Quarrel between Prince Rupert and the Marquis of Newcastle		Fixes his Headquarters at Daventry
	(2d of July.) Battle of Marston Moor; Night of the Battle		Movements of Cromwell and Ireton
	Nearly Half of the entire Kingdom now hopelessly lost to Charles I.		(14th of June.) Battle of Naseby
	Cromwell wounded; his Letter to his Brother-in-law after this Victory		Fortune of the Day turned by Cromwell
	Rise of the Independents; their Aversion to Presbyterianism as well as Prelacy		Brilliant and decisive Victory of the Parliamentarians
	Milton's "Areopagitica"
	Condition of the Parliamentary Army and its Chiefs; the King proposes a Negotiation High-minded Policy of the Commons; Manchester and Cromwell, Essex and Waller, march against the King

A.D.	Page	A.D.	Page
1645.	Cromwell's Letter to the Speaker of the House of Commons after this Victory	1650.	Last Extract descriptive of some later Incidents in the Campaign
	Vigilance of Cromwell; Leicester retaken (4th of August.) Defeat of the Club Men; Cromwell's Letter to Fairfax on this Occasion		Cromwell returns to England; appointed Commander-in-chief, and directed to proceed to Scotland to reduce the Rebellion there
	Surrender of Bristol		(23d of July.) Enters Scotland with 11,000 Horse and Foot; his Proclamations and wise Discipline
	Marvellous Escape of Fairfax and Cromwell		David Leslie Commander-in-chief of the Scottish Army
	Surrender and Capitulation of Winchester to Cromwell's victorious Troops		(1st of September.) Cromwell enters Dunbar
	Fall of Basing		(2d of September.) Holds a Council of War; Battle of Dunbar
	(14th of October.) Cromwell's Letter to the Speaker of the House of Commons		(3d of September.) The Parliamentarians gain a decided Victory
	Continued Successes of Fairfax and Cromwell		Cromwell's Despatch written the Day after the Battle
	Flight of the King in Disguise from Oxford		His Letter to Richard Major at Hursley
	Cromwell received in London with extraordinary Honours; enters the House of Commons		Farther Extracts from his private Correspondence
	(1st of December.) The Title and Dignity of Baron of the Kingdom of England conferred on Cromwell		Successes of Cromwell in Glasgow and Edinburgh
1646.	(31st of January.) A Pension of £2500 settled on him by the Commons		Spends the Winter in polemical Discussions and Correspondence with various Ministers
	Negotiations opened with Cromwell by the King; Stipulations of the Treaty		Transports his Army into Fife, and proceeds towards Perth, which he captures after a Siege of two Days
	Rejected by Cromwell		Makes Preparations for the Battle of Worcester
	Extract from the Memoir prefixed to the State Letters of Orery	1651.	Charles II. proclaimed at Worcester
	Cromwell recommends to the People of England such a Government as the Netherlands' States-General		Alarm in London
	Flight of the King to Carisbrooke		(2d of September.) Cromwell's Preparations completed
	Examination of Colonel Robert Hammond at the Bar of the House of Commons		(3d of September.) Battle of Worcester, signal Defeat of the Royalists, and Triumph of Cromwell
	Cromwell's Letters to him in every way characteristic of the Writer		His memorable Letter to the Parliament of England
	Resolution for establishing a Republic in England passed by a Majority of 141 to 92		His Excitement on the Field
	Speeches of Cromwell and Ireton	1652.	State of Parties after the Defeat of Worcester
	Startling Effect of this Measure; Attempt to disband the Army		Sublime Talents and Energy of the Men who were at the Head of Affairs
	Rise of the Agitators		A Majority of the People still strongly attached to the Forms of Monarchical Government
	Conduct of Cromwell illustrated by a Letter addressed to some Officers in the Welsh Counties		The Government of the new Form has now brought to a successful Issue its Struggle for Existence
1648.	Presbyterian Invasion by the Covenanters' Army of the Scots, and regular Commencement of the Second Civil War		Cromwell's Despatches read from the Speaker's Chair to the assembled Commons, and from every Chapel in the vast City to its crowded and excited Congregation
	(17th of August.) Battle of Preston; both Kingdoms thrown into the Hands of the Republicans		Extract from one of his Despatches
	(20th of August.) Cromwell's Letter to the Speaker of the House of Commons; a most striking Despatch of this Battle		Vote of the House at this memorable Crisis
	He marches for Scotland		Four of the first-Members of the Government appointed by the Parliament to meet and congratulate Cromwell at Aylesbury, on his Way to the Capital
	(20th of September.) Issues his Proclamation		His slow and triumphant Progress with his Army towards London
	Is received with Enthusiasm in Edinburgh		Receives the Parliamentary Commissioners at Aylesbury with an Air of Courtesy and Condescension, which had a regal Stamp upon it
	Returns to London; Death of his eldest Son		Enters London in great Solemnity and Triumph, accompanied by the Four Commissioners of Parliament
	His Negotiation with Mr. Major for the Marriage of his Son Richard	1652.	(16th of September.) Resumes his Parliamentary Duties by a Revival of the Debate touching a new Representative
	Extracts from his private Correspondence		(8th of December.) Sudden Death of the gallant and Virtuous Ireton
1649.	(1st of May.) Marriage of his Son Richard to Dorothy Major		(10th of December.) Cromwell summons and holds a Meeting at the Speaker's House of those Friends, military and civil, whom he supposes to be well affected towards his own political Views
	Mighty Events created and controlled by Cromwell in the Interval comprised by these marriage Negotiations		Startling Question which he propounds to them
	Bishop Burnet's Account of the Sequel of this Second Civil War		The Conference opened by the Speaker of the House of Commons
	Anecdote with Reference to a Cousin of Cromwell's		Discussion of the Question, Whether a Republic or a mixed Monarchical Government would be best to be settled
	Execution of the King		Different Opinions on the Subject
	Charles II. proclaimed		Conclusion of the Conference
	(10th of July.) Cromwell appointed Lieutenant-general and General Governor of Ireland		A Bill passed to limit the Duration of the Parliament to the 3d of November, 1654
	His Letter to Mr. Major		Energy and Excitement of both Parties in the House at this memorable Crisis
	(13th of August.) His second Letter, just before his Entrance into Dublin		Discussion of the Question for the Reduction of the Army
	His Letter to his Daughter		(12th of August.) The Question referred to Council of State, to give an Account, with al convenient Speed, of the former Vote respecting the Retrenchment of the Forces
	Farther Extracts from his private Letters from Ireland		Cromwell declares open War upon the Parliament
	His Arrival in Dublin
	Selects Drogheda for his first Object of Attack
	(10th of September.) Sends a Summons to the Governor to surrender, which is rejected
	He effects a Breach, and takes the Town by Storm
	His Despatch, describing the desperate Resistance of the Enemy
	His Progress through Ireland in grim and bloody Triumph Opposition offered by Wexford; another Deluge of Blood
	Rosse surrenders to him after a Siege of three Days
1650.	Extracts from his Despatches during his terrible Irish Government
	Siege and Massacre of Wexford
	Some Glimpses of Cromwell's wiser Policy visible in these Despatches

A.D.		Page	A.D.		Page
1652.	A Council of Officers held at Whitehall . . .	498	1653.	The Spirit of Confusion alone predominant . . .	535
	(13th of August.) A Petition drawn up and presented by them to the Parliament . . .	498		A Parliament called; the Barbone Parliament . . .	536
	Insincerity and Selfishness of the Petition . . .	499		Test to the Members . . .	537
	The Petition referred to a Committee . . .	499		General Characteristics of the great Majority of the Members . . .	538
	Consideration of the Bill for the Dissolution of the Parliament, and the Provision for future Parliaments in Succession . . .	500		Monk selected by Cromwell to supersede Blake in the naval Command . . .	539
	(8th of November.) Conference between Cromwell and Lord-commissioner Whitelocke . . .	500		Antony Ashley Cooper and George Monk . . .	539
	Whitelocke's Account of their private Discourse . . .	500		(4th of July.) Speech of the Protector on the Opening of the Barbone Parliament . . .	539
	Conclusion of their Conference . . .	501		He deprecates the Proceedings of the late Parliament . . .	540
	Cromwell turns back to his Military Council . . .	503	1654.	His elaborate and worthless Attempt to vindicate the Dispersion of the Long Parliament . . .	540
	Contest between the Chiefs of the Commonwealth and their too powerful Servant . . .	504		Effect produced . . .	543
	Grand Position assumed by the Republican Leaders in closing their War with the Dutch . . .	504		Close of his memorable Address . . .	544
	The sacrilegious Purposes of Cromwell suspended for a brief Space . . .	505		His Instrument of Government . . .	544
	The last great Effort of the Dutch to recover the Supremacy of the Sea . . .	505		His Resignation accompanied with all the Forms that could declare it final and irrevocable . . .	545
	Events tend to establish more decisively than ever the internal Power of the Commonwealth . . .	505		Characteristic Incident recorded by Lord Leicester in his Journal . . .	545
	Cromwell and his Officers endeavour to calumniate the Parliament, and pronounce them guilty of those Crimes whereof themselves were faulty . . .	506		Cromwell's favourite Policy, to win open Trust and pay it back with secret Treachery . . .	545
	Proceedings of the Parliament . . .	506		Meeting of the Convention in the Old Parliament House at Westminster; Mr. Francis Rouse elected Speaker . . .	545
	Deceit and Duplicity of Cromwell . . .	506		Cromwell invited to assist in their Deliberations as Member of the House . . .	546
	Sudden Change in the Policy of the Parliament . . .	506		(12th of July.) Proceedings of the Parliament or Convention . . .	546
	Pierce Contempt exhibited by Cromwell for the popular Pretences on which he first rested . . .	507		First Movement in the House against Tithes . . .	547
	Measures adopted by him for establishing the Basis of his Tyranny . . .	508		(20th of July.) Eleven important Questions referred to as many Committees . . .	547
	Designs to prepare the Minds of the common People by the Use of his favourite Engine, Fanaticism . . .	508		Incidents which marked the Interval between the Issue of the Writs and their Meeting in Obedience to them, while the Military Council held supreme Command . . .	547
1653.	(19th of April.) Last Meeting of Cromwell's Council . . .	509		Brief Review of the Dutch War . . .	548
	Proceedings of the Council . . .	509		Naval Victory of Monk; Admiral Dean killed . . .	548
	Measures of the Parliament . . .	510		(22d of June.) Arrival of the Ambassadors from Holland to negotiate for Peace . . .	548
	Cromwell's violent Disputes with the Parliament . . .	510		Cromwell receives the Dutch Delegates with a haughty Pride; refuses their Propositions . . .	549
	Expels the Members by Violence . . .	511		Another naval Victory for England . . .	549
	Becomes virtually Lord of England, and stands with a heavier and more daring Foot upon her Neck than had ever been placed there by any of her Kings . . .	511		Monk issues a memorable and characteristic Order through his Ships . . .	550
	His Reception by the Council of State . . .	512		(31st of July.) Great naval Victory; Van Tromp, the Dutch Admiral, killed . . .	550
	Publishes his Declaration of the "Grounds and Reasons for dissolving the Parliament" . . .	512		Reception of the English Admirals in London . . .	551
	A second and third Declaration published . . .	515		Case of Lilburne . . .	551
	Sympathies divided between the Old and New Parliaments . . .	516		His Reappearance in England; his Arrest . . .	551
	Cromwell's Speech in Explanation of his Conduct . . .	516		Endeavours to obtain a Respite of his Trial till the Meeting of the Convention . . .	552
	Singular and incomprehensible Style of his "Justification" . . .	517		Arraigned at the Sessions on the capital Charge of having violated the Statute of his Banishment . . .	552
	Discontent of the Members at the abrupt Dissolution of the Parliament . . .	520		His Trial and Acquittal . . .	553
	Political Struggles of a great Character for the Future rather than the Present . . .	520		His Trial a striking Characteristic of the Time . . .	553
	State of Parties at this Period . . .	521		Royalist Conspiracy . . .	554
	Fatal and disastrous Effect produced on all by the forcible Dispersion of the Long Parliament . . .	522		Cromwell's Letter to his Son-in-law Fleetwood . . .	554
	Position of the Statesmen after the Action of the 20th of April . . .	523		Whitelocke sent in the Character of Ambassador Extraordinary to the Swedish Queen Christina . . .	554
	Necessity a favourite Plea with the Partisans of Cromwell . . .	523		Proceedings of the Parliament of Saints . . .	555
	Mrs. Hutchinson's Description of the Condition of the Commonwealth on the Eve of its Fall . . .	523		Their War with the Lawyers; Act respecting Marriages . . .	555
	Ludlow's Description of the disinterested and impartial Character of the Long Parliament . . .	523		A Bill introduced for Relief of Creditors and poor Prisoners for Debt . . .	555
	Brief Sketch of the Measures by which the Statesmen of the Long Parliament made themselves so famous . . .	525		Brief Sketch of its Provisions . . .	556
	Financial Proceedings . . .	525		List of the Enactments of general Government and Policy passed by the Convention . . .	556
	System of Sequestration . . .	526		A Bill brought in, read and debated on, for the uniting of Scotland to the Commonwealth of England as a Part of it, with equal Privileges . . .	558
	Various Measures of Law Reform . . .	527		Declaration that the Court of Chancery should be totally taken away and abolished . . .	558
	Abolition of the Court of Wards . . .	527		Question how to dispose of the Causes actually pending in the Court, and to substitute a less objectionable Tribunal in its Place . . .	558
	System of Religious Toleration . . .	528		Second great Vote for a general Revision and new modelling of the whole Body of the Law . . .	559
	A Bill passed with a View to correct certain Extravagances in the Professors of Religion . . .	528		Debates on the Subject . . .	560
	Administrative Genius of the Statesmen of the Commonwealth . . .	529		Third Vote involving the Subject of Presentations to Benefices . . .	561
	List of the Names of the Statesmen of the Commonwealth . . .	532		Third and last Vote involving the much-tried Question of Tithes . . .	561
	State of the Commonwealth at the Time of its Overthrow by the Violence of Cromwell . . .	533		Debate on this Subject . . .	561
	Commencement of the Reign of Saints . . .	533		Disputes in the Parliament . . .	562
	Warlike Construction of the new Council of State . . .	533	1654.	(16th of December.) Cromwell inaugurated Lord-Protector . . .	564
	Movement of the Royalists . . .	534		The Instrument of Government read aloud by one of the Clerks of the Council . . .	565
	Cromwell seeks the Interests and Friendship of Cardinal de Retz . . .	534		Triennial Parliaments established . . .	566
	State of Parties . . .	534		Cromwell's first Act is to revive the Forms of Monarchy . . .	566

A.D.	Page	A.D.	Page
1654.	Completes the Arrangement of his Council, as named in the Instrument of Government . . .	1655.	Discussion of private Bills . . .
	Extravagant Rumours in London . . .		Presbyterian and Sectarian Measures of this Parliament . . .
	Proceedings of the Council . . .		Debate on the Question of the legal Confirmation of the Major-generals . . .
	Commissioners appointed to approve of public Preachers . . .	1657.	Explosion of the Serby and Syndercombe Plot against Cromwell's Life . . .
	Persons who suffered under this Ordinance . . .		(19th of January.) Casual Mention of the Policy of re-establishing the Kingship . . .
	Imprisonment of Feakes and Powell . . .		Debate on the Subject . . .
	Henry Cromwell sent to Ireland . . .		The Crown offered to Cromwell . . .
	Monk's successful Mission to Scotland; the Royalist Movement under Middleton vanquished . . .		His formal Answer . . .
	Conciliatory Measures of Cromwell towards the Presbyterians . . .		A Committee of the House named for Conference, to solve the apparent Doubts of the Protector . . .
	His Measures with Regard to the Royalists . . .		Cromwell proposes to argue the Question on the ground of Expedience . . .
	Conspiracy against his Life; Proclamation of Charles Stuart . . .		Characteristic Passage from the Memoirs of Ludlow . . .
	Trial and Execution of the Conspirators . . .		(12th of May.) Cromwell formally declines accepting the Crown . . .
	Final Settlement of Portuguese Treaty; Trial and Execution of Don Pantaleon Sa, brother to the Portuguese Ambassador . . .		His Speech on this Occasion; his first grand Failure . . .
	Cromwell's manner of receiving the Foreign Ambassadors and Envoys . . .		The Petition and Advice passed without the Title of King . . .
	The Treaty of Peace with the Dutch signed after a ten Months' tedious Negotiation . . .		Cromwell establishes a House of Peers; a new and solemn Inauguration follows; Hollowness of this . . .
	Main provisions of the Treaty . . .		A Glance at his Foreign Administration . . .
	Rejoicings in Celebration of this Peace . . .		His Remonstrance to the Grand Seigneur respecting the unjust Surprisal of an English Ship . . .
	Milton's congratulatory Address to Cromwell . . .		His second Remonstrance addressed to Vizier Azem . . .
	Ratification of the Treaty with Sweden . . .		Marriage of his Daughters, Mary and Frances . . .
	Treaty with Denmark . . .	1658.	(28th of January.) Reassembling of Parliament . . .
	Extracts from the private Correspondence of Cromwell at this Period . . .		Scot and Hazlerig, backed by a formidable Majority, refuse to acknowledge the new House as a House of Lords . . .
	His Visit to the City; is entertained by the Lord-mayor . . .		Speech of the Lord Protector . . .
1655	(4th of September.) Opening of Parliament; Cromwell's Speech . . .		Conspiracies against his Life . . .
	Tokens of Satisfaction, and Hums of Approbation which followed this Speech . . .		Letter of Lady Elizabeth to her Sister-in-law, Mrs. Henry Cromwell . . .
	Angry Debates in the Commons . . .		Execution of Slingsby and Hewet . . .
	Conduct of the Republicans at this Crisis . . .		Domestic Afflictions of Cromwell . . .
	(12th of September.) Cromwell receives the Members in the Painted Chamber at Whitehall . . .		Measures for defeating the Republicans . . .
	His vigorous Speech on this Occasion . . .		(4th of August.) Death of Lady Elizabeth Claypole . . .
	Some of the Members refuse to sign the Recognition of the Government prepared for them . . .		Illness of the Lord Protector . . .
	Accident occurs to Cromwell . . .		(25th of August.) Thurloe's Despatch to Henry Cromwell . . .
	Various Descriptions of this Accident . . .		(3d of September.) Death of the Lord Protector; Thurloe's Despatch to Henry Cromwell, announcing the melancholy Event . . .
	Debates in the Commons, whether the Protectorate was to be Hereditary, or for Life only . . .		Cromwell's FORTUNATE DAY . . .
	The Amendment of the Court Party carried without a Division . . .
	(22d of January.) The House once more summoned to meet Cromwell in the Painted Chamber . . .
	His Speech . . .
	Refers to the Question of the Protectorship being made Hereditary . . .
	Declares the Parliament dissolved . . .
	Royalist and Republican Conspiracies crushed . . .
	Precautionary Measures of Cromwell . . .
	First Part of his great despotic Scheme follows in an Ordinance against the Adherents of the Stuarts . . .
	His Letter to his Son-in-law Fleetwood, recalling him from the Government of Ireland . . .
	His Letter to his Son Henry during his Administration in Ireland . . .
	Major-generals appointed . . .
	Substance of their official Instructions . . .
	Their Powers of Action . . .
	Individual Cases, expressing the general Iniquity of their Proceedings . . .
	State of England at this Period . . .
	Review of the Foreign Policy of the Protectorate . . .
	Example of Cromwell's far-seeing Policy . . .
	His characteristic Letter to Major-general Farnesque . . .
	Negotiation entered into with France . . .
	Projects respecting the Jews . . .
	Treaty with France signed . . .
	War with Spain . . .
	Case of Cony . . .
	Writs issued for a Parliament . . .
	View of the Power and Position of Cromwell at this Period . . .
	Excitement at the Election for the Parliament now summoned exceeds that of any previous Occasion . . .
1656	(17th of December.) The Parliament meet the Protector in the Painted Chamber . . .
	His obscure and artful Speech . . .
	The Title and Claims of Charles Stuart disannulled . . .

APPENDIX.

A. Alexander, Lord-high-steward of Scotland . . .	621
B. Oliver Cromwell . . .	622
C. The Protecting Brewer . . .	622
D. Sir Oliver Cromwell . . .	622
E. Cromwell and Christina . . .	624
White Locke first sees Christina in her magnificent Palace, and is not afraid . . .	625
Christina tells White Locke, at their first private Interview, her Opinion of Cromwell; and inquires if it is really true that he Prays and Preaches . . .	625
Christina, struck by White Locke's Prudence in a long Conference of State, becomes Confidential at its Close . . .	626
White Locke's Device in writing privately to Cromwell; also his Device in delivering Presents from Mr. Hugh Peters to Christina . . .	626
Christina interests herself in the domestic Affairs of Cromwell; prophesieth his Desire to be King, simple Lord-general as he is; and startleth White Locke with some delicate Questions, as also with a Piece of Plain-speaking . . .	626
The wise Oxenstiernie interested in Cromwell . . .	627
News of Cromwell's Usurpation reacheth Stockholm; Christina's Opinion of the Protectorate, and her wise Advice . . .	627
The Swedish Chancellor discusseth Cromwell's Usurpation with White Locke; some Home-truths evaded by the Lawyer-ambassador . . .	627
Christina and her Ladies at White Locke's May-day Entertainment; White Locke standeth up for the Honour of England . . .	628
White Locke danceth with Christina; a curious Remark afterward . . .	628
The Chancellor Oxenstiernie transmitteth Advice to Cromwell by his Ambassador, which the Ambassador forgetteth to deliver . . .	629
A youthful Queen, prosperous as she is beloved,

	Page		Page
crowns tired of State, and resigns her Crown; the Lord-ambassador Whitelocke's Wonderment; he recollects that Cromwell once intended to retire	629	H. Specimens of the Court Circular in Cromwell's Protectorate	635
Whitelocke returned; he recounts to Cromwell, Lord Protector of the Commonwealth, the Adventures of his Embassy to Christina; the Lord Protector's Remarks thereon	630	I. Some Extracts from a Description of Cromwell's Lords	635
F. A new Ballad to the Tune of Cock-Lorrel	632	K. Procession with Ceremony of the Investiture and Installation of his Highness Oliver Cromwell, as by the Parliament appointed to be performed in Westminster Hall on June 26, 1657	638
G. A Sketch of the Civil Wars to the Protectorate of Richard Cromwell, in a Letter from John Maidstone, of Oliver's Household, to John Winthrop, Esq., Governor of the Colony of Connecticut in New-England	632	L. Death, Funeral Order, and Procession of his Highness, the most serene and most illustrious Oliver Cromwell, late Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the Dominions and Territories thereunto belonging	639

C O N T E N T S.

SIR JOHN ELIOT	Page 1
APPENDIX	43
THOMAS WENTWORTH, EARL OF STRAFFORD	55
APPENDIX	132
JOHN PYM	135
APPENDIX A.	234
APPENDIX B.	236
APPENDIX C.	237
APPENDIX D.	238
APPENDIX E.	239
APPENDIX F.	240
JOHN HAMPDEN	241
SIR HENRY VANE THE YOUNGER	265
APPENDIX A.	343
APPENDIX B.	347
APPENDIX C.	351
APPENDIX D.	351
APPENDIX E.	352
HENRY MARTEN	353
OLIVER CROMWELL	392
APPENDIX A.	621
APPENDIX B.	622
APPENDIX C.	622
APPENDIX D.	622
APPENDIX E.	624
APPENDIX F.	632
APPENDIX G.	632
APPENDIX H.	635
APPENDIX I.	635
APPENDIX K.	638
APPENDIX L.	639

J. H. P. H. H. H.

Sir John Eliot.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

THE STATESMEN
OF THE
COMMONWEALTH OF ENGLAND.

SIR JOHN ELIOT.—1590–1632.

JOHN ELIOT was "a Cornishman born, and an esquire's son."* His family, though new residents in that county, were of very ancient Devonshire descent. Prince alludes to them in his "Worthies;" and Fuller has pointed out the name of Walter Eliot, one of his ancestors, in the sheriff's return of the gentry of the county of Devon, made in 1433, during the reign of Henry VI. Browne Willis, who may be considered a good authority on the subject, having married a lineal descendant of the family,† states that this Walter Eliot allied himself to the family of Sir Richard Eliot, appointed a justice of the Court of King's Bench by Henry VIII., but more illustrious as the father of one of the earliest of our vernacular writers, the famous Sir Thomas Eliot.‡ The first of the family who settled in Cornwall appears to have been the great-uncle of Sir John, who obtained from the family of Champernowne the priory of St. Germain's and its lands, in exchange for property possessed by him at Cutlands, near Ashburton.§ To this priory the name of Port Eliot was then given, which it bears to this day. Its large estates have descended with it from father to son, and form a considerable portion of the property of the present Earl of St. Germain's.||

At this seat of Port Eliot John Eliot was born, on the 20th of April, 1590.¶ In his youth he was subjected to none of the restraints that should have been applied to a temper naturally ardent. His father was a man of easy habits, kept very hospitable house,* flung it open to every sort of visiter, and never, it is to be presumed, troubled himself to consider the effect of such a course upon the uncontrolled disposition and manners of his son. It is to this lax education that we have to attribute a painful incident in the life of Eliot, of which the most treacherous advantage has been taken by his political enemies.†

Archdeacon Echard, a notorious advocate of the Stuarts, and a most inaccurate historical writer, gave the first public account of it. After stating, most untruly (as we have seen), that Eliot was of a "new family,"‡ this archdeacon proceeds: "Within his own parish there lived one Mr. John Moyle, a gentleman of very good note and character in his country, who, together with his son, had the honour to serve in Parliament. Whether out of rivalry or otherwise, Mr. Eliot, having, upon a very slight occasion, entertained a bitter grudge against the other, went to his house under the show of a friendly visit, and there treacherously stabbed him, while he was turning on one side to take a glass of wine to drink to him."§ He states farther: "Mr. Moyle outlived this base attempt about forty years, who, with some others of his family, often told the particulars to his grandson, Dr. Prideaux, and other relations, from whom I had this particular account."|| We are here left uncertain, it will be seen, whether the account was received at fifth or sixth hand from gossiping relations, or from the respected and learned Dean of Norwich. A late writer, however, has thought fit to assume the latter, and has insisted, with considerable and very obstinate vehemence, on the probable truth of the statement.¶ With the help of materials in a lately-published work by Lord Nugent,

* Anthony Wood, Ath. Oxon., vol. ii., p. 478, ed. Bliss.

† See Ducarel's "Life of Browne Willis."

‡ Browne Willis's "Notitia Parliamentaria," vol. ii., p. 142.

§ "I do not know," says an accomplished living descendant of the patriot, "the exact year in which this change took place; but John Eliot died at the priory of St. Germain's, having given it the name of Port Eliot, in 1565. An account of that transaction is to be found in Carew's Survey of Cornwall, published about 1580. Chalmers, in his Biographical Dictionary, speaks of the family of Eliot of Port Eliot, and those of Heathfield and Minto, to be descended from a Sir W. Aliot, who came over with William the Conqueror; but this account is merely traditional, and cannot be borne out by proof. The Herald's Visitation of Cornwall, made in 1602, and preserved in the Herald's College, gives the armorial bearings of the family; a shield containing twelve quarters: a proof, at a time when pretensions to heraldic honours were minutely scrutinized, that the origin of the family could not have been very recent."—Lord Eliot.

|| In "Notitia Parliamentaria" (the notice of the borough of St. Germain's, at p. 149, of the second volume), a description will be found of Port Eliot. See also "Carew's Survey of Cornwall," ed. 1602; and the fourth volume of Mr. D'Israeli's "Commentaries on the Life and Reign of Charles I.," p. 509.

¶ Browne Willis. Anthony Wood fixes it incorrectly at 1592.

* See "Carew's Survey of Cornwall."

† How eagerly such a charge as that which follows would have been seized by the bitter opponents of Eliot among his contemporaries, had a reasonable foundation existed for it, is sufficiently obvious. It might have served as the title of an apology for his harsh treatment. Nowhere, however, in Parliament or elsewhere, does a trace of it appear.

‡ Echard's History, p. 424, folio, ed. 1720. Is this the "contemporary writer" to whom Mr. D'Israeli alludes in vol. iv., p. 508, of his Commentaries? I can find no other.

§ Echard's History, p. 424.

|| Ibid.

¶ Mr. D'Israeli. See his Commentaries, vol. ii., p. 270; vol. iv., p. 513; his pamphlet in answer to Lord Nugent's "Memorials of Hampden," p. 5.

 Memorials of Hampden.

and guided by a fact I have discovered respecting Sir John Eliot's father, I now present this singular incident in a new, and, it may be hoped, a final aspect.

It occurred, so far as there is truth in it, in the extreme youth of Eliot. That he should have earned for himself at that time the epithet "wilful" will scarcely appear surprising after what I have said of the habits and indulgences of his father. Mr. Moyle, who resided at Bake, a district of the parish of St. Germain's, close to Port Eliot,* took upon himself to warn old Eliot that such was the disposition of his son. Miss Aikin, the historical writer, has now in her possession a letter, written by an ancestor of one of the most respectable families of Devonshire, wherein the cause and course of the quarrel which ensued are given, as described by the daughter of Mr. Moyle himself, a witness not likely to be unjustly partial to Sir John Eliot.† This is the statement of that letter: Mr. Moyle having acquainted Sir John Eliot's father with some extravagances in his son's expenses, and this being reported with some aggravating circumstances, young Eliot went hastily to Mr. Moyle's house and remonstrated. What words passed she knows not, but Eliot drew his sword and wounded Mr. Moyle in the side. "On reflection," continues Mr. Moyle's daughter, "he soon detested the fact, and from thenceforward became as remarkable for his private deportment, in every view of it, as his public conduct. Mr. Moyle was so entirely reconciled to him that no person in his time held him in higher esteem."

That this hasty ebullition of will occurred in extreme youth I am now prepared to prove. I find, from documents of the time, that Eliot's father died in 1609.‡ He was buried in the Church of St. Germain's on the 24th of June in that year. Anthony Wood (the best authority on such a point, though on such only) tells us that young Eliot entered college in 1607, and continued there three years.§ It is evident, therefore, that, at the time of the quarrel with Moyle, Eliot could not have been more than seventeen, or, assuming (which is most unlikely) that it occurred in a college vacation of his first year, eighteen years old. This will be considered as established beyond farther doubt. It is confirmed still more by a remarkable document which has been found among the Eliot papers,|| "An apologie," addressed to Mr. Moyle by young Eliot, for the "greate injury" he had done him, and witnessed by names, some of which were afterward greatly distinguished in the Parliamentary history of the time. The terms of it are highly curious, and indicate the writer clearly. It is an atonement which marks the characteristic impulse of a young and generous mind, anxious to repair an unpremeditated wrong. "Mr. Moyle," so runs the apology, "I doe acknowledge I have done you a greate injury, which I wish I had never done, and doe desire you to remit it; and I desire that all unkindnesse may be forgiven and forgotten betwixt us, and henceforward I shall desire and deserve your love in all friendly offices, as I hope you will mine."

"JO. ELYOTTE."

That this apology was honestly meant and strictly redeemed—that the writer did desire the love of him whom he had hastily injured, and deserve it, and, moreover, obtain it, we are fortunately not without ample proof. In the volume of Eliot papers already referred to exist two letters,* written, many years after this event, by Sir John to this very Mr. Moyle, granting him solicited favours. It was a saying of shrewd severity, that few natures exist capable of making compensation to those whom they may have injured, or even of ceasing to follow them with resentment. Assuredly, however, rare and virtuous as such natures are, John Eliot's was one of them. He held himself the constant and willing debtor of the man he had unwittingly offended. "I am sorry," he says, in one of his letters, after granting Moyle what he had asked, "this return is not better to the occasion you have given me; it may serve for an expression of my power, though my affection be beyond it. I can command corruption out of no man, but in mine own heart have a clear will to serve you, and shall faithfully remain your true friend." In the other, written some months after, in answer to an intercession by Moyle for an offending tenant of Sir John's, the following passage occurs:—"In answer to your love, I will give orders to my servant Hill, at his return into the country, to repay him the money that's received, and so to leave him to his old interest for the tenement, in which he must acknowledge your courtesy and favour, for whose satisfaction it is done by your most affectionate friend."†

Taken in connexion with the statements I have given, this incident assumes, in my mind, a more than ordinary interest, and becomes, indeed, an important feature in the life of Eliot. It is the line drawn between his passing youth and coming manhood. Whatever may have been the turbulence of his boyhood, whatever the struggle of its uncurbed passions, this event startled him into a perfect and sober self-control. His "private deportment," says Mr.

* Eliot Papers, MS., Nos. 63 and 98.

† Mr. D'Israeli has said, in his fourth volume, p. 513 (in reference to the "apologie" quoted above), "I perfectly agree that this extraordinary apology was not written by a man who had stabbed his companion in the back; nor can I imagine that, after such a revolting incident, any approximation at a renewal of intercourse would have been possible." He then proceeds, with very amusing pertinacity, to shift the grounds of the charge. His argument, however, on his own admission, is wholly exploded by the letters above cited. No malignity, however desperate or reckless, can again revive it. I cannot leave the subject of this first calumny, in the promotion of which Mr. D'Israeli has joined with such painful and mistaken bitterness, without expressing my regret that political passion and preconceived notions of character should so bewilder an ingenious mind. Mr. D'Israeli, though in all cases too fond of suggesting events from rumours, has rendered many services to history, and notwithstanding his various misstatements respecting Eliot, which I shall have occasion to refute, has never scrupled to pay a not unwilling tribute to the greatness of his intellect.

* Notitia Parliamentaria. Browne Willis, the intimate friend of the Moyles, does not make the slightest allusion to this incident, as remembered harshly by that family; a circumstance explained by the testimony which has been since obtained from the daughter of the pretended "victim."

† See Memorials of Hampden, vol. i., p. 152. Aikin's Charles the First, vol. i., p. 265.

‡ Willis's Researches into the Pedigree of the Eliots. Not. Parl., vol. ii., p. 144.

§ Ath. Oxon., vol. ii., p. 478.

|| See Lord Eliot's communication to Mr. D'Israeli, full of excellent feeling, and a proper concern for the memory of his great progenitor, "Commentaries," vol. iv., p. 509.

Moyle's daughter, was as remarkable ever after as that of his public conduct. In the latter his temper never ceased to be ardent for the general good and against the wrongful oppressor. In private it was ardent in kindness, in busy purposes and affections for those around him. To the "last right end," he stood and so his biographer must delineate him, apart from all preconceived affections or prejudices.

"A perfect patriot, and a noble friend,"

Immediately after the quarrel with Mr. Moyle, it is probable that young Eliot left his home for the University of Oxford. Anthony Wood states that he "became a gentleman-commoner of Exeter College in Michaelmas term, anno 1607, aged 15."* The same authority tells us that he left the University, without a degree, after he had continued there about three years.† That his time, however, was not misspent at that venerable seat of study he afterward well proved. He had naturally a fine imagination; and when, on the lapse of a few years, it burst forth in the House of Commons, it was surrounded with the pomp of Greek and Roman learning. In the studies of his youth, in those invaluable treasures of thought and language which are placed within the reach of every scholar, he had strengthened himself for great duties. And more than this. In his youthful contemplation of the ancient school philosophy, he had provided for his later years the enjoyment of those sublime reveries which, we shall have occasion to see, were his chief consolations in a dungeon. Little, probably, did he then imagine, as he was first making the acquaintance of Seneca, of Plato, and the Stagyrite, that they would stand him in the stead of friends, when prison bars had shut out every other.

The sudden interruption to his studies, at the expiration of three years, appears to have originated in his desire to obtain some acquaintance with the common law of England. This knowledge began then to be considered a necessary accomplishment for one who aspired to the honours of Parliament, with the view of supporting the principles of the rising country party. Eliot was one of these; and, as Wood informs us, after leaving the University, "went to one of the inns of court, and became a barrister."‡ The lapse of a year or two introduces us to a new incident in his private life, of which a malignant advantage has, as usual, been taken by his political opponents.

His disposition, never less active than meditative, induced him to visit the Continent. At precisely the same period, the discerning Lady Villiers§ had sent her famous son to grace the beauty of his face and the handsomeness of his person (his only birthright) by the advantages of foreign travel. Eliot and Villiers met; and the courtesies of English travellers in a foreign country ensued between them.* They journeyed together; and it is not surprising that a generous warmth in the disposition of Eliot should have suited well with the bold address and sprightliness of temper for which alone, at that time, George Villiers was remarkable. It is said they became intimate. In all probability they did so; if we may judge from a circumstance that shall in due course be noticed.

Meanwhile, I have another misrepresentation to clear away. After his return from the Continent, Eliot married. It has been reserved for the writer before referred to—Mr. D'Israeli, whose ingenuity of research and pleasant attractiveness of style are only outstripped by his violent political tendencies and his most amusing professions of philosophical impartiality—to fasten upon even this domestic and most private incident in the life of Eliot, as another instance of what he is pleased to consider the turbulence and "ungovernable passion" of his "bold and adventurous character."† Without quoting any authority, Mr. D'Israeli states, that "when the House of Commons voted £5000 for a compensation to the family for his [Eliot's] 'sufferings,' they also voted another £2000, part of four, for which he had been fined by the Court of Wards, by reason of his marriage with Sir Daniel Norton's daughter." He then goes on to state that this indicates the violent carrying off of the lady by the turbulent Eliot. What possible authority Mr. D'Israeli can bring forward for this statement I know not. The only record in existence bearing on such a subject, so far as I am aware, is an entry in the Earl of Leicester's journal, of unquestioned authenticity and correctness. It is most satisfactory on the point, as will be seen; and I will not suppose that this was the source from which Mr. D'Israeli derived his statement. It is as follows: "Monday, 18th January, 1646. The House of Commons this day, according to former order, took into consideration the great losses and sufferings of many members, in the year tertio Caroli, for speaking (in Parliament) in behalf of the kingdom. A report whereof was made to the House, from the committee to whom it was formerly referred; and the Commons, upon debate, passed several votes for allowances to be given to such members, in recompense of their wrongs and sufferings, as followeth." Several names are then specified, and among them, "that £5000 be allowed to Sir John Eliotte's younger children, and his elder son's fine in the Court of Wards to be remitted."‡

* Ath. Oxon., vol. ii., p. 478. This is incorrect, however, as I have stated, in respect to Eliot's age. He was seventeen. † Ath. Oxon., vol. ii., p. 478. ‡ Ibid.

§ Buckingham was a younger son, by a second marriage, of Sir George Villiers, of Brookesley, in Leicestershire, whose family, though ancient, had hitherto been unheard of in the kingdom. His mother is reported to have served in his father's kitchen, but he, being struck with her extraordinary beauty and person, which the meanness of her clothes could not hide, prevailed with Lady Villiers, not without difficulty, to raise her to a higher office; and on the death of that lady he married this her servant. As, however, the heir by a former marriage succeeded to the family estate, it became a grand object with Lady Villiers, who had obtained the means through a second husband, whom she afterward deserted, to accomplish her children for pushing their own fortune in the world. Hence her conduct to George, as I have noticed it above. See R. Coke, p. 74. Hacket's Life of Williams, part i., p. 171. Brodie's British Empire, vol. ii., p. 12. 13.

* Echard's History, p. 424. Mr. D'Israeli claims the merit of having discovered this (vol. iv., p. 507; pamphlet, p. 3), a claim on which his friends also insist (see Quarterly Review, No. xciv., p. 470), on what authority does not appear. Echard was the first discoverer, if there be any merit in it; nor would his statement have carried any weight, but that other circumstances have tended to confirm it.

† See Mr. D'Israeli's Commentaries, vol. ii., p. 283.

‡ Sidney Papers, p. 2, 3. This early portion of the journal is especially remarkable for its accuracy and precision. All of it was written for the author's private use.

This "elder son," against whose turbulence the reproof of Mr. D'Israeli ought to have been directed, was a youth of idle and riotous habits, very wild irregularities, which subsequently, as we shall show, proved a source of much anxiety and disquiet to his father. He was the exact person for the adventure maliciously fixed upon Sir Sohn. The latter married without violating the laws of any court, but was deprived of his wife by death, after she had presented him with two sons.* The "younger children" alluded to in the passage quoted would seem to comprise the family of the second son.

Eliot's intercourse with Villiers was now resumed. A wonderful change had taken place in the interval. The base creature Somerset had been prosecuted at last, ostensibly for the murder of Overbury,† but in reality to provide room for a fourth favourite, on whom the majesty of the day might lavish its shameless fondness. That new favourite was selected in the person of George Villiers. Well might Lord Clarendon exclaim, "Never any man, in any age, nor, I believe, in any country or nation, rose in so short a time to so much greatness of honour, fame, or fortune, upon no other advantage or recommendation than of the beauty or gracefulness of his person."‡ Among the successive honours showered in ridiculous abundance upon him, fell that of Lord-high-admiral of England. With this office was connected the duty of appointing vice-admirals in the several counties; and it is probable that, personal motives of acquaintance, or even friendship, quite apart, the name of Eliot was instantly suggested to the young favourite as one that claimed, on every ground, a promotion of this sort. He possessed one of the largest paternal estates of any gentleman of the time, and had the command of much influence in his own and the neighbouring county. Accordingly, we find that the lapse of a short time after that which saw Villiers promoted to the office of lord-high-admiral saw Eliot made Vice-admiral of Devonshire. He was also appointed chairman of the Committee of Stannaries—of the duties of which office he has left a manuscript report—and, at the same time, he received knighthood.

In accordance with the desperate and unwearied spirit of misrepresentation I have already had so many occasions to allude to, the political enemies of this illustrious person have seized on this change in his estate to attribute it to those vile and vulgar motives which alone they would seem to be acquainted with. Echard leads the way, connecting it, most unfortunately for his purpose, with the incident of Moyle.§ After giving the false account, formerly quoted, of that youthful anecdote, the archdeacon proceeds: "And now, supposing he had perfected his revenge, he immediately hastened to London to address himself to his sure friend the Duke of Buckingham, in order to get his pardon, which, to his great disappointment, he could not obtain without advancing a considerable sum of money into the exchequer. But as soon as his pardon was sealed and the money paid, he received intelligence that Mr. Moyle was unexpectedly recovered. Upon the happy assurance of this, he again applied himself to the duke to procure the repayment of the money; but that being swallowed up in the occasions of the court beyond any recovery, all that he could obtain in lieu of it was to be knighted; which, though it might have allayed the heat of his ambition, was so heinously taken at the hands of a person once his equal, that after that he never ceased to be his mortal enemy, but helped to blow up such a flame in the House as was never extinguished." This monstrous account, which I have extracted partly for the amusement of the reader, has found its believers in the present day.* It is idle to waste words on its refutation. At the period when, it is thus hardly asserted, the assassin Eliot hurried up to his friend the duke to crave protection from the laws he had outraged, that "assassin" was but a boy, and the "duke" plain George Villiers, with less power than his pretended suppliant.

But the inconsistencies of the candid "historians" and "commentators" do not end here. Mr. D'Israeli, who adopts the ridiculously false statement just quoted, has attempted to corroborate it by the production of a letter written in the year 1623 to the duke.† That is to say, he adopts the statement that Sir John repaid the protection and the knighthood given him by the duke with immediate and violent hostility; and proposes to corroborate that by producing a letter, written in courteous and deferential terms, by Sir John to the duke, some considerable time after the period of the knighthood. The gross folly of this is apparent. I pass that, however, to consider the letter, and the position attempted to be established by its means, namely, "that in 1623 we find Sir John a suppliant to, and, at least, a complimentary admirer of, the minister, and only two years after, in 1625, Eliot made his first personal attack on that minister, his late patron and friend, whom he then selected as a victim of state."‡

With respect to the first part of this charge, the answer is short and obvious. The letter is not written in Sir John's personal character, but as Vice-admiral of Devonshire to the Lord-high-admiral of England. This is admitted even, in another place, by the author of the charge himself.§ The office of vice-admiral had proved extremely troublesome to Sir John, involving him in many disputes concerning the wrecks on the coast, and saddling him with the expenses of various trials.|| Rather than submit to these, it would appear that, in one instance, Eliot preferred to subject himself to the inconveniences of arrest. Under such circumstances, it was most natural that he should seek some reparation for the injuries he had undergone in support of the office and rights of the

* This is evident from the Eliot Papers, MS.

† I avail myself of the opportunity which the mention of this name affords me to remind the reader that Sir Thomas Overbury, scarcely remembered but for his misfortunes, is deserving of a better and more grateful remembrance. He was an accomplished scholar, and adorned literature by many delicate writings. Some passages in the "Witty Characters" appended to his poem of "The Wife," are quite unequalled for simplicity and gentleness.

‡ History of the Rebellion, folio ed., vol. i., p. 9.

§ Echard's History, p. 424.

* See Mr. D'Israeli's Commentaries, vol. ii., p. 270; a passage which has not yet been retracted.

† Commentaries, vol. ii., p. 270.

‡ Pamphlet, p. 6.

§ Commentaries, vol. ii., p. 270.

|| See Commons' Journals, 27th of February, 1623; and again, 2d of March in the same year.

Duke of Buckingham. For this purpose the letter in question was written; its tone is ex-postulatory, and, courteous as its terms are, it is even deficient in those elaborately complimentary phrases which were considered due, in that age, to the ceremonious observances of letter-writing. It is as follows:

"Right Honourable—With what affection I have served your grace, I desire rather it should be read in my actions than my words, which made me sparing, in my last relation, to touch those difficulties wherewith my letters have been checkt, that they might the more fully speak themselves. I shall not seek to gloss them now, but, as they have been, leave them to your grace's acceptance, which I presume so noble, that scandal or detraction cannot decline it. It were an injury of your worth, which I dare not attempt, to insinuate the opinion of any merit by false colours or pretences, or with hard circumstances to endear my labours, and might beget suspicion sooner than assurance in your credit, which I may not hazard. My innocence, I hope, needs not these; nor would I shadow the least error under your protection. But when my services have been faithful, and not altogether vain, directed truly to the honour and benefit of YOUR PLACE, only suffering upon the disadvantage of your absence, I must importune your grace to support my weakness, that it may cause no prejudice of your rights and liberties, which I have studied to preserve, though with the loss of mine own. My insistence therein hath exposed me to a long imprisonment and great charge, which still increaseth, and threatens the ruin of my poor fortunes, if they be not speedily prevented; for which, as my endeavours have been wholly yours, I most humbly crave your grace's favour both to myself and them, in which I am devoted. Your grace's thrice humble servant,
J. ELIOT."

"Novemb. 8, 1623."*

Now, not a single expression in this letter is inconsistent with the construction which I have placed on it, or justly appropriate to any other construction. The complimentary phrases fall evidently short of the notorious custom of the time. I am, indeed, surprised at the bareness of the language, considering the year in which it was written. Buckingham had just then managed to conciliate the country party,† and was bespattered with praise in all directions. The people, freed from the political panic that had been caused by the prospect of the Spanish match, in the suddenness of the escape showered applauses on the masked duke; and Sir Edward Coke, leading the opposition in the House of Commons, was betrayed shortly after into the very professional hyperbole of calling him the "saviour of his country."‡ Had the terms of Eliot's letter, therefore, been most adulatory, there would have existed little cause for wonder; we see that they are not so. Whether the letter was answered or not appears uncertain; but the acquaintance of the parties did not cease here, as I shall have occasion to indicate hereafter.* One word more on this subject. Mr. D'Israeli, alluding to the date of this letter, calls it "the close of 1623,"† which would intimate that Parliament had already commenced its sitting, and then goes on to tell his readers that the patriotism of Eliot was a "political revolution, which did not happen till two years after he had been a suppliant to this very minister."‡ This is most untrue. The letter was written in the eighth month of 1623 (old style), two months before the assembling of Parliament; and in that Parliament the voice of Eliot was heard in stirring accents of honest patriotism. Though none of his speeches at this period have been preserved in the Parliamentary histories, I am prepared to prove, from the journals of the House of Commons, and from manuscript records, that no "political revolution" ever occurred in his life; that he was consistent from the first; that his eloquence was often exerted in that last assembly of James's reign, and never but in support of the great party for whose rights and privileges he afterward suffered death.

A few words may here be allowed to me, on the aspect of public affairs at the meeting of this Parliament, which introduced Eliot to public life.§ I shall always avoid, in these biographies, matters of general history or character, except so far as may be needed in illustration of individual conduct, or of those particular questions which called forth its distinctive energies; that individual conduct shall also be limited, as much as possible, to the subject of each life. Thus, in the present instance, I have nothing to do with the great men who laboured in the same cause with Eliot, except as their general policy and characteristics illustrate his exertions. I have nothing to do with the great questions they agitated, except in so far as they called forth his individual energies: what remains will be noticed in other biographies; nor shall I seek in vain the opportunity of observing upon any great incident of this great era of statesmanship. The first object will in all cases be to carry light and life into general history by particular details of character.

The ignominious defeat of the elector palatine by Spinola, and the circumstances which ought especially to have induced James to render assistance to his weak, but unfortunate son-in-law, belong to history.¶ In not doing so, he

* At the duke's death a suit pended between them, and accounts still unsettled. Eliot MSS.

† Commentaries, vol. ii., p. 272.

‡ Ibid., vol. ii., p. 227.

§ For a sketch of the preceding Parliaments, see the biography of Strafford.

¶ See the various histories. Dr. Lingard has treated the subject very fully. See, also, some able reasoning on the general question in Holingbroke's Remarks, p. 285-306, 8vo edit. Mr. Brodie has stated the demerits of James's conduct with appropriate bitterness. There are, also, some very important communications relative to this in Lord Hardwicke's State Papers; in the second volume of Somers's Tracts, by Scott; and in Howell's Familiar Letters. See Rushworth, vol. i., p. 76-113; Hackett's Life of Williams; Heylin's Life of Laud; and Sanderson's James I. Mr. D'Israeli's "Secret History of the Spanish Match" is very pleasant and ingenious. See, also, Roger Coke's "Detection," a very honest book, if we set aside its plagiarisms.

* Cabala, ed. 1663, p. 412, 413. The italics are my own. They show the independence of spirit which breaks through even this official complaining.

† In the same volume of letters—the "Cabala"—p. 340, is a letter to the duke from a staunch and unslandered patriot, Sir Robert Philips, on which a precisely similar charge to this we are now discussing might be as easily founded. Had Mr. D'Israeli overlooked this? He admits Philip to have been emphatically an independent country gentleman.

‡ Clarendon, Hist., vol. i., p. 7.

subjected himself to the derision of Europe,* and to the self-reproach (if he were able to have felt it) of having sacrificed the noblest opportunity of making himself popular in his own nation, and honoured everywhere as the asserter of civil and religious liberty. But he was bound in the fetters of Spain, and had set his foolish heart on a match for the prince with the infanta. This was a politic bait thrown out by that wily country, and greedily seized by the king. It was intended as a means of dragging the pusillanimous James into the league with the house of Austria for oppressing the Protestants and invading the liberties of Germany. It succeeded. The people of England saw their brother Protestants abroad hunted down by tyrants; they saw the Evangelical League broken and discomfited by the Roman Catholic Union; themselves made parties to the wrong which they abhorred, and enemies to that holy cause of freedom and of conscience on which, at home, they had staked all. Discontent rose to a frightful pitch, and the person of the king was even threatened.† At this moment the tide of affairs was suddenly turned, and the man who had resisted the outcries of an insulted nation yielded to the peevish complaints of a haughty and offended minion.

Jealousy of Bristol's negotiations had resolved Buckingham to carry the prince to Spain; jealousy of the wily Archbishop Williams now induced him to wish for home. Moreover, he had been neglected in that stately country, not to say insulted, for his levity and profligate bearing. A deadly jealousy had also risen between him and the Spanish minister, Olivarez; and he began to feel that, in proportion as the edifice of his power was lofty, it was unstable. He saw an expedient for securing it on a wider and more solid basis, and straightway seized it. He effected a rupture, and hurried the prince home, whither the welcome news of this new policy had travelled before, securing them an enthusiastic welcome. The unaccustomed acclamations wafted a new sense into the all-grasping soul of Buckingham; and, resolving to try the game of patriotism, he forced the king to summon a Parliament. He threw himself into the arms of the (deceived) popular party, and drove the unhappy James from his boasted "kingcraft" into a declaration of war against Spain.‡

The Parliament assembled with hopes never before entertained. The dissolution of the Spanish treaty was justly considered a great national deliverance; and the favourite of James, who had disrobed him of his inglorious mantle of peace, was now the favourite of the nation. At this extraordinary juncture Eliot took his seat in the House of Commons. It has been asserted, by Wood* and others, that he sat in the previous Parliament; but this is certainly a mistake. He was returned now for the first time, with Mr. Richard Estcourt, for the borough of Newport in Cornwall.

And now, from the first moment of his public life, his patriotism began—not from pique, or a spirit of opposition, for as yet he had no opponents save those of his religion and his country; for he it ever remembered that in that day politics were necessarily and intimately connected with religious doctrine. The Romish cause was the cause of the oppressor, while the Protestant was that of the oppressed; and the English constitutional party saw no chance for good government save in a root-and-branch opposition to the Roman Catholic faith. Their cause of freedom at home was weakened by the success of popish tyranny abroad; and the great struggle going on between the Protestant patriots of Bohemia and the various Roman Catholic powers leagued in extensive confederacy against them seemed a not improbable shadowing forth of the future destiny of the popular party in England. So thought the leaders of this Parliament, "the greatest and the knowingest auditory," as a political adversary called them, "that this kingdom, or, perhaps, the world, afforded;"‡ and so they acted, confirming that great reputation.

Eliot at once distinguished himself, and was received as a leader of the country party. I have been at some pains to trace his conduct through this Parliament, for it has not been mentioned by any historian, while advantage has been taken of the silence to bear out the assertion of his having been, at this period, a mere undistinguished subserver to the Duke of Buckingham. We shall see how far this is just.

The Parliament met on the 12th of February, 1623. It was adjourned, however, until the 19th, when the speech was delivered, and the House farther adjourned until the 23d. The three following days were occupied in arranging conferences with the lords respecting the duke's intended "Narrative." On the 27th Eliot arose. It was the earliest day of the session, and it was his first appearance in the House. He declared at once the cause he had entered to sustain; and putting aside, as subordinate, even the all-engrossing question of the war, raised his voice for certain ancient privileges of the nation.† On the 1st of March he spoke on the question of the Spanish treaties in the high strain of popular feeling. He alluded to war as that "which alone will secure and repair us," and recommended the setting out of a fleet "by those penalties the papists and recusants have already incurred"‡—means which would have been especially odious to

* From a curious volume, entitled "Truth brought to Light," we learn that in Flanders they presented in their comedies messengers bringing news that England was ready to send a hundred thousand ambassadors to the assistance of the palatinate. "And they pictured the king in one place with a scabbard without a sword; in another place, with a sword that nobody could draw, though divers persons stood pulling at it. In Brussels they painted him with his pockets hanging out, and never a penny in them, and his purse turned upside down. In Antwerp they pictured the Queen of Bohemia like a poor Irish mantler, with her hair hanging about her ears, and her child at her back, with the king, her father, carrying the cradle after her."—Truth brought to Light. Introduction.

† See a curious tract, "Tom Tell Truth," in the second volume of Somers's Collection.

‡ The keenest dissection, and as it appears to me, of the conduct of Buckingham and the prince, throughout the whole of this Spanish affair, will be found in a work very recently published in the present series—History of England, vol. iv., continued from Sir James Mackintosh.

* Wood is seldom to be relied on in any date except those which are furnished by the Oxford books: Lord Nugent has inaccurately adopted his statement that Eliot sat in the Parliament of 1621.

† Hacket's Life of Williams, p. 179.

‡ Commons's Journals, Feb. 27, 1623.

§ Journals of that date.

the court. But Eliot never waited to trim his propositions by the court fashion, even in its popular days, and we never discern in him the bated breath or the whispering humbleness. On that occasion, also, he seems to have resented the long and vacillating negotiations of the king and his secretaries. "Fitter for us to do than to speak," he said, and most justly said, at that crisis. On the 8th of the same month he opposed a hasty decision with respect to the king's answer at Theobald's.* It was not satisfactory, owing to the immediateness of its demand for supplies. He had been appointed one of the deputation; and, alluding to "many strange reports" since their return, he moves "to have some time each to take copies, and then to deliberate and advise."† This he carried. On the 11th he went up to the Lords on this same subject, with some of the great leaders of the House—Philips, Selden, Coke, Rudyard, Saville, Stroude—"to confer with them about his majesty's estate."‡ This conference elicited an assurance from the treasurer, the following day, of "his majesty's resolution to call Parliament oft, to make good laws, and redress public grievances." From this may be well inferred the nature of the previous day's remonstrance from Eliot and his friends. Nor did this plausible assurance put those faithful men off their guard. They answered the treasurer, "that we had no doubt here yesterday, as among the lords. We fittest to relieve the king's particular wants, when we have enabled the subjects to do it by removing their grievances."§ An explanation of the disputed passages in the answer was subsequently given, such as satisfied the House.

In the same spirit were all Eliot's speeches in the matter of this Spanish war. He never supported it but for the promotion of the popular cause, and always accompanied his approbation of the measure with an avowal of those greater ulterior objects which he felt it ought to accomplish. I need not go through the numerous minutes of the journals in which his name appears at this time. His attention to the business of debate, as to the committees, must have been most arduous, since it was unremitting. Besides the great number of private bills in the management of which his name appears, he took part in all public questions, lent his aid to the best legal reforms, and generally formed one in the more learned committees appointed to consider disputed questions on the privileges of the universities.|| He opposed always with watchful jealousy any attempt to move from the constitutional usages of the House; and when the ministers proposed, through Sir Guy Palmer, to have a committee to draw a bill for the continuance of all bills the next session in statu quo, that they might so "husband time," the name of Eliot was found successfully opposed to this, in connexion with his friends, Philips, Coke, and Digges.¶ He was unceasing in his exertions against monopolies,* and in reminding the House of the petitions—those "stinging petitions," as the king used bitterly to call them—"not to be forgotten against recusants;"† but, when duty to the cause permitted it, he never pressed the letter of offence against any offender. Humanity came in rescue of the strictness of his judgments. When some of the popular party pushed hard against the under-sheriff of Cambridge, for a misdemeanor at the election, Eliot humanely interceded. He suggested that the custody the sheriff had already undergone, and the expenses he had been put to, were surely sufficient punishment, and recommended his immediate dismissal. The ever true and able Sir Robert Philips seconded the suggestion. In no single respect can the enemies of Eliot taunt him with his conduct in this session; nor will they dare hereafter to use their equally dangerous weapon, the imputation of his silence, to prove that his patriotism was sluggish or inactive, or moving only at the will of others.

After the most anxious search, I can find no allusion from Eliot respecting Buckingham which indicates a feeling of any sort. His silence on this head is indeed remarkable, as the lauded name of the duke was then most frequently on the lips of other popular members; and yet, that it did not proceed from any vindictive feeling at an abrupt cessation of intercourse, I think I am enabled to prove. From a minute of the journals of the House, it appears that, on one of the debates respecting the Spanish treaties, some private letters of the Duke of Buckingham were referred to, whereupon Eliot stated that he had that morning seen those letters. This is specially entered in the journals.‡ No other member makes the remotest allusion to having seen them. This appears to me to offer a fair presumption that Eliot still continued to meet Buckingham in private intercourse. If this is admitted, then the amiable theory of those writers who have concluded that the letter to the duke, previously quoted, was the last of a series of unanswered applications, and that, from the time of its date, a vindictive feeling had been awakened in the breast of the offended writer—that Eliot's patriotism, in fact, was altogether a personal pique at Buckingham§—has received another blow, prostrate as it was before.

And another, should any one chance to think another necessary, remains to be inflicted. In this Parliament a question arose, on which I have discovered the note of a speech by Eliot, which could never have been delivered by him if his character had not rested clearly free from all imputations of personal dependance or political subserviency. It occurred in a debate "at the close of 1623," the very period fixed by our modern commentators from which to

* See the Answer, Parl. Hist., vol. vi., p. 92, edit. 1763.

† Commons' Journals, March 8, 1623.

‡ Ibid., March 11, 1623.

§ Ibid., March 12, 1623.

|| Ibid., passim. He was also very active in endeavouring to set the grants of crown lands on a better footing. Many instances will be found of his exertions in respect to the universities; as in the case of the Wadham and Magdalen Colleges; and he is often associated with Coke, Philips, and Gyles, in the forwarding of Cornish private bills.

¶ Commons' Journals, April 29, 1624.

* Commons' Journals, April 7, 1624.

† Ibid., April 8, 1624.

‡ Commons' Journals, April 1, 1624. In no other place do I find the smallest allusion to Buckingham, not even at the close of the Spanish business, when thanks were moved by Eliot to "the prince, the king, and to God" for the result of the deliberations. Commons' Journals, April 24, 1624.

§ Mr. D'Israeli (passim); whose suggestions on this subject have been lately adopted by a distinguished writer.—See Quarterly Review, No. 94, p. 471.

date their obstinate accusations. At that period several committees were sitting on the various courts of justice to investigate complaints against their mal-administration. Among many petitions presented to the House in consequence of these committees, was one from the wife of a person named Grys, complaining of wrongs she had suffered from the court of chancery, and appealing against the long delays of that court. To this petition Sir Edward Coke objected. The lawyer stood in the way of the redresser of grievances. He told the House that the woman was half distracted; that the wrong she complained of occurred in "Egerton's time;" that he was now gone; and that it was a most unusual thing to complain against the dead. After some discussion, it was at last resolved that the grievance in question, with others, should be argued by counsel before a sub-committee. This sub-committee was then about to be chosen, when Sir John Eliot rose. He spoke, as was his custom ever, in concern for the wrongs of the oppressed. He warned the House to be careful in their choice, for he knew of what vast importance it was that the "cries of the vexed subject" should be heard by unbiased men. He implored them to "have a special care" that its members should "have no dependance upon men in place;" he suggested that it would be better to have no lawyers upon it; that it were more just to "have countrymen that have no dependance."* There are few who will disagree with me in thinking that these are not the words of a follower of Buckingham. That they should have been spoken by one who laboured under the very odium of what he so earnestly condemned is, to a monstrous degree, improbable. Not on that occasion, nor on any other, did his opponents in the House dare to hint such a charge. I find the patriotic old lawyer replying to this earnest appeal, with a statement of "great inconveniences in having such a sub-committee;" and an entreaty to "have it well considered of;" but not a word of reproach on the motives of Eliot.

It is necessary that I should now advert to the terms on which Eliot and his friends in this Parliament consented to furnish supplies for the Spanish war. On the gross abuse of these supplies their subsequent bitter opposition was most justly founded.

Their earnest desire to see James's mean subserviency to Spain at once destroyed, never for an instant blinded them to the serious consequence of pressing the people by heavy subsidies. Nine hundred thousand pounds had been demanded. They granted three hundred thousand; promising more if, in the right prosecution of the contest, more should become necessary. Over and over again they distinctly stated that the country was not in a condition to hazard a general war; and, by many sharp stipulations, they restricted hostilities to one object, specific and defined. They seem, indeed, to have had some reason, before the final arrangement, to suspect the gross duplicity† which had been practised on them by Buckingham, and to have resolved to defend their own policy at all events. They declared that their object, in so earnestly promoting war, was the recovery of the Palatinate, and that alone: that hostilities with Spain, therefore, were to be entered into only in so far as that branch of the house of Austria was expected to assist the others in retaining the territory of the elector palatine. Nothing could be more distinct than their stipulations on this point. They were recognised before the death of James. No war with Spain was proclaimed, though correspondence with its court was broken; and when Mansfield received his commission, with twelve regiments, for the service of the Palatinate, he was required "not to make any invasion, or do any act of war against the country or dominion" of the King of Spain.* How far this first condition was preserved, we shall shortly have occasion to see. Another condition there was, proposed by the king himself, that, in order to ensure the application of the grant to the purposes sought to be attained, it should be paid into the hands of commissioners, appointed by the House, who should expend the money upon that business alone for which it was granted.† The rupture of peace was no headlong enterprise, plunged into by the parliamentary leaders, without regard to the issue, or the means of its attainment.‡

Meanwhile, during these negotiations, no popular grievance was lost sight of. Up to this period, a couplet familiar in the common mouth had embodied the history of parliaments:

"Many faults complained of, few things mended,
A subsidy granted, the Parliament ended."

With the exception of the subsidy bill of 1621, no bill had been allowed to pass for the space of thirteen years. Legislation was now at last resumed. Measures were passed to reform many grievances in the law, and in prevention of vexatious prosecutions. "Their long counsels, which had been weather-bound, came to a quiet road, and their vessel was lighted of statutes which are of immortal memory."§ The greatest of all these was that which abolished monopolies for the sale of merchandise, or for using any trade. It was nobly drawn up by Coke, Eliot, Philips, and other members, as a

* Rushworth, vol. i., p. 153, 154.

† Hume calls this "unprecedented in an English monarch." (Vol. v., p. 95.) But though the practice had certainly then become unusual, it was common at a former period of English history.—See Brodie's Hist. of British Empire, vol. ii., p. 39. That the king proposed this, however, under compulsion by his new tyrant Buckingham, and as a mere trick to deceive the Commons, was soon evident. To the astonishment of all, on accepting the subsidies, he used this language: "I desire you to understand that I must have a faithful secret council of war, which must not be ordered by a multitude, for so my designs may be discovered before hand. One penny of this money shall not be bestowed but in sight of your committees; but whether I shall send £2000 or £10,000, whether by sea or by land, east or west, by diversion or otherwise, by invasion upon the Bavarian or the emperor, you must leave that to your king." An ingenious method of rendering the check he had before submitted to, for the purpose of procuring a liberal grant, void and effectless.

‡ Commons' Journals, and Parl. Hist., passim.

§ Hackett's Scrinia Reserata (Life of Williams), part i., p. 200. He goes on, in his fashion, to say, "The voices all went one way, as a field of wheat is bended that's blown with a gentle gale, one and all;" which proves that quaint old gentlemen to have been a reader of Beaumont and Fletcher—

* * * "And the people,
Against their nature, are all bent for him,
And like a field of standing corn, that's moved
With a stiff gale, their heads bow all one way."

Philaster.

* Commons' Journals, March 17, 1623.

† This will be alluded to shortly.

mere declaratory statute, reciting that such monopolies were already contrary to the ancient and fundamental laws of the realm. "It was there supposed," says Hume, "that every subject of England had entire power to dispose of his own actions, provided he did no injury to any of his fellow-subjects; and that no prerogative of the king, no power of any magistrate, nothing but the authority alone of laws, could restrain that unlimited freedom."* Following upon this measure, and of an importance no less great, came the impeachment of the Lord-treasurer Middlesex. For two centuries—with the single exception of the case of Bacon, too feeble to fix, with any certainty, the precedent—that grand constitutional right had lain dormant. It was now asserted with eagerness by the Commons, and promoted hotly by Buckingham, who had long hated the growing independence of the power of Middlesex, and as his caprice had raised him from obscurity, now turned to hunt him to disgrace. In vain the shrewdness of James remonstrated—"By God, Stenny, you are a fool, and will shortly repent this folly; and will find that, in this fit of popularity, you are making a rod with which your own breech will be scourged." In vain he turned to the prince, and, with a bitterness of prophecy, like that of Bacon to Middlesex ("Remember that a Parliament will come!"), told him that he would live "to have his belly full of parliamentary impeachments."† The Commons were suffered to proceed. They proved the guilt of the lord-treasurer;‡ and rescued from the disuse of centuries, and beyond the chance of recall, a vital parliamentary right against future ministers of the crown.

James never forgave this. Hacket tells us that, in reference to the matter, "he was quipped every day with ignominious taunts, that the kind correspondences between him and the Parliament began to have a cloud over them."§ There were other causes besides this. Farther grievances remained to be discussed, and the House had entered upon them with unwearying zeal. The king then gave them to understand that, though they were to apply redress to some known grievances, they were not to go on seeking after more; and shortly afterward, in discontent, prorogued them.|| He had failed in the object of his concessions. He fancied they would have put him in possession of more money and more power. "He let fall some flowers of his crown," says the quaint Hacket, "that they might gather them up; which, indeed, was no more than defurium pennarum, the moulting of some feathers, after which the eagle would fly the better."* Much to the astonishment and disgust of the eagle in question, however, measures which had for their object the clipping of his wings, the effectual marring of his royal flights, had appeared to be ripening daily. Under these circumstances, on the 29th of October, 1624, the day to which the Parliament had been prorogued, the Parliament was finally dissolved.

The death of James, sudden and mysterious, followed close upon this event; and the House of Commons was almost instantly challenged to a contest by his ill-advised successor. They had prepared themselves for it by their exertions of the last five-and-twenty years. They had obtained little, it might be said, in respect of distinct enactments; but they had fenced themselves round with privileges, never to be questioned more, by favourites or by monarchs. "They had rescued from disuse their ancient right of impeachment; they had placed on record a protestation of their claim to debate all matters of public concern; they had remonstrated against the usurped prerogatives of binding the subject by proclamation, and of levying customs at the outposts; they had secured beyond controversy their exclusive privilege of determining contested elections of their members."† Vast rights remained yet to be asserted, oppressive wrongs to be redressed; but an increasing energy in the nation gave new confidence and strength to its representatives; and they assembled at the summons of the new monarch, immediately after his accession, more than ever proudly watchful of privilege, and more than ever sternly resolved on good government. In this Parliament, which met at Westminster on the 18th of June, 1625, Eliot was again at his post. He took his seat with a new colleague, Mr. Ralph Speot, for the same borough as before—that of Newport.

It may be well, before we listen to the comments of Mr. D'Israeli, and of others from whom a more liberal consideration was to be expected, as to the severe conduct of this Parliament to their young sovereign, to ask whether any reasonable foundation of confidence had been laid between them before their meeting this day! Had any symptoms of a new and better administration appeared in any quarter of the government! Did favouritism, intrigue, or corruption seem to have abated a jot of their all-governing influence at court! Had oppression and injustice, even for the few little weeks of the new reign, ceased to harass the nation! But for so short a time had the doctrine and the practice of absolute power and monarchy imprescriptible, been veiled before the presence of the people, as their new inheritor, with admirable hypocrisy, veiled his crown before that people's representatives, on this day of their assembling!‡

The answer which history gives to these questions is a just warrant for the murmurs of distrust which, in his progress to his first Par-

* History, vol. v., p. 98, 99. See, also, Lord Coke on the subject of this great act, 3 Inst., 181.

† Clarendon, Hist., p. 20.

‡ See the proceedings in the Parl. Hist. Carte thought him clearly guilty, p. 116. It appears also that Nicholas Ferrar, a most conscientious person, was one of his four ardent accusers. Wordsworth's Ecclesiastical Biography, vol. iv. See, also, Hallam, vol. i., p. 508. Clarendon, Hacket, and others consider him to have been used as a sacrifice to Buckingham's resentment. Eliot acted on all the committees of this impeachment, with Sandys, Digges, Phillips, Wentworth, Pym, &c. See Journals, April 12, 1624, &c., &c.

§ Life of Williams, part i., p. 189, 190.

|| See Parl. Hist., vol. vi., p. 128, &c. Intimation having then gone abroad of the new treaty of marriage carrying on at Paris, the Commons had sent up what the king called a "stinging petition" against the papists. See Rushworth, vol. i., p. 140, et seq.; also Roger Coke's Detection, vol. i., p. 185. Nothing could exceed the present duplicity of the king and his successor on this subject.

* Life of Williams, vol. i., p. 186.

† Hallam, vol. i., p. 509.

‡ Charles, on the day of this Parliament's meeting, wore his crown, veiling it at the opening and the close of his speech, with a solemn and unusual deference.

liament, already sounded in the ears of the monarch, which scattered the seeds of dissatisfaction in all directions, and planted bitter thorns in the young crown, as yet scarcely settled on the temples of its wearer.

To the amazement of all, the statement made to James's last Parliament by Buckingham, and corroborated by Charles, had been discovered to be one tissue of gross falsehoods. On that statement, it has been seen, the war with Spain was undertaken. We have Clarendon's authority for asserting that they knew it to be untrue.* "But yet," says Rushworth, "the prince not only gave the testimony of his silence to these untruths, but, on its being reported to the House the same day, approved thereof there also."† The inevitable discovery of the truth, therefore, by the arrival of Bristol, now completely shattered all the popularity which Charles and Buckingham had acquired in the last reign from the breach of the Spanish treaties. But it did more. It inflamed displeasure by the shame of imposition, and poisoned at once those fresh springs of public confidence which a new king has, as it were, a right to claim as his own. Nor was this all. With an almost indecent haste, the king had entered into a marriage with a daughter of Roman Catholic France; had consented to certain secret articles in the settlement of the marriage in favour of her religion; had agreed to a suspension of the penal laws against the Catholics; and, as an earnest of his promised indulgences, had already granted to several Romish priests a special pardon, without the formality even of a conviction, of all offences committed by them against the penal laws. In fact, of his own inconsiderate will, he had provoked in the English nation that precise shame of religious subjection, to avoid which they had been anxious to rush into a war with Spain. Nor was this the only religious wrong. Symptoms had shown themselves of an unholy bellum episcopale at home. Laud's celebrated schedule of ecclesiastics, branded with the letters O and P, as they happened to be orthodox, or suspected Puritan, had already been discussed in the ministerial councils, and had been felt also in portentous signs of that exclusive system of church patronage, the subsequent effects of which were so terrible.‡

This Parliament, therefore, shaped their determinations accordingly. Their first efforts were directed to secure the future safety of the people by an enlargement of the basis of popular representation.§ On a repetition of the king's demand for supplies, Eliot and his friends went up to him with an address, respectfully and cautiously worded, promising supplies, but claiming the redress of grievances. The intemperate and threatening answer of the king had no effect on the steady purposes of these great men. They voted tonnage and poundage for one year. The House of Lords, disdaining to accept it with such a limitation, rashly rejected the bill. Still, the Commons were not alarmed. They pursued their own course calmly; granted the king readily, as they had promised, two subsidies, and were proceeding to votes of inquiry and censure into various wrongs and grievances, when the plague suddenly broke out in London. The major part of the members objected to continue at their post. "While we are now speaking," said one, "the bell is tolling every minute."* An adjournment to Oxford was consequently proposed, and, after a vast deal of squabbling between the king and his two rival ministers, granted. Williams and Buckingham, now coming fast to an open rupture, could not but illustrate the truth of the old saying.† Just as the House was adjourning to Oxford, however, Sir John Eliot, with characteristic spirit, rose and made the following motion: "An order that, within three days after our next meeting, the House shall then be called, and the censure of the House to pass upon all such as shall then be absent." Ever true and sincere himself, he would consent to no adjournment which had not some chance, in the sincerity of others, of answering the end proposed.‡

In the course of the proceedings before this adjournment, I should mention that I have observed a circumstance which seems likely to have been the origin of Sir Thomas Wentworth's dislike of Eliot. A feeling of bitterness unquestionably existed between them during the greater part of their parliamentary career.§ Mr. D'Israeli does not fail to suggest, that Wentworth might have "disdained the violence and turbulence of Eliot;"|| and he goes on to state all the malicious motives that have been suggested on both sides by Hacket and his hero. Even Mr. Hallam is betrayed, I think, on this point, into an unworthy admission. "Always jealous," he says, speaking of Wentworth, "of a rival, he contracted a dislike for Sir John Eliot, and might suspect that he was likely to be anticipated by that more distinguished patriot in royal favours."¶ Such a supposition on

* Rushworth, Hist. Coll., vol. i., p. 173.

† A lively account (though sometimes over ingenious) of this notorious quarrel will be found in Mr. D'Israeli's secret history of the king's first ministers, "Commentaries," vol. i., p. 249-272. It was a Peacham and Lockitt affair. "Never trust," says that excellent moralist, Jonathan Wild, "never trust the man who has reason to suspect you know he has injured you." The archbishop and the duke acted with decision on this maxim. While the worthy prelate was intriguing deeply for the duke's impeachment, the no less worthy peer was engaged in a similar plan for the ruin of the bishop. See Brodie's Hist. of Brit. Emp., vol. ii., p. 81. Heylin's Life of Laud, p. 139. Hacket's Scrinia Reserata, part xi., p. 16, 17, 18. Rushworth, vol. i. In all their disputes, however, I think Williams has the decided advantage; and he must have startled Buckingham not a little when he suddenly whispered in his grace's ear the memorable words, "No man that is wise will show himself angry with the people of England."

‡ Commons' Journals, July 11.

§ One of Hacket's elegant sentences runs thus: "Sir John Eliot of the West, and Sir Thomas Wentworth of the North (the northerly cock, as he afterward calls him), both in the prime of their age and wits, both conspicuous for able speakers, clashed so often in the House, and edgelled one another with such strong contradictions, that it grew from an emulation between them to an enmity."—Scrinia Reserata.

|| Commentaries, vol. ii., p. 273.

¶ Constitutional History, vol. ii., p. 57.

* Clarendon, Hist. of Rebellion, vol. i., p. 19, folio ed. A reference to the proceedings on the mutual charges of Buckingham and Bristol, in Rushworth's first volume, or in the sixth and seventh volumes of the "Parliamentary History," will supply very satisfactory means of judgment on this and other important points connected with the Spanish business. Nothing, as Mr. Hallam remarks (vol. i., Const. Hist., p. 520), can be more gratuitous, or indeed impossible, than many of Mr. Hume's assertions relating to them.

† Rushworth, Hist. Coll., vol. i., p. 76, et seq., ed. 1682.

‡ Ibid., vol. i., p. 167, 168. See, also, Laud's Diary.

§ See Glanville's Reports.

Wentworth's part supposes a possibility of its truth on Eliot's. I believe the dislike to have originated in no such matter, but, on the contrary, in Eliot's keen penetration and unswerving sense of justice. I find that, shortly after this first Parliament assembled, a dispute upon the validity of Sir Thomas Wentworth's return for the county of York came before the House. Sir John Saville claimed a new election. This was opposed by the court party, who, for reasons best known to themselves and the intriguing Archbishop Williams, supported Wentworth.* Eliot, on the other hand, supported the claims of Saville, and impressed their justice so forcibly on the popular side of the House, that the election of Wentworth was declared void.† From this I date the hatred of the future Earl of Strafford towards one whom no court intrigue could influence, whom no friendship could persuade to desert the great principles of public justice. Wentworth was again returned; thenceforward opposed Eliot whenever he was able; and, when that great statesman had perished in the cause so basely forsaken by himself, he sneered at him as a "fantastic apparition," and never ceased to spit forth venom to the creature Laud against his memory and glory.

Sir John Eliot, however, was on the eve of illustrating, by a more striking example, this great feature in his character. Though he still held the office of Vice-admiral of Devonshire,‡ he felt that the time had at last arrived which left him no alternative of choice with reference to the lord high admiral. Up to this period he had sustained, as is all but certain from the proofs I have alleged, a personal intercourse with that nobleman, and was certainly still connected with him in office. His duty now required that this should cease. His youthful companion had long been lost in the pampered minister of kings, his superior in office was beneath him in public honesty. Both were abandoned. Sir John Eliot now saw, in the speedy destruction of Buckingham, the only destruction of that power behind the throne which was greater than the throne itself, and was daily becoming more and more fatal to the people.* He had at last concentrated in his own person, and in those of his servile adherents, the most considerable offices of the crown, and in his single existence seemed to be content to involve the question of the privileges of the nation. Eliot, contented also with that issue, buckled himself to the destruction of the minister with terrible earnestness.

It is a striking tribute to the honesty of Eliot that the dishonest men of all parties declared themselves, in turn, against him. Archbishop Williams, in his abject paper of apology to the king, to disclaim all connexion "with any of the stirring men," declared that about this time "Sir John Eliot, the only member that began to thrust in a complaint against me, was never out of my lord duke's chamber and bosom."† This, one of the cringing falsehoods of that learned divine, simply proves that Eliot hated sycophancy in every shape, whether popular or aristocratic, and was equally opposed to the duke and to Williams, the duke's mortal enemy. At the very moment when the lie was so hardly asserted, he had been appointed one of the secret managers to prepare an impeachment against Buckingham.

This charge is yet scarcely so preposterous as one of a similar character, belonging also to this period, gravely brought forward by Mr. D'Israeli. "That Sir John Eliot," says that writer, "was well known to the king, and often in the royal circle, appears by Sir John's complaint in the Parliament at Oxford in 1625, of six Romish priests being lately pardoned, which the duke had prevailed upon the king to be done in his presence at Hampton Court." Whereupon Mr. D'Israeli concludes that "Eliot, like Sir Dudley Digges, was, in fact, a great servant of the duke's."‡ This is an oddly emphatic instance of perverse misrepresentation, or I would scarcely hazard the reproach of tediousness in refuting it. Archdeacon Echard is Mr. D'Israeli's authority.§ Roger Coke I discover to have been the only authority for Archdeacon Echard. I quote the original passage. "When the Parliament met at Oxford," says Coke, plagiarizing a previous statement by Hacket, "the speaker had no sooner taken his chair but a western knight enlarges the sense of his sorrow that he had seen a pardon for six priests bearing test July 12; whereas but the day before it, when they were to part from Westminster, the lord keeper had promised in the king's name, before them all, that the rigour against the priests should not be deluded."|| Oldmixon, quoting this account, makes the western knight Sir Robert Philips of Somers-

* I shall have occasion to allude to these more specifically in the biography of Strafford. Eliot is never understood to have been in any way connected with Saville, whose character was not of that stamp to command either his public or private sympathy. His keen penetration had already pointed to the future Earl of Strafford as a patriot who "rather looked to be won than cared to be obdurate;" and it is very certain that he looked upon the meaner Lord Saville in future (the period of whose elevation, by-the-by, is singularly misstated by Hume) with a still more contemptuous scorn. But the present case was simply one of justice. What its precise merits were, I am unable to state; but that Wentworth was capable of resorting to the most unscrupulous and disgraceful expedients in furtherance of his own aims, is evident from what we know of his conduct at a former contest with Saville: I allude to the election for York in 1621. The candidates were Wentworth, Saville, and Calvert, the secretary of state. Wentworth, having secured his own return, zealously laboured to provoke the freeholders against Saville, and, still apprehensive of Calvert's failure, from his knowledge of the extensive influence of his opponent, wrote to the secretary in these words: "I have heard that when Sir Francis Darcy opposed Sir Thomas Luke, in a matter of like nature, the lords of the council writ to Sir Francis to desist. I know my lord-chancellor is very sensible of you in this business; a word to him, and such a letter would make an end of all." — Strafford's State Papers, vol. i., p. 10.

† Commons' Journals, July 4. The motion of "Mr. Solicitor" for counsel for Wentworth was defeated by a majority of thirty-nine. Wentworth, at a new election, was again returned.

‡ Harl. MSS., 390. Letter of Mead to Sir Martin Stuteville, dated Feb. 25.

* "The whole power of the kingdom was grasped by his insatiable hand; while he both engrossed the entire confidence of his master, and held, invested in his single person, the most considerable offices of the crown."—Hume's History, vol. v., p. 137. "Who he will advance, shall be advanced; and who he doth but frown upon, must be thrown down."—Strafford's Papers, vol. i., p. 28.

† Scrinia Reserata, part i. This would have been better guessed, as I shall have occasion to show, of Wentworth. Still, it would have been incorrect.

‡ Commentaries, vol. ii., p. 272.

§ Echard's History, folio ed., p. 422.

|| Roger Coke's Detection, vol. i., p. 232, ed. 1694. But see, also, Scrinia Reserata, part i.

setshire, and quotes it correctly enough.* The archdeacon, on the other hand, takes for granted that the western knight must have been Sir John Eliot of Cornwall; and, with his usual incorrectness, coupling the passage with a few words that go before it, stating that the king had signed the pardon in the presence and by the influence of Buckingham, tortures it into what Mr. D'Israeli has adopted. "And Mr. D'Israeli consummates the series of misrepresentations by supporting upon their authority a charge of sycophancy against Eliot! I have now to state that, whatever demerit attaches to the circumstance must be removed from Eliot, and from Philips also; for that the "western knight" who "enlarged the sense of his sorrow" was Sir Edward Gyles, one of the Cornish members.†

Eliot had more stirring game in hand. Scarcely had the Parliament reassembled at Oxford when secret intelligence reached him that the loan of ships which had been promised to the King of France, at the close of the late reign, for the purpose of employment against the Spanish interest in Italy and the Valtoline, had been perverted, by the deliberate treachery of Buckingham and his minion the king, to the use of the French Catholics against the Huguenots of Rochelle.‡ He saw and seized his opportunity. He hurried down to the House, and implored them to grant no farther supplies, for that there were heavy grievances to be considered. Charles having heard this, summoned the Houses to meet him at the great hall in Christ Church, to "convince them of the necessity of considering his business first." Under his direction, his ministers then detailed his wants; and to prevent the effect, so much

* Oldmixon's History, p. 78, ed. 1730.

† Commons' Journals, 1st of August. Brodie gives the name correctly, vol. ii., p. 73. Mrs. Macaulay is also correct, vol. i., p. 276. I was somewhat surprised to find, from the preface to Monsieur Guizot's vivid "Histoire de la Révolution d'Angleterre," that the work by that lady was published in France in 1791, with the name of Mirabeau as its author! (Hist. par Guizot, vol. i., préface, p. xvii.) It is singularly honourable, I may add, to the French nation, that M. Guizot has found encouragement enough to make it worth his while to publish, for the use of his countrymen, a series of translations of original memoirs of the times of the two great English revolutions (Collection des Mémoires relatifs à la Révolution d'Angleterre, accompagnée de Notices et d'Éclaircissements Historiques), amounting to twenty-eight octavo volumes! Such a collection would be invaluable to the historical inquirer in our own country; but where is the public patronage that would bear out any English bookseller or English man of letters in such an undertaking?

‡ Lord Nugent discovered, among the Earl St. Germain's papers, a copy of the high-minded protest by Admiral Pennington, together with the original orders from Buckingham, and from Charles himself, relating to this disgraceful business. These I take to have been forwarded secretly by Pennington to Sir John Eliot, in the way of self-vindication. His, as Lord Nugent truly observes, was a hard position. He commanded the ship, and led the fleet, of his sovereign. But he had been sent forth, amid the acclamations of his country, to give effect to a generous treaty with the oppressed and the besieged. He had no sooner arrived at his destination than he found himself under secret orders to put himself under a foreign command, in a murderous warfare against the English honour and the Protestant religion.—See Nugent's Memorials, vol. i., p. 100, and Appendix A. Lord Nugent has omitted to state a singular circumstance in connexion with this business, which renders my suggestion still more probable. On the eve of the meeting of the Oxford Parliament, Pennington was hastening to lay before that assembly an account of the proceedings, when, to prevent the effect of such a disclosure, he was concealed by the interference of the court till the dissolution, which quickly followed.—See Rushworth, vol. i., p. 176. Brodie, Brit. Emp., vol. ii., p. 72.

dreaded, of the disclosure of the affair at Rochelle, Secretary Coke told the Commons, with a cool and deliberate hypocrisy, that "the French king chose to sheath his sword in the bowels of his own subjects rather than declare war against the Catholics." After the conclusion of this conference, the members of the Commons returned to their House, and Sir John Eliot rose. He implored them to pause before they yielded up their only irresistible arguments for good government. "It is not usual," he said, "to grant subsidies upon subsidies in one Parliament and no grievances redressed." He then boldly stated that the treasury had been misemployed, that evil counsels guided the king's designs, that the necessities of the nation had arisen through improvidence, and that they had need to petition the king for a strait hand and a better counsel to manage his affairs.† Next, he "desired there might an account be given for all the moneys given in Parliament since the 12th of King James, with some invectives against the commissioners, whom he called the pretending sparsers of the king's purse, laying to their charge the loss of thousands of men's lives in our late expeditions by land and sea."‡ He reserved his heaviest blow for the last, aiming it with a deadly effect against Buckingham. "I desire to know," said Eliot, "whether the money designed for the Palatinate did not maintain the ships sent against Rochelle?"§ The Commons, inflamed by this address, threw out intelligible hints of impeaching Buckingham. The king, exasperated in the extreme, threatened a dissolution, while he urged once more his necessities. Cold and resolute was the answer of the Commons. "Necessity is a dangerous counsellor, and is a continual argument of supplies in all Parliaments. Those who have put the king and kingdom into such a necessity and hazard ought to answer for it, whosoever they be."|| This ominous allusion more nearly alarmed the king, and an abrupt dissolution followed. Parliament was dismissed on the 12th of August.¶

It was speedily re-summoned; but disgraceful scenes had intervened. The king, under the advice of Buckingham, had openly dispensed with the laws. Letters had been issued by order of council, under the privy seal, forcing loans from private persons, generally

* Rushworth, Hist. Coll., vol. i., p. 178.

† See Oldmixon's History, p. 79. See, also, Rushworth, vol. i., p. 180.

‡ Harleian MSS., 390. Letter of Mead to Stuteville.

§ See Oldmixon, p. 79, and Rushworth, vol. i., p. 180.

|| Rushworth, vol. i., p. 190.

¶ Mr. Hume, in one of the early passages of his history (which remains unequalled for its beauty of style and philosophical remark, though it is utterly worthless as a book of authority), describes this Parliament with a strange mixture of truth and error. "It was necessary to fix a choice: either to abandon entirely the privileges of the people, or to secure them by firmer and more precise barriers than the Constitution had hitherto provided for them. In this dilemma, men of such aspiring genius and such independent fortunes could not long deliberate; they boldly embraced the side of freedom, and resolved to grant no supplies to their necessitous prince without extorting concessions in favour of civil liberty. The end they esteemed beneficial and noble; the means regular and constitutional. To grant or refuse supplies was the undoubted privilege of the Commons.*" See the whole passage, vol. v., p. 138, quarto edit., 1763. See, also, Clarendon, vol. i., p. 6, folio edit.

 Lord Nugent found one of these requisitions in the MS. collection at Stowe. It is addressed to Sir William Andrews, of Lathbury, in Buckinghamshire, then a tenant of John Hampden's, and afterward one of the deputy lieut-those who were connected with the popular party, for the mad purpose of carrying on the Spanish war; and the Spanish war was carried on, up to the disastrous, ill-concerted, and most wretchedly conducted expedition to Cadiz. Parliament could then be warded off no longer, hated as was even its name. Buckingham, with an ominous foreboding of the future, strove to disqualify the leading men, by getting them pricked as sheriffs of their respective counties. Elliot, it is said, was the chief object of his anxiety on this head; * but, in Elliot's case, he found it impracticable. I think it probable, however, that the duke prevented his election for Newport. Here was only a means of greater triumph. He presented himself to his native county of Cornwall, and was instantly returned by the electors.† It was an age when the middle and lower ranks of the people shared a common enthusiasm, and were inaccessible alike to fear or to favour. It is striking, and even affecting, to mark the quiet calmness with which Elliot now sought to provide that the risk and danger, to which he knew his conduct in the coming Parliament must expose himself, might not fall heavily on his children. He assigned over every portion of his most extensive estates in trust to relatives for the benefit of his family.‡ Having done this, he repaired to his place in the House of Commons, resolved, at whatever hazard, to strike down the great traitor who had imperilled the liberty and the property of the kingdom.

At Westminster, on the 6th of February, 1626, this "great, warm, and ruffling"§ Parliament assembled. Elliot had scarcely taken his seat, before his vehement eloquence, overflowing with imbibed invective, was heard thundering against the doomed minister. In his style of oratory, a singular power of severity and keenness united itself with the clearest facility of detail, was adorned with the most pleasing classical allusion, and was directed against its object with such warmth and earnestness of passion as it is always most difficult to resist. The case of the chaplain Montagu|| was abandoned for the higher quarry: searching committees were appointed, and the defeats and disgraces of the nation were traced home to Buckingham. The rage of the king exceeded all bounds, and, under its influence, he sent an insolent message to the House. "I must let you know that I will not allow any of my servants to be questioned among you, much less such as are of eminent place, and near unto me. * * I see you especially aim at the Duke of Buckingham. * * I would you would hasten for my supply, or else it will be worse.

for yourselves; for if any evil happen, I think I shall be the last that shall feel it."* Elliot smiled at this impotent rage. "We have had a representation of great fear," he said; "but I hope that shall not darken our understandings. Our wills and affections were never more clear," he continued, "more ready, as to his majesty; but we are balked and checked in our forwardness by those the king intrusts with the affairs of the kingdom." Again he inflamed the House by comments on the Spanish expedition. "The last action was the king's first action; and in this the king and kingdom have suffered dishonour. We are weakened in our strength and safety; our men and ships are lost." Then followed a bitter taunt against even the personal courage of Buckingham, who, it will be recollected, had left the command of the expedition to Sir Edward Cecil. "The great general had the whole command, both by sea and land; and could the great general think it sufficient to put in his deputy and stay at home!" The orator next, taking advantage of the excitement of his hearers, thundered forth questions of a more fatal meaning. "Are not honours now sold, and made despicable! Are not judicial places sold! And do not they then sell justice again? Vendere jure potest—emerat ille prius." After some well-employed classical allusions, Elliot proceeded thus: "I shall to our present case cite two precedents. The first was in the eleventh year of Henry III. The treasure was then much exhausted; many disorders complained of; the king wronged by ministers. Many subsidies were demanded in Parliament, but they were denied; and the Lords and Commons joined to desire the king to resume lands which had been improvidently granted, and to examine his great officers, and the causes of those evils which the people then suffered. This was yielded unto by the king; and Hugh de Burgo was found faulty, and was displaced; and then the Commons, in the same Parliament, gave supply. The second precedent was in the tenth year of Richard II. Then the times were such, and places so changeable, that any great officer could hardly sit to be warmed in his place. Supply was at that Parliament required: the Commons denied supply, and complained that their moneys were misemployed; that the Earl of Suffolk (Michael de la Pole) then overruled all; and so their answer was, 'they could not give;' and they petitioned the king that a commission might be granted, and the Earl of Suffolk might be examined. A commission," Elliot continued, reserving himself for a closing sarcasm at Buckingham, "at their request was awarded; and that commission recites all the evil then complained of; and that the king, upon the petition of the Lords and Commons, had granted that examination should be taken of the crown lands which were sold, of the ordering of his household, and the disposition of the jewels of his grandfather and father. I hear nothing said in this house of our jewels, nor will I speak of them; but I could wish they were within these walls!"† The effect of this speech was tenants for that county under the Parliament. It appears that for these contributions, exacted with the utmost severity and injustice, collectors were appointed, whose acquittance should be a sufficient warrant for repayment in eighteen months. "Put not your faith in princes!" Sir William Andrews' acquittance, remains appended to the requisition.

* Echard's History, p. 426. D'Israeli's Commentaries, vol. i., p. 298.

† Parliamentary History and Commons' Journals.

‡ Harleian MSS., No. 7000. Letter of Pory to Puckering. See, also, D'Israeli's Commentaries, vol. iv., p. 510. I shall have to advert to this hereafter.

§ Whitelocke's Memorials of the English Affairs, p. 7, edit. 1682.

|| I shall have occasion to allude to this case in the biography of Pym

* Whitelocke's Memorials, p. 3.

† Buckingham had raised money upon the crown jewels and plate, by the king's order, at the Hague.—Strafford, State Papers, vol. i., p. 28. Ingram to Wentworth. Owing complete, and, in the midst of the general indignation excited, Dr. Turner's resolutions, that "common fame" was a good ground of accusation against Buckingham; were passed; and notice was sent to the duke of the proceedings against him. At the same time, in illustration of the good faith with which they acted, they announced that the king's immediate necessities should be relieved while his minister was brought to trial; and they redeemed this pledge by a vote for the grant of three subsidies and three fifteenths.* The king now felt more strongly than ever the imminent danger of his favourite. Again he interfered, and again his interference was defeated by the boldness of Eliot. "Remember," he said, "that Parliaments are altogether in my power for their calling, sitting, and dissolution; therefore, as I find the fruits of them good or evil, they are to continue or not to be."† The Commons retired to deliberate this with locked doors, and the key placed in the hands of the speaker. What passed in that memorable sitting did not publicly transpire; but I can supply some portion of it at least from a manuscript letter of the time. "Sir John Eliot rose up and made a resolute (I doubt whether a timely)‡ speech, the sum whereof was, that they came not thither either to do what the king should command them, or to abstain where he forbade them; and therefore they should continue constant to maintain their privileges, and not do either more or less for what had been said unto them."§ This ominous meeting with locked doors alarmed the king; negotiations were opened, explanations offered, every possible resource of avoidance attempted, but in vain. It was too late to dispute the right of impeachment after the precedents of Bacon and Middlesex; and the Commons, after addressing the king in decorous language, impeached Buckingham on twelve articles.||

Eight chief managers were appointed. To Pym, Herbert, Selden, Glanville, Sherland, and to a singular omission of the editors of the last great parliamentary history, we look vainly among the debates they have collected for this very remarkable speech. It is in Rushworth, however (vol. i., p. 220), and in the Old Parliamentary History, vol. vi., p. 441, edit. 1763.

* Rushworth's Hist. Coll., vol. i., p. 221. Whitelocke's Memorials, p. 3.

† Rushworth, vol. i., p. 225. Whitelocke, p. 4.

‡ Here the timid writer alludes to what was frequently urged against Eliot, the severe and unsparring character of his speeches. Clarendon was accustomed to the House of Commons, and speaks differently. "Modesty and moderation in words," says that noble writer, "never was, nor never will be observed in popular councils whose foundation is liberty of speech."—Hist. of the Rebellion, vol. i., p. 7, folio edit.

§ Harleian MSS. Letter of Mead to Sir Martin Sturtville, dated April 8. In a subsequent letter of the same correspondent in this collection (dated April 28), I find the first shadowing forth of the iniquitous dispersion of Sir Robert Cotton's library—an event which that learned antiquary was unable to survive. "Sir Robert Cotton's books are threatened to be taken away, because he is accused to impart ancient precedents to the Lower House."

|| The duke's obsequious and fawning answer had simply the effect of adding another charge to the impeachment. I must refer the reader to the various histories for an ample exposure of the disgraceful practices resorted to by the king to rescue his favourite from the powerful opposition of the Earls Bristol and Arundel in the Upper House. Brodie's Hist. of the British Empire, vol. ii., p. 105, et seq.; Lingard's History, vol. ix., p. 345, et seq. The History, from Sir James Mackintosh, in Lardner's Cyclopædia, vol. v., p. 37-46.

Wandesford was intrusted the duty of dilating upon the facts of the impeachment; to Sir Dudley Digges the task of opening the proceedings in a "prologue" was committed; and for Sir John Eliot the arduous duty was reserved of winding up the whole proceedings by one of his impressive perorations, that should serve as an "epilogue" to this mighty drama. They did not over estimate the value of his eloquence.*

The speech delivered by him on this great occasion is an important chapter in his history. Sir Dudley Digges, a courtly patriot, had spoken the "prologue" in the highest prevailing style of ornate circumlocution and quaintly elevated metaphor. Professing to deliver himself in "plain country language, setting by all rhetorical affectations," the monarchy he compared to the creation, the Commons to the earth, the Lords to the planets, the king to the glorious sun, the clergy to the fire, the judges and magistrates to the air, and the Duke of Buckingham to a comet, "a prodigious comet." All this was only a striking foil to the nervous and daring invective, the clear and gorgeous declamation of Eliot. The proud minister, who had kept his seat during the harangue of Digges, insolently braving his accuser, and jeering his quaint expressions, was observed to leave the house when Eliot, on the following day, arose.† It was well for himself that he had done so. Never was an attack made, in that or any succeeding time, so eloquent, so bitter, so earnest, so disdainful. The orator excelled himself. He had summoned to his service all his literary accomplishments, and he closely environed his argument with a passion that was absolutely terrible.

He began by describing the ambition of "this man," as he disdainfully termed the duke, impeaching it by "the common sense of the miseries and misfortunes which the people suffer," and protesting in eloquent phrase against those high misdemeanors which "have lost us the regality of our narrow seas, the ancient inheritance of our princes." He then exposed, as "full of collusion and deceit," the "inward character" of the mind of Buckingham. "I can express it," said Eliot, bitterly, "no better than by the beast called by the ancients stalionatus; a beast so blurred, so spotted, so full of foul lines that they knew not what to make of it." He next presented to their lordships "the duke's high oppression" in all its strange extent, "not to men alone, but to laws and statutes, to acts of council, to pleas and decrees of court, to the pleasures of his majesty." The orator afterward, having indulged some quiet sarcasms at Buckingham, his victims, and his extortions, "mathematically observed and exquisitely expressed," advanced to the most serious imputations, which he handled with a fearful severity. "That which was wont to be the crown of virtue and merit is now become a merchandise for the greatness of this man, and even justice is made his prey! The most deserving offices that require abilities to discharge them are fixed upon the duke, his allies, and kindred. He hath drawn to him and his the power of justice, the power of honour, and the power of command—in effect, the whole power of the kingdom, both for peace and war!" Eliot then painted a mournful picture of the result of the favourite's extortions in the present state of the kingdom, the "revenues destroyed, the fountain of supply exhausted, the nerves of the land relaxed," placing beside it, in vivid and indignant contrast, the gorgeousness of Buckingham's possessions. "He intercepts, consumes, and exhausts the revenues of the crown, not only to satisfy his own lustful desires, but the luxury of others; and, by emptying the veins the blood should run in, he hath cast the body of the kingdom into a high consumption. Infinite sums of money, and mass of land exceeding the value of money, nay, even contributions in Parliament, have been heaped upon him; and how have they been employed! Upon costly furniture, sumptuous feasting, and magnificent building, the visible evidences of the express exhausting of the state! And yet his ambition," proceeded Eliot, alluding darkly to more dreadful charges, "which is boundless, resteth not here, but, like a violent flame, bursteth forth and getteth farther scope. Not satisfied with injuries and injustice, and dishonouring of religion, his attempts go higher—to the prejudice of his sovereign. *The effects I fear to speak, and fear to think. I end this passage, as Cicero did in a like case, ne gravioribus utar verbis quam rei natura fert, aut levioribus quam causæ necessitas postulat."

* For the history of this impeachment, and reports of the various speeches, see Rushworth, vol. i., p. 302, et seq.; Parliamentary History, vol. vi. and vii.; History from Hackintosh, vol. v., p. 46, et seq. The thirteen articles of the impeachment were arranged under the following heads: Plurality of offices; buying the place of high admiral; buying the wardenship of the cinque ports; not guarding the narrow seas; unlawfully and corruptly staying a French ship; extorting £10,000 from the East India merchants; putting English ships in the hands of the French, to be employed against the Protestants of Rochelle (this embraced two articles); compelling Lord Roberts to buy his peerage; selling places of judicature; procuring honours for his poor kindred; malversation of the king's revenue; giving physics to the late king.

† The duke's absence is marked by a letter in the Harl. MS., 383. See, also, Rushworth, in Ellis's Original Letters, vol. iii., p. 226 (second edit.), an account will be found of the duke's "jeering and sneering insolence," and the spirited rebuke it at last provoked.

The closing passage of Eliot's speech was tremendous, and must have electrified the house.

"Your lordships have an idea of the man, what he is in himself, what in his affections! You have seen his power, and some, I fear, have felt it! You have known his practice, and have heard the effects. It rests, then, to be considered what, being such, he is in reference to the king and state—how compatible or incompatible with either? In reference to the king, he must be styled the canker in his treasure; in reference to the state, the moth of all goodness. What future hopes are to be expected, your lordships may draw out of his actions and affections. In all precedents I can hardly find him a match or parallel. None so like him as Sejanus, thus described by Tacitus: Audax sui obtegens, in alios criminatior, juxta adulator et superbus. My lords, for his pride and flattery it was noted of Sejanus that he did clientes suos provinciis adornare. Doth not this man the like? Ask England, Scotland, and Ireland, and they will tell you! Sejanus's pride was so excessive, Tacitus saith, that he neglected all counsel, mixed his business and service with the prince, seemed to confound their actions, and was often styled imperatoris laborum socius. How lately, and how often, hath this man commixed his actions, in discourse, with actions of the king! My lords, I have done. You see the man! By him came all these evils; in him we find the cause; on him we expect the remedies; and to this we met your lordships in conference."

The rage of the king, when told of Eliot's speech, betrayed him. In a manuscript letter of the time the writer alludes to the unseemly anger displayed as "private news which I desire you to keep to yourself as your own, by separating this half sheet, and burning it or concealing it." The allusion to the death of his father, and to Sejanus, had strangely affected Charles. "Implicitly," he exclaimed, "he must intend me for Tiberius!"* and he hurried to the House of Lords to complain of Sir John Eliot. Then began those cruel persecutions which Eliot had foreseen, and prepared himself for, and which were only exhausted at last in the death of their illustrious object. He was that day committed close prisoner to the Tower; and, by an odd kind of chance, which may be worth noting for some of my readers, was flung into the dungeon which, after a few short months, received Felton, Buckingham's assassin.† Digges was also committed. The House of Commons, on hearing of this gross breach of privilege (the first of that series of open and undisguised outrages which brought Charles to the scaffold), broke up instantly, notwithstanding a very heavy press of business before them; and, after dinner, many members met in Westminster Hall, "sadly communicating their minds to one another."‡ The follow-

* Harleian MSS., 383. Letter of Mead, dated May 11. The writer subsequently says that Sir Robert Cotton had told him that the king's affection towards the duke "was very admirable—no whit lessened." When Charles, indeed, came in his barge from Whitehall to order Eliot to the Tower, Buckingham sat by his side! MS. letter to Mead.

† As Felton the last weeke passed through Kingston-upon-Thames, an old woman bestowed this salutation upon him: 'Now God blesse thee, little David,' quoth she; meaning he had killed Goliath. He hath hitherto (saith my author) been fairly used in the Tower, being put into the same lodging where Sir John Eliot lay, and allowed two dishes of meat every meal." Harleian MSS., 390. Felton was a miserable enthusiast, who revenged upon Buckingham only a private wrong. But his name deserves honour for the memory of one striking incident at the close of his unhappy life. I quote it from Ellis's Original Letters, vol. iii., p. 267, second edit. "Another friend told me that on Tuesday morning, some of the lords being with him, my Lord of Dorset told him, 'Mr. Felton, it is the king's pleasure you should be put to torture, to make you confess your complices; and therefore prepare yourself for the rack.' To whom Felton: 'I do not believe, my lord, that it is the king's pleasure; for he is a just and a gracious prince, and will not have his subjects to be tortured against law. I do again affirm, upon my salvation, that my purpose was known to no man living; and more than I have said before I cannot. But if it be his majesty's pleasure, I am ready to suffer whatever his majesty will have inflicted upon me. Yet this I must tell you by-the-way, that if I be put upon the rack I will accuse you, my Lord of Dorset, and none but yourself.' So they left him there without bringing him to the rack." The letter writer might have gone farther, for this was not all. To excuse themselves from the possible supposition that they could have been influenced in this case by terror, the judges were ordered to deliver a decision that "no such punishment as the rack is known or allowed by our law." We owe this to Felton.

‡ Harleian MSS., 383. Letter to Mead, dated May 12.

* We feel with Eliot on this point. The reader is referred to a forcible passage in Mr. Brodie's History of the British Empire, vol. ii., p. 43, 44. I have satisfied myself respecting Mr. Brodie's proof, by referring to the MS. in the Ayscough Collection of the Brit. Museum, No. 4991, p. 206.

ing morning they met in the House; but when the speaker reminded them of the business of the day, "Sit down! sit down!" was the general cry: "no business till we are righted in our liberties!"* A sullen silence succeeded, which was broken by the memorable expostulation of Sir Dudley Carleton, the king's vice-chamberlain. Unadvisedly he let the court secret out! After complaining of the violent and contemptuous expressions resorted to by Eliot and Digges, he blurted forth as follows: "I beseech you, gentlemen, move not his majesty with trenching on his prerogative, lest you bring him out of love with Parliaments. In his messages he hath told you that, if there were not correspondence between him and you, he should be enforced to use new counsels. Now, I pray you to consider what these new counsels are, and may be. I fear to declare those that I conceive. In all Christian kingdoms you know that parliaments were in use anciently; until the monarchs began to know their own strength; and, seeing the turbulent spirit of their parliaments, at length they, by little and little, began to stand upon their prerogatives, and at last overthrew the parliaments throughout Christendom, except here only with us. And, indeed, you would count it a great misery, if you knew the subjects in foreign countries as well as myself, to see them look not like our nation, with store of flesh on their backs, but like so many ghosts, and not men, being nothing but skin and bones, with some thin cover to their nakedness, and wearing only wooden shoes on their feet; so that they cannot eat meat or wear good clothes, but they must pay and be taxed unto the king for it. This is a misery beyond expression, and that which yet we are free from."† Poor Sir Dudley had scarcely delivered himself of this when his ears were saluted with loud and unwelcome shouts, "To the bar! to the bar!" He narrowly escaped the necessity of apologizing at the bar on his knees.

Ultimately Digges, coy patriot, having consented to retract certain expressions complained of, was released. Eliot, on the other hand, coldly and sternly refused to listen to any proposals; and the king, unable to keep up the struggle, was obliged, after the expiration of eight days, to sign a warrant for his release. On his reappearance in the House, the vice-chamberlain, by his master's command, repeated the charge of intemperate language; upon which Sir John, instead of denying anything he had said, or meanly endeavouring to explain away the harshness of the terms he had made use of, in a remarkably eloquent and sarcastic speech avowed and defended every name he had applied to Buckingham.‡ The spirit of this great man communicated itself to the House, and by a unanimous vote, refusing even to order him to withdraw,* they cleared him from every imputation.

Charles, nothing taught by this egregious failure, continued to play the minion to Buckingham, who had now resolved, by another dissolution, to throw for his only chance of safety. This was, indeed, a desperate step, and so Charles would seem to have considered it; but his fears, his consciousness of the injuries he was committing on his subjects, everything sank before the influence of the favourite. "The duke being in the audience chamber, private with the king, his majesty was overheard (as they talk) to use these words: 'What can I do more? I have engaged mine honour to mine uncle of Denmark and other princes. I have, in a manner, lost the love of my subjects. What wouldst thou have me do?' Whence some think the duke moved the king to dissolve the Parliament."† Or, it may have been, the duke moved the king to get himself promoted to the chancellorship of Cambridge. Monstrous as it appears, a royal message was sent forthwith to the convocation, on the present occurrence of the vacancy, ordering them to elect the duke! Vain was every entreaty to postpone the election; at least until after the event of the impeachment were known. It was carried,‡ and received the formal and elaborate approval of the king. The Commons, then, after a stormy debate, in which Eliot took his usual warm and vigorous part,§ sent to crave audience of his majesty "about serious business concerning all the Commons of the land." The king returned answer that they should hear from him the next day. They did hear from him: the next day they were dissolved;|| and the rash monarch proceeded to try the effect of those "new counsels" which he and his servants had so often threatened.

These "new counsels" appeared in the shape of a naked despotism. Everything short of the absolute surrender of the subject to the muskets of the soldiery was resorted to; and devoured, and ever did in that House, to avoid passion; and only desired to do his duty."

* The entry in the Journals is remarkable: "Sir John Eliot of himself withdrew; the House refusing to order his withdrawing."

† A letter in the Harleian MSS. Mead to Stuteville, dated May 13.

‡ By means the most disgraceful, which, after all, only secured Buckingham a majority of three votes over Lord Andover, hastily set up by the Commons. In Eliot's Original Letters, vol. iii., p. 231, we have a curious account of the contest. "My lord bishop labours; Mr. Mason visits for his lord, Mr. Cosens for the most true patron of the clergy and of scholars. Masters belabour their fellows. Dr. Maw sends for his, one by one, to persuade them; some twice over. . . . Divers in town got hackneys, and fled to avoid importunity. Very many—some whole colleges—were gotten by their fearful masters, the bishop, and others, to suspend, who otherwise were resolved against the duke, and kept away with much indignation: and yet for all this stirre the duke carried it but by three votes from my Lord Andover, whom we voluntarily set up against him, without motion on his behalf, yea, without his knowledge. . . . We had but one doctor in the whole towne durst (for so I dare speak) give with us against the duke; and that was Dr. Porter or Queen's."

§ It was he who proposed, and had the chief hand in framing, the celebrated remonstrance (Rushworth, vol. i., p. 400), which every member of the House held in his possession on the day of the dissolution of this Parliament. A proclamation was subsequently issued against it by the king. See Rushworth, vol. i., p. 411.

|| See, also, Sanderson's account in his Life of Charles, p. 58; and Rushworth, vol. i., p. 398.

* Harleian MSS., 383. Letter to Mead, dated May 12. See, also, Rushworth, vol. i., p. 358; and Parliamentary History, vol. vii., p. 159, for other accounts of this scene.

† Whitelocke's Memorials, p. 6. Rushworth, vol. i., p. 359. Parl. Hist., vol. vii., p. 159.

‡ Hatsell's Precedents. For a report of Sir John's speech, see Rushworth, vol. i., p. 362; and Parl. Hist., vol. vii., p. 165. The latter is more full and correct. I quote a striking passage: "For the words, the man, he said he spoke not by the book, but suddenly. For brevity's sake he used the words, The man. He thought it not fit at all times to reiterate his titles; and yet thinketh him not to be a god." In conclusion, Eliot touched with a modest and manly forbearance on the old charge against him. "For the manner of his speech, as having too much vigour and strength, he said he could not excuse his natural defects; but he then en-we learn, from a remarkable passage in Hume's history, good reason why the new counsels fell short of that. "Had he possessed any military force," says the philosophical apologist of Charles, "on which he could depend, 'tis not improbable that he had at once taken off the mask, and governed without any regard to parliamentary privileges. * * * But his army was new levied, ill paid, and worse disciplined; no-wise superior to the militia, who were much more numerous, and who were, in a great measure, under the influence of the country gentlemen."* As it was, the mask was very clumsily kept on. The first thing attempted under it was to cover, by a bungling imposition, an outrageous stretch of power. The people were instructed by the agents of government that, as subsidies had been voted in the last House of Commons, they could not legally refuse to pay them, though Parliament had been dissolved before the bill embodying them had passed; and they were levied accordingly! A commission to improve the revenues of crown lands went forth next on a mission of the grossest tyranny; and, following this, a commission to force the most enormous penalties against religious recusants. Privy seals for the loan of money were at the same time issued, in all directions, to men of reputed property, and an immediate advance of a hundred and twenty thousand pounds was insolently demanded from the city of London. Lastly, a levy of ships was ordered from the port towns and counties adjoining—a forecast of the memorable tax of ship money.† As men grieved and wondered at these things, the news arrived of the defeat of the King of Denmark at the bloody battle of Lutter; and Charles seized the advantages of this disaster to his ally to execute a measure he had long meditated, and of which all these oppressions we have named were but even the feeble foreshadowing. He sent commissioners into every quarter of the kingdom, with the most frightfully inquisitorial powers, to execute a GENERAL FORCED LOAN.‡ He issu-

* History, vol. v., p. 151. Clarendon's account may be supposed to this: "Upon every dissolution, such as had given any offence were imprisoned or disgraced; new projects were every day set on foot for money, which served only to offend and incense the people, and brought little supplies to the king's occasions; yet raised a great stock for expostulation, murmur, and complaint, to be exposed when other supplies should be required. And many persons of the best quality and condition under the peerage were committed to several prisons, with circumstances unusual and unheard of, for refusing to pay money required by these extraordinary ways."—Hist. of Rebellion, vol. i., p. 22.

† Rushworth, vol. i., p. 411-472. Rymer, xviii., p. 730-842. Whitelocke, p. 7-9. In these authorities ample information will be found. See, also, Park Hist., vol. vii., p. 320-338. In connexion with these accounts it may be amusing to quote an anecdote from the office book of the master of the revels, "here entered," as he observes, "for ever, to be remembered by my son, and those who cast their eyes on it, in honour of King Charles my master." The king, reading a manuscript play of Massinger's, had stumbled on the following:

"Moneys! we'll raise supplies what ways we please,
And force you to subscribe to blanks, in which We'll mulct you as we shall think fit. The Cæsars
In Rome were wise, acknowledging no laws
But what their swords did ratify."

and, in the disgust of the moment, wrote a halting line against it:

"This is too insolent, and to be changed!"

Truly, nothing should be so disgusting to us as a hideous likeness of ourselves!

‡ It is worth while giving an extract from the private instructions of these commissioners. They were "to treat ed an elaborate proclamation at the same time excusing these new counsels by the exigence of the moment; and, in private instructions to the clergy, ordered them to use the pulpit in advancement of his monstrous projects.* Reverend doctors, with an obedient start, straightway preached illimitable obedience on pain of eternal damnation.† Imprisonment of various sorts compensated for the inefficacy of religious anathemas. The poor, who could not, or would not pay, were pressed into the army or the navy; substantial tradesmen were dragged from their families; men of rank, even, were ordered into the palatinate;‡ large batches of country gentlemen were lodged in custody;§ and, as a punishment to some, more ag-apart with every one of those who are to lend, and not in the presence or hearing of any other, unless they see cause to the contrary; and, if any shall refuse to lend, and shall make delay or excuses, and persist in their obstinacy, that they examine such persons upon oath, whether they have been dealt withal to deny, or refuse to lend, or make an excuse for not lending; who hath dealt so with them, or what speeches or persuasions he or they have used to him tending to that purpose? And that they shall also charge every such person, in his majesty's name, upon his allegiance, not to declare to any other what his answer was."—Rushworth, vol. i., p. 419.

* Laud, now bishop of Bath and Wells, drew these instructions up in the name of the king. (See Heylin's Life, p. 161, et seq.; and Laud's Diary.) "The dexterous performance of which service," says Heylin, "as it raised Laud higher in his majesty's good opinion of him, so it was recompensed with a place of greater nearness to him than before he had."

† Sibthorp, vicar of Brackley, in Northamptonshire, and Mainwaring, a king's chaplain and Vicar of St. Giles's, made themselves most notorious in this slavish and criminal service. Extracts from the sermons of these men, of the most atrocious description, will be found in Rushworth, vol. i., p. 422, 423. They had excellent imitators. I find among the Sloane MSS., a letter descriptive of a sermon preached by the Dean of Canterbury, from which the reader may take an extract: "It was the speech of a man renowned for wisdom in our age, that if he was commanded to put forth to sea in a ship that had neither mast nor tackling, he would do it. And being asked what wisdom that were, replied, the wisdom must be in him that hath power to command, not in him that conscience binds to obey." The question of the licensing these sermons for publication led to the suspension of Abbot from the See of Canterbury. Abbot, however, was no better than his brother Laud, probably a little worse, since the conduct of the former was at least intelligible. See History, from Mackintosh, vol. v., p. 70. The archbishop's Narrative in Rushworth, vol. i., p. 434-457. Walpole's Royal and Noble Authors, art. Northampton, note by Park. Hallam's Const. Hist., vol. i., p. 570, note.

‡ There is something so extremely natural and forcible in Sir Peter Hayman's sturdy account of his experience in this particular, that I cannot forbear quoting it. After Parliament had assembled, a debate arose on "Designation to Foreign Employment," whereupon Sir Peter Hayman got upon his legs: "I have not forgot my employment into the palatinate. I was called before the lords of the council, for what I knew not, but I heard it was for not lending on a privy seal. I told them, if they will take my estate, let them; I would give it up; I lend I would not. When I was before the lords of the council, they laid to my charge my unwillingness to serve the king. I said, I had my life and my estate to serve my country and my religion. They told me, that if I did not pay I should be put upon an employment of service. I was willing. After ten weeks' waiting, they told me I was to go with a lord into the palatinate, and that I should have employment there, and means befitting. I told them I was a subject, and desired means. Some put on very eagerly, some dealt nobly. They said I must go on my own purse. I told them nemo militat suis expensis. Some told me, I must go. I began to think, what, must I? None were ever sent out in that way. Lawyers told me I could not be so sent. Having this assurance, I demanded means, and was resolved not to stir but upon those terms; and, in silence and duty, I denied. Upon this, having given me a command to go, after twelve days they told me they would not send me as a soldier, but to attend on an ambassador. I knew that stone would hit me, therefore I settled my troubled estate, and addressed myself to that service." Eliot's comments on this usage were appropriately bitter. Parl. Hist., vol. vii., p. 403.

§ Some were brought up to London, and committed to gravated and horrible, probably, than any we have named, the remains of the disgraced and infamous troops that had survived the affair at Cadiz were quartered upon their houses, in the midst of their wives and children!* And as these crimes had been sanctioned by the ministers of religion, so the vile slaves who sat in the seats of justice were ordered to confirm them by law. A voice or two that had hinted from the bench a feeble utterance of opposition were instantly stifled, and the conclave of judges remanded five recusants, who had brought their habeas corpus.†

rigorous confinement in the Fleet, the Gatehouse, the Marshalsea, and the New Prison. Eliot was one of these. The rest, as Sir Thomas Wentworth and others, were subjected to confinement, strict, but much less rigorous, in various counties. Hampden had been thrown into the Gatehouse at first, but was afterward released and sent into Hampshire. One anecdote will illustrate the numberless instances of quiet and forbearing fortitude, practised by men recollected no longer, but who at this time shed lustre on the English character. George Catesby, of Northamptonshire, being committed to the Gatehouse as a recusant, alleged, among other reasons for his non-compliance, that he considered "that this loan might become a precedent; and that every precedent, he was told by the lord president, was a flower of the prerogative." The lord president told him that "he lied!" Catesby merely shook his head, observing, "I come not here to contend with your lordship, but to suffer." Lord Suffolk then interposed to entreat the lord president not too far to urge his kinsman, Mr. Catesby. The latter, however, waived any kindness he might owe to kindred, declaring that "he would remain master of his own purse."—D'Israeli's Commentaries, vol. ii., p. 9.

* See a letter in Stratford's State Papers, vol. i.; p. 40; and Rushworth, vol. i., p. 418-420. "There were frequent robberies," says the collector, "burglaries, rapes, rapines, murders, and barbarous cruelties. Unto some places they were sent as a punishment, and wherever they came, there was a general outcry." From his place in Parliament, Sir Thomas Wentworth afterward denounced this: "They have sent from us the light of our eyes; enforced companies of guests worse than the ordinances of France; vitiated our wives and daughters before our faces; brought the crown to greater want than ever it was, by anticipating the revenue! And can the shepherd be thus smitten, and the flock not be scattered!"—Parl. Hist., vol. vii., p. 370.

† The case of Sir Thomas Darnel, Sir John Corbet, Sir Walter Earl, Sir John Haveringham, and Sir Everard Hampden, which is reported at great length in the State Trials, is an admirable illustration, among other things, of the character of the crown lawyers and judges of the time. There is an abridgment of the proceedings in Rushworth, p. 458-462. Sir Randolph Crew, immediately before this case was argued, having, as Rushworth expresses it, "showed no zeal" (i., 420), was removed to make room for Sir Nicholas Hyde; and it is quite clear that two of the judges (Jones and Doddridge) who sat with the latter, having shown a decided leaning towards the prisoners during the argument, were brought to a better understanding with Sir Nicholas before the decision. When the case was afterward sent before the House of Lords, and the judges were, so to speak, put upon their trial, Judge Whitelock betrayed the secret. "The Commons," he said, "do not know what letters and commands we receive." Beyond all praise was the conduct of the counsel employed for the prisoners on this occasion. The most undaunted courage exalted the profoundest knowledge. The sober grandeur of Selden, and the rough energy of Noy, must have struck with an ominous effect on the court councils. It was here that Selden threw out, in a parenthesis, those remarkable words, which, it has been judiciously observed (History, from Mackintosh, vol. v., p. 77), are applicable to periods much later and of more pretension to liberty than that of Charles. They are yet, in fact, to be expounded. "If Magna Charta were fully executed, as it ought to be, every man would enjoy his liberty better than he doth." In connexion with this remarkable case, too, Sir Edward Coke (who argued it before the lords) presented, for the first time, to his astonished profession, the highest vigour of a noble and liberal thought, issuing, as it were, even out of the most formidable technicalities of law. "Shall I have an estate for lives or for years in England, and be tenant at will for my liberty? A freeman to be tenant at will for his freedom! There is no such tenure in all Littleton!" The excited state of the public mind during the arguments on this question is vividly conveyed in a letter I have found among the Harleian MSS. "The gentlemen's counsel for habeas corpus, Mr. Selden, Mr. Noy, Sir John Eliot at this moment lay a prisoner in the Gatehouse. He had been foremost to refuse the loan, was arrested in Cornwall, brought before the council table, and thence committed to prison. In prison, and before the council table, as in his place in the House of Commons, Eliot had the unfailing resource of fearlessness and a composed vigour. Wherever circumstances placed him, he knew that, so long as they left him life, they left him able to perform its duties. From the Gatehouse he forwarded to the king an able argument against the loan, which he concluded by a request, urged with a humble but brave simplicity, for his own immediate release. This document has been preserved. It commences with a protest against the supposition that "stubbornness and will" have been the motives of the writer's recent recusancy. "With a sad, yet a faithful heart," Eliot continues, "he now presumes to offer up the reasons that induced him. The rule of justice he takes to be the law; impartial arbiter of government and obedience; the support and strength of majesty; the observation of that justice by which subjection is commanded." Through a series of illustrious examples the writer then advances to his position of strict obedience to the laws, in the duty of resisting their outrage. "He could not, as he feared, without pressure to these immunities, become an actor in this loan, which by imprisonment and restraint was urged, contrary to the grants of the great charter, by so many glorious and victorious kings so many times confirmed. Though he was well assured by your majesty's promise that it should not become a precedent during the happiness of your reign, yet he conceived from thence a fear that succeeding ages might thereby take occasion for posterity to strike at the property of their goods." He concludes by assuring the king that he will never consent to "inconveniences in reason," or to the dispensation, violation, or impeachment of the laws. "No factious humour, nor disaffection led on by stubbornness and will, hath herein stirred or moved him, but the just obligation of his conscience, which binds him to the service of your majesty, in the observance of your laws; and he is hopeful that your majesty will be pleased to restore him to your favour, and his liberty, and to afford him the benefit of those laws which, in all humility, he craves."* Eliot probably never expected that this petition would be granted. Its publication effected his purpose in strengthening the resolutions of the people; and he quietly waited in his prison for the day of a new Parliament.

This was precipitated by the insolent fury of Buckingham, who had consummated the desperate condition of affairs by a new and unprovoked war with France. At the suggestion of the duke's outraged vanity,† Charles Sergeant Bramston, and Mr. Colthorp, pleaded yesterday with wonderful applause, even of shouting and clapping of hands: which is unusual in that place."

* Rushworth, vol. i., p. 429. Whitelocke says, that "Sir John Eliot took this way to inform the king what his council did not."—Memorials, p. 8. Anthony Wood oddly converts this into a statement that Eliot was obliged to write in this way to the king, because his (Eliot's) "counsel would not assist him otherwise."

† Clarendon distinctly assigns this as the motive: "In his embassy in France, where his person and presence was had dismissed the French servants of his young queen; she herself had been insulted;* the remonstrances of the French court answered by a seizure of French ships; and an expedition for the relief of Rochelle undertaken by the very court whose treachery had so lately assisted to reduce it. Recollecting the bitter sarcasm of Eliot,† Buckingham undertook the command of the present expedition in person; and, having concerted measures so wretchedly as to be obliged to disembark on the adjacent Isle of Rhé he there suffered his army to be baffled by an inferior force, and to be at length overtaken in a situation where valour was of no avail, and where death destroyed them dreadfully, without even the agency of an enemy.‡ The result of this was in all respects frightful; mutiny proved the least of the dangers that followed; and the financial difficulties of the court became so urgent that the last desperate and dreaded resource forced itself upon the king.§ The loan recusants were set at liberty, and writs for a new Parliament were issued.

Unprecedented excitement prevailed at the elections.* Sir John Eliot was triumphantly returned for Cornwall, and every country gentleman that had refused the loan was sent to the House of Commons. "We are, without question, undone!" exclaimed a court prophet; and the king, agitated by fear and rage, prepared himself to "lift the mask." Secret orders were transmitted to the Low Countries for the levy of 1000 German horse, and the purchase of 10,000 stand of arms, immediately to be conveyed to England.†

This famous third Parliament was opened by the king at Westminster, on the 17th of March, 1628, in a speech of insolent menace. If they did not do their duty, he told them, "I must use those other means which God hath put into my hands, to save that which the follies of other men may otherwise hazard to lose. Take not this as threatening; I scorn to threaten any but my equals."‡ Wonderful was the temper and decorum with which the great leaders of that powerful house listened to this pitiful display. The imagination rises in the contemplation of the profound statesmanship which distinguished every movement of these men, and it is difficult to describe it in terms of appropriate praise. Conscious of the rigour of the duties they had to perform, for these they reserved their strength. Not a word was wasted before the time of action came—not an energy fell to the ground as too great for the occasion. A resolved composure, a quiet confidence steadily shone from their slightest preparation; and the court, who had looked to wonderfully admired and esteemed (and, in truth, it was a wonder in the eyes of all men), and in which he appeared with all the lustre the wealth of England could adorn him with, and outshined all the bravery that court could dress itself in, and over-acted the whole nation in their own most peculiar vanities, he had the ambition to fix his eyes upon, and to dedicate his most violent affection to, a lady of a very sublime quality." But I will cut short the reader's impatience, and this interminable sentence, by saying at once that Buckingham fell violently in love with the young Queen of France, Anne of Austria, declared his passion, and was listened to with anything but resentment. With what success the duke might ultimately have urged his suit, it would be impossible to say, since great authorities differ; but it is certain that his purpose was abruptly foiled by the interference of Cardinal Richelieu, in whom he suddenly discovered a formidable rival. The mad desire to foil this great statesman and most absurd lover, and to be able to return to Anne of Austria in all the triumphs of a conqueror, now urged him to these extremities against France. The thing is scarcely credible, but so it certainly appears to have been. What is to be said of the wretched weakness of Charles? See Mémoires inédits du Comte de Brienne, i., Eclaircissements. Madame de Motteville, Mémoires d'Anne d'Autriche. Aikin's Count of Charles, vol. i., p. 67. Brodie's Hist. of British Empire, vol. ii., p. 139. Lingard's History, vol. ix., p. 361. Clarendon, vol. i., p. 31. Carte (vol. iv., p. 132) has attempted to throw discredit on it by the production of dates from the Mercurius François, but unsuccessfully.

* This is not an occasion to notice the personal disputes of the king and queen, nor the way in which, for his own purposes, they were secretly inflamed by Buckingham. Charles, like most unfaithful and decorous husbands, suspected his wife; and his wife, a woman of energy and spirited sense, despised him. Buckingham's insults to the queen are described by Clarendon, vol. i., p. 31, and other writers. See History, from Mackintosh, vol. v., p. 62. I may add, that the account of the young queen's reception of the news of the dismissal of her servants, as given in a letter of the day, is extremely characteristic of a quick temper redeemed by a ready self-command. "It is said, also, the queen, when she understood the design, grew very impatient, and brake the glasse windows with her little fist; but since I heare her rage is appeased, and the king and shee, since they went together to Nonsuche, have been very jecund together."—Harl. MSS., 383. Ellis's Original Letters, vol. iii., p. 239.

† See a letter of Denzil Hollis to Wentworth. Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 42. Rushworth, vol. i., p. 465. Carte, vol. iv., p. 176, et seq. Many curious particulars, and especially the letters of Charles to Buckingham, connected with this affair, will be found in Hardwicke's State Papers, vol. i., p. 13, et seq. I shall have to advert to it again in noticing one of Eliot's speeches.

‡ Sir Robert Cotton was consulted by the lords of the council, and his advice is said to have determined the matter. It is melancholy to see, however, that this great scholar was tempted on this occasion (see his Paper in Rushworth, vol. i., p. 467) into concessions extremely unworthy of him. It is probable that a rumour of this, coupled with his silence on the affair of the loan, led to his defeat at the Westminster election. Eliot was warmly attached to him. It was at the meetings held at his house, where all the eminent men of the day assembled, that Eliot's intimate friendship with Selden most probably commenced. See the Cottonian MSS., Jul. C., iii.

* An extract from a manuscript letter, dated March 8, 1627, will present a lively notion of this excitement. It has quite a modern air: "There was a turbulent election of burgesses at Westminster, whereof the duke (Buckingham), being steward, made account he should, by his authority and vicinity, have put in Sir Robert Pye. It continued three days, and when Sir Robert Pye's party cried 'A Pye! a Pye! a Pye!' the adverse party would cry 'A pudding! a pudding! a pudding!' and others, 'A lie! a lie! a lie!' In fine, Bradshaw, a brewer, and Maurice, a grocer, carried it from him by about a thousand voices, they passing by also Sir Robert Cotton, besides our man and Mr. Hayward, who were their last burgesses, because, as it is said, they had discontented their neighbours in urging the payment of the loan. It is feared (saith mine author), because such patriots are chosen everywhere, the Parliament will not last above eight days. You hear of our famous election in Essex, where Sir Francis Barrington and Sir Harbottle Grimston had all the voices of 16,500 men."—Sloane MSS.

† There is no doubt of this. The pretence afterward assigned was to defend the kingdom from invasion (Carte, iv., p. 183); but the real object was to overawe the House of Commons. See Rushworth, vol. i., p. 474. A commission was issued at the same time (concurrent with the issuing of the election writs) to certain privy councillors, to consider of raising money by impositions, or otherwise, "wherein form and circumstances must be dispensed with, rather than the substance be lost." These schemes were all defeated, but their discovery necessarily exasperated the Commons.—Rushworth, vol. i., p. 614.

‡ Rushworth, vol. i., p. 477. The men to whom this foolish impertinence was addressed are thus described in a manuscript letter of the time by a very moderate politician: "The House of Commons was both yesterday and to-day as full as one could sit by another; and they say it is the most noble and magnanimous assembly that ever these walls contained. And I heard a lord intimate they were able to buy the Upper House (his majesty only excepted) thrice over, notwithstanding there be of lords temporal to the number of 118: and what lord in England would be followed by so many freeholders as some of these are?"—Letter, dated March 21, 1628, in Sloane's MSS.

strengthen themselves by the provocation of outrage, were lost in a mixed feeling of wonder and doubt, perhaps of even hope. "Was it possible that the 'new counsels' had cooled the fire of patriotism?" Finch, a man known to be favourably affected to the court, was chosen speaker. "Was the expediency of some compromise recognised at last?" A resolution was passed to grant a supply, no less than five subsidies, and to be paid within twelve months! "Was all this possible?" "Were these the men who had been sent from every quarter of the country to oppose the court, to resent the wrongs of their constituents, and to avenge their own?" Old Secretary Cooke hurried down with feeble haste to grasp at the subsidies. He was then quietly told that they could not be paid; that the bill for collecting them, indeed, should not be framed until certain necessary securities were given by the king for the future enjoyment of liberty and property among the subjects of the kingdom. The crest-fallen ministers resorted to their hypocritical arts of evasion and refusal; the patriot leaders prepared for action. The consummate policy we have described had resolved the dispute into the clearest elements of right and wrong; and the position of the Commons against the court was firmly and immovably determined.* What they had resolved to do could now be done; and, the court policy once openly betrayed, the passionate eloquence of Eliot was heard, opening up to the public abhorrence the wounds that had lately been inflicted upon the liberties and laws.†

* I refer the reader, for the only exact account of the proceedings of this Parliament, to the journals and debates. Dr. Lingard has described the conduct of the leaders of the country party very faithfully. "They advanced step by step; first resolving to grant a supply, then fixing it at the tempting amount of five subsidies, and, lastly, agreeing that the whole should be paid within the short space of twelve months. But no art, no entreaty could prevail on them to pass their resolution in the shape of a bill. It was held out as a lure to the king; it was gradually brought nearer and nearer to his grasp, but they still refused to surrender their hold; they required, as a previous condition, that he should give his assent to those liberties which they claimed as the birthright of Englishmen."—History, vol. ix., p. 379. See, also, Hume, vol. v., p. 160.

† "Sir John Eliot," says the writer of the Ephemeris Parliamentaria, "did passionately and rhetorically set forth our late grievances; he misliked much the violating of our laws." This speech is, unfortunately, lost. "What pity it is," observes Mr. Brodie, "that no copy has been preserved of Sir John Eliot's speech upon the grievances! He appears to have been the most eloquent man of his time." Echoing his regret, I am surprised that Mr. Brodie should have passed without mention a most remarkable speech of Eliot, which I shall have immediate occasion to allude to, delivered by him on the same subject in the present session, and admirably handed down to us from the MSS. of Napier. He had noble seconders on the occasion referred to in the text. "I read of a custom," said Sir Robert Philips (rising after Eliot had ceased), "among the old Romans, that once every year they held a solemn feast for their slaves, at which they had liberty, without exception, to speak what they would, thereby to ease their afflicted minds; which being finished, they severally returned to their former servitude. This may, with some resemblance and distinction, well set forth our present state; when now, after the revolution of some time, and grievous suffering of many violent oppressions, we have, as those slaves had, a day of liberty of speech; but shall not, I trust, be hereafter slaves, for we are free. Yet what new illegal proceedings our states and persons have suffered under, my heart yearns to think, my tongue falters to utter! I can live," passionately Philips continued, "although another, who has no right, be put to live with me; nay, I can live although I pay excises and impositions more than I do. But to have my liberty, which is the soul of my life, taken from me by power; and to have my body pent up in a jail, without remedy by law, and to be so adjudged! O improv-

The result, after many committees on the liberty of the subject, was a resolution to prepare the memorable petition of right.* Sir John Eliot took part in all the debates; lifted them to the most vigorous and passionately determined tone; and now acted in all respects as the great leader of the House.

Charles's attempts to get hold of the subsidies continued to be unceasing, and every art was resorted to by his ministers. Buckingham, meanwhile, covered with his recent failures and disgraces, had hitherto kept himself out of view; and it is another proof of the noble policy we have characterized in every movement of the popular leaders at this time, that, intent upon their grander objects, they passed the subdued favourite, so long as he was not intruded before them, in contemptuous silence. The court party, however, rarely failed to misconstrue conduct of this sort; and now, with a fatal precipitancy, presumed upon this silence. Cooke, the king's secretary, by way of an inducement to suffer him to touch the subsidies, assured the House that the king was very grateful for their vote, and, moreover, that Buckingham had implored his majesty to grant all the popular desires.† An extract from a manuscript letter of the time will convey the most lively notion of what followed. "Sir John Eliot instantly leaped up, and taxed the secretary for intermingling a subject's speech with the king's message. It could not become any subject to bear himself in such a fashion, as if no grace ought to descend from the king to the people, nor any loyalty ascend from the people to the king, but through him only. Whereunto many in the House made an exclamation, 'Well spoken, Sir John Eliot!'"‡ From a more detailed report, I will give an extract of this speech, happily characteristic of Eliot's style, of the dignified phrase, not unmingled with a composed sarcasm, with which, in the present instance, the sharpness of his reident ancestors! O unwise forefathers! to be so curious in providing for the quiet possession of our laws, and the liberties of Parliament, and to neglect our persons and bodies, and to let them lie in prison, and that, durante beneplacito, remediless! If this be law, why do we talk of liberties! Why do we trouble ourselves with a dispute about law, franchises, property of goods, and the like? What may any man call his own, if not the liberty of his person?" Sir Benjamin Rudyard followed. "This is the crisis of Parliaments," he said; "by this we shall know whether Parliaments will live or die!" To him succeeded the dark and doubtful energy of Wentworth, and the undimmed clearness of the venerable Sir Edward Coke. "I'll begin," said the latter, after approving the proposed supplies, "with a noble record. It cheers me to think of it! It is worthy to be written in letters of gold! Loans against the will of the subject are against reason and the franchises of the land, and they desire restitution. Franchise! What a word is that 'franchise!'"—Parl. Hist., vol. vii., p. 363, et seq. These men were indeed capable of the great duties that fell to them. [Such specimens of eloquence as these go far to illustrate the opinion of the great orator of our country, that the finest bursts of parliamentary eloquence on record are to be found in the debates of the Parliaments in the reign of Charles I.—C.]

* The grievances detailed before these committees were reduced to six heads: attendance at the council board, imprisonment, confinement, designation to foreign employment, martial law, undue proceedings in matters of judicature. These were severally debated, and Eliot spoke upon all of them with characteristic energy. The portions that remain of his speeches are sufficient to indicate this—Parl. Hist., vol. vii., p. 399–405, &c.

† Parl. Hist., vol. vii., p. 431.

‡ Sloane MSS., 4177. Letter from Mr. Pory. Another account will be found among these manuscripts, in a letter from Mr. Mead, dated April 12, 1628.

buke was tempered: "My joy at this message is not without trouble, which must likewise be declared. I must disburden this affliction, or I cannot, otherwise, so lively and so faithfully express my devotion to the service of this House as I had resolved. I know not by what fatality or infortunity it has crept in, but I observe, in the close of the secretary's relation, mention made of another in addition to his majesty; and that which hath been formerly a matter of complaint I find here still—a mixture with his majesty, not only in his business, but in name. Is it that any man conceives the mention of others, of what quality soever, can add encouragement or affection to us, in our duties and loyalties towards his majesty, or give them greater latitude or extent than naturally they have? Or is it supposed that the power or interest of any man can add more readiness to his majesty, in his gracious inclination towards us, than his own goodness gives him? I cannot believe it! But, sir, I am sorry there is occasion that these things should be argued; or that this mixture, which was formerly condemned, should appear again. I beseech you, sir, let it not be hereafter; let no man take this boldness within these walls, to introduce it! It is contrary to the custom of our fathers, and the honour of our times. I desire that such interposition may be let alone, and that all his majesty's regards and goodness towards this House may spring alone from his confidence of our loyalty and affections."* The secretary remained silent, but the court remembered that rebuke bitterly.

* Equally firm, however, against its threatening and cajoling, the Commons persisted in their great purpose. Resolutions were passed declaratory of the rights of the people, and a conference appointed with the Lords, that they might concur in a petition to the throne, founded upon Magna Charta and other statutes; directed to the security of the person, as the foremost of all securities; strengthened on that point by twelve direct and thirty-one indirect precedents; completed by certain resolutions of their own, reducing those precedents to a distinct unity of purpose;† and to be called a petition of right, because requiring nothing save the recognition and direction of violated laws. The Lords and Commons met, and the constitutional lawyers stated their case with a startling clearness. "It lies not under Mr.

* Parl. Hist., vol. vii., p. 433. In this speech, also, Eliot, referring to the king's thankful recognition of the vote of subsidies, and the honeyed words he had addressed to them through Cooke, expressive of his sense of their claims, threw out a remark in which there appears an ominous union of sarcasm and sternness. "I presume we have all received great satisfaction from his majesty in his present gracious answer and resolution for the business of this House; in his answer to our petition for religion, so particularly made; in his resolution in that other consideration concerning the point, ALREADY SETTLED HERE, in declaration of our liberties; and for the Parliament in general."

† These resolutions were four in number, and had for their object the security of the subject from those infamous pretences of the court lawyers and court judges, which had been so remarkably exhibited in the case of the five members. See them in Rushworth, vol. i., p. 513. Parl. Hist., vol. vii., p. 407. The profound skill and judgment of the leaders of the Commons, by sealing down the old statutes thus, at once shut out every possible plea of silence or evasion from the corrupt judges, and struck from under them their old resource to antagonism enactments, judicial precedents, and exercises of prerogative.

Attorney's cap," exclaimed Sir Edward Coke, "to answer any one of our arguments." "With my own hand," said Selden, "I have written out all the records from the Tower, the Exchequer, and the King's Bench, and I will engage my head Mr. Attorney shall not find in all these archives a single precedent omitted."* The close of the conference elicited from the Lords a series of counter-resolutions, which were immediately rejected by Eliot and his friends, as nothing more than an ingenious subterfuge. These resolutions, in point of fact, if agreed to, would, after recognising the legality of the precedents urged, have left the matter precisely where it was. The king's word was to be the chief security.†

The Lords, in truth, had been tampered with; and the court heedlessly betrayed this by proposing, a few days after, in a royal message, precisely the same security, with the addition of a piece of advice that one regrets to see so evidently wasted. It would have been hailed with nods of such profuse delight by a parcel of Chinese mandarins. "The wrath of a king is like the roaring of a lion; and all laws, with his wrath, are of no effect; but the king's favour is like the dew upon the grass; there all will prosper!"‡ Undoubtedly this was lost upon the present audience. Eliot, who was well read in literature, might, probably, have reminded Philips or Selden of the leonine propensities of the Athenian weaver, who aggravated his voice, however, to such an extent, in roaring, that at last he came to roar as gently as a dove or a nightingale. Certainly no other notice was taken. The Commons returned to their house, and quietly, and without a single dissentient, ordered their lawyers to throw the matter of their petition into the shape of a bill, that the responsibility of openly rejecting it might fall on the Lords and the king.

Message succeeded message, but still the

* See the reports of the conference in the Journals. Rushworth, vol. i., p. 527, et seq.; and Parl. Hist., vol. vii., p. 409, et seq. The legal research and vast ability displayed by the popular leaders in this conference determined the Lords to hear counsel for the crown. One of these, however, Sergeant Ashley, having argued in behalf of the prerogative in the high tone of the last reign, was ordered into custody by their lordships, who at the same time assured the Commons that he had no authority from them for what he had said. (See Parl. Hist., vol. viii., p. 47 for the offensive argument; and afterward, p. 53 and p. 68.) This was a somewhat strong step to take against a king's counsel, employed at a free conference; and Mr. Hallam urges it (Const. Hist., vol. i., p. 533) as a "remarkable proof of the rapid growth of popular principles." It is a compliment to the growing influence of the Lower House, but certainly no proof of the popular principles of a body of men who, the very moment after they had thus seemed to condemn arbitrary doctrines, proposed to grant to the king in extraordinary cases, the necessity of which he was to determine, a power of commitment without showing cause! This was robbing Peter to pay Paul with a vengeance! See their five propositions in Rushworth, vol. i., p. 546. An anecdote of one of their lordships which occurred at this time is worth subjoining. As the Earl of Suffolk was passing from the conference into the committee chamber of the House, he insolently swore at one of the members of the Commons, and said Mr. Selden deserved to be hanged, for that he had rased a record. This was immediately noised about, and came to the ears of Eliot. He took up the matter with great warmth, in vindication of his regard for Selden, had the circumstances investigated by a committee, and proposed some stringent resolutions against the earl, "which were agreed unto by the whole House." See Commons' Journals, April 17, 1628; and Parl. Hist., vol. vii., p. 452.

† See Rushworth, vol. i., p. 546.

‡ See Parl. Hist., vol. viii., p. 81. Rushworth, vol. i., p. 551. Aikin's Court of Charles, vol. i., p. 206.

Commons proceeded. Briefly and peremptorily, at last, Charles desired, through his secretary, to know decidedly whether the House would or would not rest upon his royal word. "Upon this there was silence for a good space."* Pym was the first to break it; and Eliot hastened to relieve Pym from the personal dilemma in which his fearless acuteness threatened to place him. "I move," said he, "that this proposition be put to the question, because they that would have it do urge us to that point."† The question was rejected. Charles instantly sent down another message, peremptorily warning them not "to encroach on that sovereignty or prerogative which God hath put into our hands," and threatening to end the session on Tuesday sennight at the farthest. "Whereupon," say the Journals, "Sir John Eliot rose and spoke." He complained bitterly of the proposed shortness of the session. "Look," he exclaimed, "how many messages we have! Interruptions, misreports, and misrepresentations produce these messages. I fear," continued Eliot, "his majesty yet knows not what we go about. Let us make some enlargement, and put it again before him."‡ An address for this purpose was instantly agreed to by the House, was presented by the speaker, and again the king found himself completely baffled. It would be too painful to follow his windings and doublings through their long and mean course, but that at every turn some new evidence arrests us of the brilliant powers and resources of the great statesman whose character we seek to illustrate.

So clear and decisive was the last statement of the Commons, that Charles fancied he had no resource now but to intimate his assent to the proposed bill; yet, even in doing this, he sought, by an insidious restriction, to withhold from the old statutes and precedents that unity and directness of purpose which the cementing resolutions of the House were, for the first time, about to give to them. "We vindicate," Wentworth had said, "what? new things? No! our ancient, legal, and vital liberties—by re-enforcing the laws enacted by our ancestors, by setting such a seal upon them as no licentious spirit shall dare hereafter to enter upon them!" "I assent," said Charles, unworthily at the same moment seeking to evade this seal, "but so as that Magna Charta and the other six statutes alluded to may be without additions, paraphrases, or explanations."* The Commons had not had time to spurn the proffered deceit, when, with a childish imbecility, the king sent down another message, desiring that they should take his word.† The House was at this moment sitting in committee. Secretary Cooke, who brought the message, concluded with an earnest desire that "the debate upon it should be done before the House, and not before the committee." He had good reasons for this; for he knew what arguments might possibly be urged, and that the court had at least one security against them, in the secret commands which the king had already placed upon the timid speaker.‡ Sir John Eliot, conscious of the weakness of Finch, saw through the secretary's purpose, and effectually foiled it. With great energy he urged proceeding in committee as more likely to be honourable and advantageous. "That way," he said, "leads most to truth. It is a more open way. Every man may there add his reasons, and make answer upon the hearing of other men's reasons and arguments."§ The House assented; the debate proceeded with closed doors; and the result was a plain and determined resolution by the Commons that they could only take the king's word in a parliamentary way. They passed their bill, and sent it up to the Lords.||

To the Lords the king now addressed a letter, stating that he could not, without the overthrow of his sovereignty, part with the power of committing the subject, but promising, in all ordinary cases, to obey Magna Charta, and not to imprison, for the future, "any man for refusing a loan, nor for any cause which, in his judgment and conscience, he did not conceive necessary for the public good."¶ This letter was instantly sent to the Lower House, and all the notice we find of it in their journals is given in four words—"They laid it aside." Not so the Lords, who, with customary pliancy, founded upon it a saving clause to reserve his

* Rushworth, vol. i., p. 553. Parl. Hist., vol. viii., p. 95.

† There is no mention of this in the debates, but I have it on the authority of a manuscript letter in the collection of Dr. Birch. I may take this opportunity of stating that that learned person had with his own hand transcribed for publication, from the Harleian and various other collections, a vast number of letters, illustrative of the reigns of James I. and Charles I.; but which remain to this day on the shelves of the Sloane collection as the transcriber left them. Their arrangement and publication would confer a valuable service on history, yet I fear there is no prevailing encouragement for undertakings of this sort. It is to be regretted.

‡ Parl. Hist., vol. viii., p. 99. Rushworth, vol. i., p. 555. In the address which was voted in consequence of Eliot's proposition, the king is advised distinctly of the nature of the resolutions they had passed, as I have above explained them. "They have not the least thought of straining or enlarging the former laws; the bounds of their desires extend no farther than to some necessary explanation of that which is truly comprehended within the just sense and meaning of those laws, with some moderate provision for execution and performance."—Parl. Hist., vol. viii., p. 102. Sir Benjamin Rudyard expressed the matter in the course of the debate on this address, in a more homely way. "For my own part," he said, "I should be very glad to see that good, old, decrepit law of Magna Charta, which hath been so long kept in—laid bedrid, as it were—I should be glad, I say, to see it walk abroad again, with new vigour and lustre." The conclusion of his speech was a covered rebuke to Charles. "No man is bound to be rich or great—no, nor to be wise: but every man is bound to be honest."

* Speech of the lord-keeper, Parl. Hist., vol. iii., p. 98. Rushworth, vol. i., p. 557. The miserable fatuity of consenting thus to their proceeding by bill, while he robs them of all the advantages they sought to achieve by that mode of procedure, is too apparent.

† Rushworth, vol. i., p. 557. Parl. Hist., vol. viii., p. 103. The secretary's wriggling method of delivering this message was curious and instructive.

‡ Finch had already commenced his bargain for promotion by promising the king to discountenance, as much as possible, any aspersion of his ministers, and, more especially, of Buckingham. I have already suggested the only motive the Commons could have had in electing this man as their speaker. They appear to have desired to impress the court, on their first meeting, with a sense of how little they were disposed to be actuated in their duties by any violent temper, or the resentment of individual wrongs. They committed an error, but a generous one.

§ Parl. Hist., vol. viii., p. 104.

|| In the interval between this and the first assent of Charles, the affair of Dr. Mainwaring was brought before the House. I shall have to allude to it in the biography of Pym.

¶ The Lords' Journals, May 12. Rushworth, vol. i., p. 560. Parl. Hist., vol. viii., p. 110.

 Rushworth, vol. i., p. 561. Parl. Hist., vol. viii., p. 112.

majesty's "sovereign power," and, so weakened, sent down the bill. "Let us take heed," said Coke, on hearing the addition, "what we yield unto; Magna Charta is such a fellow that he will have no sovereign." Selden followed with a singular warning and precedent;* the clause was generally condemned; and, after a conference, the Lords consented to abandon it. The petition of right, adopted by both Houses, was now presented to the throne.

Charles, for two long months, had, by every sort of subterfuge, struggled to avoid this crisis. It had arrived, notwithstanding. On the one hand, want awaited him; on the other, the surrender of his darling power. Incapable of either, he sought a passage of escape through one perfidy more, and in this he might have succeeded but for Eliot. He sent for the judges, and, with the most solemn injunctions to secrecy, put three questions to them respecting the proposed petition of rights: "Whether the king may commit without showing a cause?" "Whether the judges ought to deliver on habeas corpus a person committed?" "Whether he should not deprive himself of such power of commitment by granting the petition of right?" The judges answered to the first and second questions, that the general rule of law was against him, but exceptive cases might arise; and to the third they said, that it must be left to the courts of justice in each particular case.† Consoling himself with these assurances, he went to the House of Lords in a sort of secret triumph, resolved to assent to the bill, yet in such terms as might still leave its construction to his convenient parasites on the bench. The Commons hurried up to their lordships' bar. "Gentlemen," he said, with a sullen abruptness, "I am come hither to perform my duty. I think no man can think it long, since I have not taken so many days in answering the petition as ye spent weeks in framing it; and I am come hither to show you that, as well in formal things as in essential, I desire to give you as much content as in me lies." He then, to the surprise of his hearers, instead of the ordinary soit droit fait comme il est désiré, delivered the following by way of royal assent: "The king willeth that right be done according to the laws and customs of the realm, and that the statutes be put in due execution, that his subjects may have no cause to complain of any wrong or oppressions, contrary to their just rights and liberties, to the preservation whereof he holds himself in conscience as well obliged as of his own prerogative."*

The next meeting of the House of Commons was a very momentous one. The singular treachery of the king had struck with a paralyzing effect upon many of the members; it seemed hopeless to struggle with it farther; it had continued proof against every effort; all the constitutional usages of Parliament had fallen exhausted from the unequal contest; and already the House saw itself dissolved, without the achievement of a single guarantee for the liberty and property of the kingdom. The best and the bravest began to despair.

But then the genius of Eliot rose to the grandeur of that occasion; and, by its wonderful command over every manner passion, by its great disregard of every personal danger, wrested the very sense of hopeless discomfiture to the achievement of a noble security. Knowing more thoroughly than others the character of the king, he knew that he was yet assailable. His conduct at this awful crisis has seemed to me to embody a perfect union of profound sagacity and fearless magnanimity, unsurpassed, perhaps unequalled, in the history of the most illustrious statesmen.

"On Tuesday, the 3d of June," says Rushworth, "the king's answer to the petition of right was read in the House of Commons, and seemed too scant. Whereupon Sir John Eliot stood up and made a long speech, wherein he gave forth so full and lively a representation of all grievances, both general and particular, as if they had never before been mentioned."* But observe with what consummate policy. It was not a representation of the grievances alone, such as had been urged some months before:

pears through all these proceedings; for he afterward proved himself quite as capable of openly violating a statute enacted in the regular manner, as of playing the game of evasion with his duty and his conscience. But wounded vanity had clearly much to do with it.

* Rushworth, vol. i., p. 568. Parl. Hist., vol. viii., p. 145.

† Rushworth, vol. i., p. 591. The indefatigable collector, however, only gives a brief outline of the speech. It may be worth notice also, that, owing to some confusion in his papers, a portion of this outline was printed in the wrong place, and still stands as a separate speech both in his work and the Parliamentary History. See the latter, vol. vii., p. 399; and Rushworth, vol. i., p. 520.

* The debate on this question was one of the most remarkable, for a display of ready knowledge and acute judgment. See, especially, Selden's speech, and that delivered by Glanville before the Lords. Rushworth, vol. i., p. 562-579. A precedent had been urged by the opposite party, from a petition in the reign of Edward I. Selden's all-wonderful learning never failed him. "That clause of 25th Edward I.," he said, at once silencing his opponents, "was not in the petition, but in the king's answer." Then mark how triumphantly he turned the tables on them; the passage is, in all respects, remarkable. "In 25th Edward I., the Commons, by petition or bill, did obtain the liberties and articles at the end of the Parliament; they were extracted out of the roll, and proclaimed abroad. The addition was added in the proclamation; but in the bill there was no 'savant,' yet afterward it was put in; and, to prove this, though it is true there is no Parliament-roll of that year, yet we have histories of that time. In the library at Oxford there is a journal of a Parliament of that very year which mentions so much; as, also, in the public library at Cambridge there is in a MS. that belonged to an abbey. It was of the same year, 25th Edward I., and it mentions the Parliament, and the petitions, and 'articulos quos petierunt sic confirmavit rex, ut in fine adderet, salvo jure coronæ regis,' and they came in by proclamation. But, in London, when the people heard of this clause being added in the end, they fell into execration for that addition; and the great earls that went away satisfied from the Parliament, hearing of this, went to the king, and afterward it was cleared at the next Parliament. Now there is no Parliament-roll of this of that time; only in the end of Edward III. there is one roll that recites it." So closed the debate on "sovereign power." I may add that, upon this proposed addition, that notably bungling intriguer, Bishop Williams, eminently distinguished himself. He professed to be an ardent promoter of the petition of right, yet he stood up mightily for the clause. The consequence was a meeting between himself and Buckingham, a perfect reconciliation, and, as we are told, "his grace had the bishop's consent, with a little asking, that he would be his grace's faithful servant in the next session of Parliament; and was allowed to hold up a seeming enmity, and his own popular estimation, that he might the sooner do the work." Such were the public men with whom Eliot had to deal, and upon the faith of such as these have attempts been made upon his character. See Hackett's Scrinia Reserata, p. 77, et seq.

† The questions and answers were discovered, at length, in the Hargrave MSS., xxvii., 97. Hallam's Constitutional History, vol. i., p. 533. Ellis's Original Letters, new series, vol. iii., p. 350. History, from Mackintosh, vol. v., p. 92. Much unnecessary trouble, on the part of the king, ap-it was a pursuit of them to their poisonous spring and source; it was an exhibition beside them of their hideous origin; it was a direction of the wrath of the people against one oppressor, whose rank was not beyond its reach; it was, in one word, a fatal blow at Charles through that quarter where alone he seemed to be vulnerable—it was, in its aim and result, a philippic against the Duke of Buckingham. Demosthenes never delivered one more clear, plain, convincing, irresistible. It calls to mind that greatest of orators. Eliot's general style was more immediately cast in the manner of Cicero, but here he rose beyond it, into the piercing region of the Greek. Demosthenic strength and closeness of reasoning, clearness of detail, and appalling earnestness of style, are all observable in the naked outline I now present. What may have been the grandeur and the strength of its complete proportions? I recollect a remark of Mr. Hazlitt's, that the author of this speech might have originated the "dogged style" of one of our celebrated political writers. "There is no affectation of wit in it," he continued, "no studied ornament, no display of fancied superiority. The speaker's whole heart and soul are in his subject; he is full of it; his mind seems, as it were, to surround and penetrate every part of it;" nothing diverts him from his purpose, or interrupts the course of his reasoning for a moment. No thought of the personal loss, then frightfully incurred, no fear of the dangers that were sure to follow. His argument rose paramount, for it was the life of the nation's liberties.*

"Mr. Speaker," Eliot began, "we sit here as the great council of the king, and, in that capacity, it is our duty to take into consideration the present state and affairs of the kingdom. In this consideration, I confess, many a sad thought hath affrighted me; and that not only in respect of our dangers from abroad, which yet I know are great, as they have been often in this place pressed and dilated to us, but in respect of our disorders here at home, which do enforce those dangers, and by which they are occasioned. For, I believe, I shall make it clear unto you that, as at first the cause of these dangers were our disorders, so our disorders now are yet our greatest dangers. It is not so much the potency of our enemies as the weakness of ourselves that threatens us. That saying of the father may be assumed by us: Non tam potentia sua, quam negligentia nostra. Our want of true devotion to Heaven, our insincerity and doubling in religion, our want of councils, our precipitate actions, the insufficiency or unfaithfulness of our generals abroad, the ignorance or corruptions of our ministers at home, the impoverishing of the sovereign, the oppression and depression of the subject, the exhausting of our treasures, the waste of our provisions, consumption of our ships, destruction of our men—these make the advantage to our enemies, not the reputation of their arms. And if in these there be not reformation, we need no foes abroad. Time itself will ruin us!"

A slight interruption from the ministers here appears to have given Eliot a moment's pause. With admirable address he appealed to the House. "You will all hold it necessary that what I am about to urge seems not an aspersion on the state, or imputation on the government, as I have known such motions misinterpreted. Far is this from me to propose, who have none but clear thoughts of the excellency of the king, nor can have other ends than the advancement of his majesty's glory. I shall desire," he continued, "a little of your patience extraordinary to open the particulars, which I shall do with what brevity I may answerable to the importance of the cause and the necessity now upon us, yet with such respect and observation to the time as I hope it shall not be thought troublesome."

He then proceeded to open up the question of "insincerity and doubling in religion." He pursued it through many strong and terrible examples. "Will you have authority of books?" he asked, furnishing them with a series of the most striking passages from the recent collections of the committee that had been sitting on religious affairs. "Will you have proofs of men?" he continued. "Witness the hopes, witness the presumptions, witness the reports of all the papists generally. Observe the dispositions of commanders, the trust of officers, the confidence in secretaries to employments in this kingdom, in Ireland, and elsewhere! These all will show it hath too great a certainty; and to this add too the incontrovertible evidence of that all-powerful hand which we have felt so sorely. For if the heavens oppose themselves to us for our impiety, it is we that first opposed the heavens."

Eliot next handled the "want of councils." "This," he said, "is that great disorder in a state with which there cannot be stability. If effects may show their causes, as they are often a perfect demonstration of them, our misfortunes, our disasters, serve to prove it, and the consequences they draw with them. If reason be allowed in this dark age, the judgment of dependencies and foresight of contingencies in affairs do confirm it. For, if we view ourselves at home, are we in strength, are we in reputation equal to our ancestors? If we view ourselves abroad, are our friends as many, are our enemies no more? Do our friends retain their safety and possessions? Do not our enemies enlarge themselves, and gain from them and us? To what counsel owe we the loss of the Palatinate, where we sacrificed both our honour and our men—obstructing those greater powers appointed for that service by which it might have been defensible? What counsel gave direction to the late action, whose wounds are yet bleeding—I mean the expedition to Rhée, of which there is yet so sad a memory in all men? What design for us, or advantage to our state, could that import! You know the wisdom of our ancestors, and the practice of their times; how they preserved their safeties! We all know, and have as much cause to doubt as they had, the greatness and ambition of that kingdom which the old world could not satisfy.* Against this greatness and ambition we likewise know the proceedings of that princess, that never-to-be-forgotten, excellent queen, Elizabeth, whose name, without admiration, falls not into mention even with her enemies! You know how she advanced herself, and how she advanced this nation in glory and in state; how she depressed her enemies, and how she upheld her friends; how she enjoyed a full security, and made them then our scorn who now are made our terror!"

* It is a saying of May, the historian, in reference to this and other speeches, that "the freedom that Sir John Eliot used in Parliament was by the people applauded, though much taxed by the courtiers, and censured by some of a more politique reserve (considering the times) among his own party, in that kind that Tacitus censures Thraseas Pætus, as thinking such freedom a needless, and therefore a foolish thing, where no cure could be hoped by it. Sibi periculum, nec aliis libertatem." This is the old reproach of the timid and indifferent. I am about to show, in the present instance, that he incurred the danger, which soon after fell upon his life, in no spirit of idle forwardness, but for the achievement of a great practical purpose, which he did achieve.

The principles of that policy by which Elizabeth had effected all this, Eliot now developed to the House, exhibiting beside them the singularly opposite and pitiful contrast of the prevailing policy. The passage is remarkable for its subtlety, no less than for its exactest truth. "Some of the principles she built on were these; and, if I mistake, let reason and our statesmen contradict me. First, to maintain, in what she might, a unity in France, that that kingdom, being at peace within itself, might be a bulwark to keep back the power of Spain by land. Next, to preserve an amity and league between that state and us, that so we might come in aid of the Low Countries, and by that means receive their ships and help them by sea. This TREBLE CORD, so working between France, the States, and England, might enable us, as occasion should require, to give assistance unto others. It was by this means, the experience of that time doth tell us, that we were not only free from those fears that now possess and trouble us, but our names were also fearful to our enemies. See now what correspondency our actions have with this; square them by these rules. They have induced, as a necessary consequence, a division in France between the Protestants and their king, of which we have had too woful and lamentable experience. They have made an absolute breach between that state and us, and so entertain us against France, and France in preparation against us, that we have nothing to promise to our neighbours—hardly to ourselves! Nay, observe the time in which they were attempted, and you shall find it not only varying from those principles, but directly contrary and opposite, ex diametro, to those ends! and such as, from the issue and success, rather might be thought a conception of Spain than begotten here with us!"

Every word was now falling with tremendous effect upon Buckingham, and the ministers could endure it no longer. Sir Humphry May, the chancellor of the duchy, and one of the privy council, started from his seat, "expressing," as Rushworth states it, "a dislike. But the House ordered Sir John Eliot to go on. Whereupon he proceeded thus: 'Mr. Speaker, I am sorry for this interruption, but much more sorry if there hath been occasion—wherein, as I shall submit myself wholly to your judgment, to receive what censure you should give me, if I have offended; so, in the integrity of my intentions and clearness of my thoughts, I must still retain this confidence; that no greatness shall deter me from the duties which I owe to the service of my king and country, but that, with a true English heart, I shall discharge myself as faithfully, and as really to the extent of my poor power, as any man whose honours or whose offices most strictly oblige him.'"

With admirable self-possession, Eliot then resumed his speech at the very point of interruption, and continued to urge the madness of breaking peace with France at a time so emphatically unfortunate. "You know," he said, "the dangers Denmark was in, and how much they concerned us; what in respect of our alliance and the country, what in the importance of the Sound (what an advantage to our enemies the gain thereof would be!). What loss, then, what prejudice to us, by this disunion! we breaking upon France, France enraged by us, and the Netherlands at amazement between both! no longer could we intend to aid that luckless king, whose loss is our disaster."* Here Eliot having, as it appears to me, reduced the matter ad absurdum, suddenly turned round to the ministerial bench. "Can those, now, that express their troubles at the hearing of these things, and have so often told us, in this place, of their knowledge in the conjunctures and disjunctures of affairs, say they advised in this? Was this an act of council, Mr. Speaker! I have more charity than to think it; and, unless they make a confession of themselves, I cannot believe it."

The orator now, under cover of a discussion of a third division of his argument, "the insufficiency and unfaithfulness of our generals," dragged Buckingham personally upon the scene. For a moment, however, before doing this, he paused. "What shall I say! I wish there were not cause to mention it; and, but out of apprehension of the danger that is to come, if the like choice hereafter be not prevented, I could willingly be silent. But my duty to my sovereign, my service to this House, and the safety and honour of my country, are above all respects; and what so nearly trenches to the prejudice of this, must not, shall not be forborne."

Then followed this bitter and searching exposure of the incapacity of Buckingham in his various actions. How much its effect is increased by the ominous omission of his name!

"At Cadiz, then, in that first expedition we made, when we arrived and found a conquest ready—(the Spanish ships, I mean, which were fit for the satisfaction of a voyage; and of which some of the chiefest then there themselves, have since assured me that the satisfaction would have been sufficient, either in point of honour or in point of profit)—why was it neglected? why was it not achieved! it being of all hands granted, how feasible it was!

* The entire range of English oratory furnishes nothing finer in expression and purpose than this allusion to Spain.

* It would be easy to dilate this speech into a volume, so pregnant is every word with meaning, so condensed are its views, yet so exact and forcible. The reader who is best acquainted with the general history of the time will appreciate it best. The present is an allusion to the disastrous defeat of the King of Denmark by Count Tilly. The King of England had precipitated the quarrel by his weak importunities, and then, by this outrageous war with France, utterly disabled his own power of assistance.

"After, when with the destruction of some of our men, and with the exposition of some others, who (though their fortunes since have not been such) by chance came off—when, I say, with the loss of our serviceable men, that unserviceable fort was gained, and the whole army landed—why was there nothing done? why was there nothing attempted? If nothing was intended, wherefore did they land? If there was a service, wherefore were they shipped again?"

"Mr. Speaker, it satisfies me too much in this—when I think of their dry and hungry march into that drunken quarter (for so the soldiers termed it), where was the period of their journey—that divers of our men, being left as a sacrifice to the enemy, the general's labour was at an end!"

"For the next undertaking at Rhé I will not trouble you much—only this, in short. Was not that whole action carried against the judgment and opinion of those officers that were of the council? Was not the first, was not the last, was not all, in the landing, in the intrenching, in the continuance there, in the assault, in the retreat, without their assent? Did any advice take place of such as were of the council? If there should be made a particular inquisition thereof, these things will be manifest, and more! I will not instance the manifesto that was made for the reason of these arms; nor by whom, nor in what manner, nor on what grounds it was published; nor what effects it hath wrought, drawing, as it were, almost the whole world into league against us; nor will I mention the leaving of the wines, nor the leaving of the salt, which were in our possession, and of a value, as it is said, to answer much of our expense; *nor that great wonder which no Alexander or Caesar ever did, the enriching of the enemy by courtesies when our soldiers wanted help; nor the private intercourses and parleys with the fort which continually were held; what all these intended may be read in the success, and, upon due examination thereof, they would not want their proofs!"

Eliot passed to the consideration of "the ignorance and corruption of our ministers. Where," he asked, "can you miss of instances? If you survey the court, if you survey the country; if the Church, if the city be examined; if you observe the bar, if the bench; if the ports, if the shipping; if the land; if the seas—all these will render you variety of proofs, and that in such measure and proportion as shows the greatness of our disease to be such that, if there be not some speedy application for remedy, our case is almost desperate."

Eliot here paused for a few moments. "Mr. Speaker," he said, "I fear I have been too long in these particulars that are passed, and am unwilling to offend you; therefore, in the rest I shall be shorter." As he condenses his statements, it will be seen he becomes more terrible.

"In that which concerns the impoverishing of the king, no other arguments will I use than such as all men grant. The Exchequer, you know, is empty, and the reputation thereof gone; the ancient lands are sold; the jewels pawned; the plate engaged; the debt still great; almost all charges, both ordinary and extraordinary, borne up by projects. What poverty can be greater! What necessity so great! What perfect English heart is not almost dissolved into sorrow for this truth!"

"For the oppression of the subject, which, as I remember, is the next particular I proposed, it needs no demonstration: the whole kingdom is a proof. And for the exhausting of our treasury, that very oppression speaks it. What waste of our provisions, what consumption of our ships, what destruction of our men have been! Witness that journey to Argiers. Witness that with Mansfield. Witness that to Cadiz. Witness the next. Witness that to Rhé. Witness the last (I pray God we may never have more such witnesses!). Witness, likewise, the Palatinate. Witness Denmark. Witness the Turks. Witness the Dunkirkers. WITNESS ALL! What losses we have sustained! how we are impaired in munition, in ships, in men! It is beyond contradiction, that we were never so much weakened, nor ever had less hope how to be restored."

Eliot concluded thus, with a proposition for a remonstrance to the king.

"These, Mr. Speaker, are our dangers; these are they which do threaten us, and they are like the Trojan horse, brought in cunningly to surprise us. In these do lurk the strongest of our enemies, ready to issue on us; and if we do not speedily expel them, these are the signs—these the invitations to others. These will so prepare their entrance, that we shall have no means left of refuge or defence. For if we have these enemies at home, how can we strive with those that are abroad? If we be free from these, no other can impeach us! Our ancient English virtue, like the old Spartan valor, cleared from these disorders—a return to sincerity in religion, once more friends with heaven, having maturity of councils, sufficiency of generals, incorruption of officers, opulency in the king, liberty in the people, repletion in treasure, plenty of provisions, reparation of ships, preservation of men—our ancient English virtue, I say, thus rectified, will secure us; but unless there be a speedy reformation in these, I know not what hopes or expectations we can have.

"These are the things, sir, I shall desire to have taken into consideration; that, as we are the great council of the kingdom, and have the apprehension of these dangers, we may truly represent them unto the king: whereto, I conceive, we are bound by a treble obligation—of duty to God, of duty to his majesty, and of duty to our country.

* The affected gallantries and courtesies practised by Buckingham to the enemy, during this expedition, were ridiculous in the extreme. When Toiras sent a trumpet to request a passport to convey some wounded officers to the coast, Buckingham sent them his grand chaloupe, or yacht, furnished with every elegant convenience, and lined with tres belle escarlette rouge; while his musicians, with all the varieties of their instruments, solaced and charmed the wounded enemy in crossing the arm of the sea. Toiras once inquiring "whether they had saved any melons in the island?" was the next day presented, in the duke's name, with a dozen. The bearer received twenty golden crowns; and Toiras despatching six bottles of orange flower water, and a dozen jars of cyprus powder, the duke presented the bearer with twenty Jacobuses! After a sharp action, when Toiras sent one of his pages with a trumpet, to request leave to bury some noblemen, the duke received the messenger with terms of condolence. See an amusing account in D'Irabel's Commentaries, vol. ii., p. 48.

"And therefore I wish it may so stand with the wisdom and judgment of the House, that they may be drawn into the body of a remonstrance, and in all humility expressed; with a prayer unto his majesty, that, for the safety of himself, for the safety of the kingdom, and for the safety of religion, he will be pleased to give us time to make perfect inquisition thereof; or to take them into his own wisdom, and there give them such timely reformation as the necessity and justice of the case doth import.

"And thus, sir, with a large affection and loyalty to his majesty, and with a firm duty and service to my country, I have suddenly (and it may be with some disorder) expressed the weak apprehensions I have; wherein, if I have erred, I humbly crave your pardon, and so submit myself to the censure of the House."*

Eliot's purpose was already accomplished! Scarcely had he resumed his seat, when the effects he had laboured to produce broke forth. "Disaffection!" cried Sir Henry Martin and others of the court party; "and there wanted not some who said that speech was made out of some distrust of his majesty's answer to the petition."† From the popular side, on the other hand, some stern and significant words were heard about the necessity of a remonstrance. The crisis had unquestionably come. The courtiers went off to tell their news at the council table; the patriots "turned themselves into a grand committee touching the danger and means of safety of king and kingdom."

The newsmongers discharged their duty faithfully. The next day a royal message came to the House, acquainting them that within six days the session would close, and desiring them not to touch upon any new matter, but to conclude the necessary business.‡ The day following that brought another message, "commanding the speaker to let them know that he will certainly hold that day prefixed without alteration; and he requires them that they enter not into, or proceed with, any new business which may spend greater time, or which may lay any scandal or aspersion upon the state, government, or ministers thereof."§ The scene that ensued was in all respects extraordinary. Sir Robert Philips was the first to rise. "I consider my own infirmities," said Philips, "and if ever my passions were wrought upon, now this message stirs me up especially. What shall we do, since our humble purposes are thus prevented?"* Eliot here suddenly started up, and spoke with more than ordinary vehemence. "Ye all know," he said, "with what affection and integrity we have proceeded hitherto to have gained his majesty's heart. It was out of the necessity of our duty we were brought to that course we were in. I doubt a misrepresentation to his majesty hath drawn this mark of his displeasure upon us! I observe in the message, among other sad particulars, it is conceived that we were about to lay some aspersions on the government. Give me leave to protest, sir, that so clear were our intentions, that we desire only to vindicate those dishonours to our king and country! It is said also, as if we cast some aspersions on his majesty's ministers! I am confident no minister, how dear soever, can—" A strange interruption stopped him. "Here," says the account in the Napier MSS., "the speaker started up from the chair, and, apprehending Sir John Eliot intended to fall upon the duke, said, with tears in his eyes, 'There is a command laid upon me to interrupt any that should go about to lay an aspersion on the ministers of the state.'"† Eliot sat down in silence.

Events—for passions include events—now crowded together to work their own good work; and the great statesman, the author, as it were, of that awful scene, may be conceived to have been the only one who beheld it from the vantage ground of a sober consciousness and control. Into that moment his genius had thrown a forecast of the future. The after terrors he did not live to see, but now concentrated in the present spot were all their intense and fervid elements. They struggled in their birth with tears. I do not know whether it may not be thought indecorous and unseemly now for statesmen to shed tears, but I consider the weeping of that memorable day, that "black and doleful Thursday,"‡ to have been the precursor of an awful resolve. Had these great men entertained a less severe sense of their coming duty, no such present weakness had been shown. The monarchy, and its cherished associations of centuries, now trembled in the balance. "Sir Robert Philips spoke," says a member of the House, writing to his friend the day after, "and mingled his words with weeping. Sir Edward Coke, overcome with passion, seeing the desolation that was like to ensue, was forced to sit down when he began to speak, through the abundance of tears; yea, the speaker in his speech could not refrain from weeping and shedding of tears, besides a great many whose great griefs made them dumb and silent."§

A deep silence succeeded this storm, and the

* This speech was preserved in Sir John Napier's manuscripts, and will be found in the Old Parliamentary History, vol. viii., p. 155.

† Rushworth, vol. i., p. 592. Eliot is said to have remarked on this, that he had for some time "had a resolution to open these last-mentioned grievances, to satisfy his majesty herein, only he had stayed for an opportunity." This reads like a sarcasm. Be that as it may, it is remarkable that Wentworth, upon this, is described to have stepped forward and "attested that avowment," saying that he had heard such to have been the determination of Eliot. This is the only appearance of courtesy, or, indeed, of any other feeling than a violent dislike, which it is possible to trace in the conduct of Wentworth to Eliot. And it might have been meant in the way of "damned good-natured friendship." On the whole, however, I suspect it to have been simply another fillip to the wavering negotiations of the court, which Wentworth was now waiting the issue of. Many communications had already passed through the medium of the speaker and Weston. See Strafford's State Papers, vol. i., p. 46.

‡ Rushworth, vol. i., p. 593. Parl. Hist., vol. viii., p. 167.

§ Rushworth, vol. i., p. 605. Parl. Hist., vol. viii., p. 168.

* Rushworth, vol. i., p. 606.

† Ibid., vol. i., p. 606. Parl. Hist., vol. viii., p. 191.

‡ This expression is used in a manuscript letter of the day.

§ This interesting letter will be found in Rushworth, vol. i., p. 609. It will be seen that, in the commencement of it, the writer, Mr. Alured, distinctly conveys the impression that this extraordinary scene had been caused by Eliot's great speech of two days before. He gives a sketch of the speech, and afterward describes the interference of the ministers. "As he was enumerating which, the chancellor of the duchy said, 'it was a strange language;' yet the House commanded Sir John Eliot to go on. Then the chancellor desired, if he went on, that himself might go out. Whereupon they all bade him begone, yet he stayed and heard him out."

few words that broke the silence startled the House into its accustomed attitude of resolution and composure. "It is the speech lately spoken by Sir John Eliot which has given offence, as we fear, to his majesty."* The irresolute men who hazarded these words at such a time little anticipated their immediate result. "Hereupon," says Rushworth, "the House declared 'that every member of the House is free from any undutiful speech, from the beginning of the Parliament to that day,' and ordered 'that the House be turned into a committee to consider what is fit to be done for the safety of the kingdom; and that no man go out upon pain of being sent to the Tower.'"† The time for action had arrived. The speaker, in abject terror, "humbly and earnestly besought the House to give him leave to absent himself for half an hour, presuming they did not think he did it for any ill intention; which was instantly granted him."‡ He went to the king. In the interval of his absence cheerful acclamations resounded once more through the House, for again Buckingham was fearlessly named as the "grievance of grievances;" and "as when one good hound," observes a member who was present, "recovers the scent, the rest come in with a full cry, so they pursued it, and every one came on home, and laid the blame where they thought the fault was, and were voting it to the question, 'that the Duke of Buckingham shall be instanced to be the chief and principal cause of all those evils,' when the speaker, having been three hours absent and with the king, brought this message, 'that his majesty commands, for the present, they adjourn the House till to-morrow morning, and that all committees cease in the mean time.' What we shall expect this morning God of heaven knows."§

The king, it is evident, now shook with alarm. The clouds were gathering over his favourite thicker and blacker than ever. That morning, however, with a last vague hope, he sent a cozening message, and a wish for a "sweet parting."§ The only notice taken of it by the Commons was the forwarding of a petition "for a clear and satisfactory answer in full Parliament to the petition of rights,"|| and the stern opening of an investigation into several high grievances, more especially the charge I have before mentioned of a design for introducing foreign troops into the kingdom.¶ No alternative was left to Charles, and the Commons were summoned the next day to meet him in the Upper House.

"To avoid all ambiguous interpretations, and to show you there is no doubtless in my meaning, I am willing to pleasure you as well in words as in substance. Read your petition, and you shall have an answer that, I am sure, will please you."* Such was Charles's speech to the members of the House of Commons who crowded that day round their lordships' bar. The petition was read accordingly, and the usual answer was returned: Soit droit fait comme il est désiré. "At the end of the king's first speech," says a memorandum on the Lords' journals, "at the answer to the petition, and on the conclusion of the whole, the Commons gave a great and joyful applause."

Charles the First, after he left the House of Lords that day, stood in a different relation to the people from that he had occupied before. It is impossible to deny this fact.† The Commons had asserted it in cleaving so strongly to their resolutions, the king himself in striving so desperately to evade them. A certainty of direction and operation had been given to the old laws. Charles appeared, indeed, to sanction the notion of a great and vital change by the first step he took. He sent a message to the Commons, desiring "that the petition of rights, with his assent thereunto, should not only be recorded in both Houses, and in the courts of Westminster, but that it be put in print, for his honour and the content and satisfaction of his people."‡

The Commons, according to Rushworth, "returned to their own house with unspeakable joy, and resolved so to proceed as to express their thankfulness. Now frequent mention was made of proceeding with the bill of subsidies, of sending the bills which were ready to the Lords, and of perfecting the bill of tonnage and poundage. Sir John Strange-waies expressed his joy at the answer, and farther added, 'Let us perfect our remonstrance.'"§ And such was their exact mode of procedure. The largest supplies that had been voted for years were at once presented to the king. The king's commission of excise was demanded to be cancelled under the new act of right. The bill for the granting of tonnage and poundage, which was already far advanced, was passed, but a protest voted at the same time, on the ground of its inconsistency with the new act, against Charles's old course of levying this imposition without consent of Parliament.|| A remonstrance was also voted

* Parl. Hist., vol. viii., p. 202. Rushworth, vol. i., p. 613.

† Hume observes, "It may be affirmed, without any exaggeration, that the king's assent to the petition of rights produced such a change in the government as was almost equivalent to a revolution; and by circumscribing in so many articles the royal prerogative, gave additional security to the liberties of the subject." Without going so far as this, it is quite certain that it materially altered Charles's position in a moral as well as legal sense. The petition of rights (it is given at length in Hume's History, vol. v., p. 171) affirmed and confirmed expressly the enactments of the 9 Hen. III., chap. 29 (Magna Charta), that no freeman be deprived of his liberty or his property except by judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land; of the 28 Edw. III., chap. 33, that no man, of whatever estate or condition, should be taken, imprisoned, disseized, disherited, or put to death, without being brought to answer by due process of law; and of the 25, 37, 38, 42 Edw. III., with the 17 Rich. II., to the same intent. But it did even more than this, by its imbedment of the supplementary resolutions of the Commons, which, as I have already observed, bound the judges to a strict letter of construction, and deprived them of the plea of antagonist enactments.

‡ Parl. Hist., vol. viii., p. 203.

§ Rushworth, vol. i., p. 613.

|| The only plea advanced by the court lawyers against

* Rushworth, vol. i., p. 606, 607. Parl. Hist., vol. viii., p. 192.

† Rushworth, vol. i., p. 609.

‡ Rushworth, vol. i., p. 610. Parl. Hist., vol. viii., p. 196.

§ "So for this time," ran the close of the message, "let all Christendom take notice of a sweet parting between him and his people; which, if it fall out, his majesty will not be long from another meeting; when such grievances, if there be any, at their leisure and convenience may be considered." Parl. Hist., vol. viii., p. 197. Rushworth, vol. i., p. 610.

¶ Parl. Hist., vol. viii., p. 201. Rushworth, vol. i., p. 612.

¶ Burlemach, a naturalized Dutch merchant, was examined, and admitted that he had received £30,000 from the treasury, for the raising of German horse, which he had disbursed accordingly. He farther admitted that 1000 horse had been levied in consequence, and arms provided for them in Holland, but that "he heard they were lately countermanded." Parl. Hist., vol. viii., p. 200. And see Rushworth, vol. i., p. 612.

and presented to the king against certain proceedings of Buckingham.* These measures were not only in conformity with the petition, but were positively required to give it efficacy and completeness. No opportunity of concession or concord was withheld from Charles, but no distinct right was forborne. The grand committees that were then sitting, on the various heads of religion, trade, grievances, and courts of justice, were ordered to sit no longer.† Every appearance of unnecessary opposition was carefully avoided.

But suddenly, in the midst of these measures, the Commons were summoned by the king to the House of Lords. After a long interview with the speaker, Charles had hurried there to close the session. "It may seem strange," he said, when they appeared at the bar, "that I come so suddenly to end this session before I give my assent to the bills. I will tell you the cause, though I must avow that I owe the account of my actions to God alone." This was a very proper commencement to his speech; for, after peevishly complaining of the remonstrance against Buckingham, he went on to inform them that he would have no interference with his rights over tonnage and poundage; and, farther, that they had altogether misunderstood the petition of rights. "I have granted no new, but only confirmed the ancient liberties of my subjects." His concluding words were very remarkable. "As for tonnage and poundage, it is a thing I cannot want, and was never intended by you to ask, nor meant by me, I am sure, to grant. To conclude, I command you all that are here to take notice of what I have spoken at this time to be the true intent and meaning of what I granted you in your petition; but especially you, my lords, the judges, for to you only, under me, belongs the interpretation of laws."‡ Parliament was then prorogued to the 20th of the following October.

The patriot leaders separated, it may be supposed, with many gloomy forebodings. New miseries and oppressions were about to visit the people. Yet had this immortal session strengthened the people's hearts for endurance, no less than it had sharpened their powers for resistance. The patriots had no cause to separate with any distrust of each other.

Eliot went immediately into Cornwall. I am fortunately enabled to follow him there. Among the manuscripts of Sir Robert Cotton I have found a letter written to that learned antiquary some few days after his arrival. It is, in many points of view, interesting. It is a happy specimen of Eliot's style; and it proves, if such proof were wanting, that this great statesman had embraced the public cause with the deep fervour of a private passion.

"How acceptable your letters are," he writes, "and with what advantage they now come, I need not tell you; when, besides the memorie of my owne losses (which can have no reparation like the assurance of your favour), I but acknowledge the ignorance of these partes, almoste as much divided from reason and intelligence as our island from the world. That the session is ended we are gladd, because to our understandings it implies a concurrence in the generall, and intimates a contynuance of the Parliament—having not the notion of particulars by which we mighte compose ourselves to better judgment. The souldier, the mariner, the shippes, the seas, the horse, the foot, are to us no more than the stories of the poetes, either as thinges fabulous or unnecessary, entertained now only for discourse or wonder, not with the apprehension of the least feare or doubt! Denmarke and the Sound are taken rather for wordes than meanings; and the greatnesse and ambition of Austria or Spain are to us a mere chimera. Rochell and Dunkirk are all one. What friends we have lost or what enemies we have gained (more than that enemy which we have bredd ourselves) is not soe much to us as the night show-er or sunnesine! nor can we thinke of anie thinge that is not present with us. What they doe in Suffolk with their sojourners wee care not, while there are none billeted on us; and it is indifferent to our reasons, in the contestations which they have, whether the straunger or the countryman prevaile. Onlie one thing gives us some remembrance of our neighbours, which is the greate resorte of Irish daillie comminge over, whoo, though they begg of us, wee doubt maie take from others, and in the end give us an ill recompense for our charitie. This is a bad character, I confesse, which I give you of my country, but such as it deserves. You onlie have power to make it appeare better, by the honor of your letters, which come nowhere without happinesse, and are a satisfaction for all wantes to me. Your affectionate servant, John Eliot."§

Stirring events, however, soon reached Eliot in his retirement, such as must have moved even those stagnant waters, which he describes so well. The "self-bred" enemy of England was no more—Buckingham had fallen by the hand of an assassin.† But the service of des-the conduct of the Commons in this matter worthy of notice was founded on the iniquitous judgment of the Court of Exchequer in Bates's case during the last reign. But this plea had surely been barred by the resolutions I have so often named. Supposing it to be urged that the language of the petition was not sufficiently general to comprehend duties charged on merchandise at the outports, as well as internal taxes and exactions—an opinion which was strongly contested by Eliot—it is quite certain that the iniquitous application of the statutes in Bates's case, that grossest of instances of "judge-made law," was distinctly foreclosed. Tonnage and poundage, like other subsidies, could thereafter only spring from the free grant of the people.

* This remonstrance, drawn up by Selden and Eliot, is extremely able. It is impossible, after reading it, to question its necessity. See Rushworth, vol. i., p. 619.

† Rushworth, vol. i., p. 613.

‡ The reader, coupling this with Charles's previous consultation with the judges, will readily understand its significance.

* Cottonian MSS., c. iii., p. 174.

† Very interesting notices of this event, and the circumstances which followed it, will be found in the third volume of Eliot's Original Letters, p. 256-282, second edition. The funeral of the so brilliant duke was the most melancholy winding up of all. The king had designed a very grand one; "Nevertheless," says Mead to Stuteville, "the last night, at ten of the clock, his funeral was solemnized in as poor and confused a manner as hath been seen, marching from Wallingford House, over against Whitehall, to Westminster Abbey; there being not much above 100 mourners, who attended upon an empty coffin, borne upon six men's shoulders; the duke's corpse itself being there interred yesterday, as if it had been doubtful the people in their madness might have surprised it. But, to prevent all disorder, the train bands kept a guard on both sides of the way, all along from Wallingford House to Westminster Church, beating up their drums loud, and carrying their pikes and potism which the king had lost promised to be replaced by a more dangerous, because a more able, counsellor. Wentworth had gone over to the court.* Weston, a creature of the late duke's, had been created lord-treasurer. Other changes followed. Laud was made Bishop of London, and, with Laud's elevation, Arminianism reared its head formidably.† Arminian prelates were the favourites of the court; the royal favour shone exclusively on Arminian clergymen; and Montague, obnoxious as he had proved himself by the Arminian tendency of his works, was raised to the bishopric of Chester. On this subject Eliot felt strongly. He had already, from his place in the House of Commons, denounced the tendency of those Arminian doctrines, whose essential principle he had justly described to be that of claiming for the king, as absolute head of the Church, a power resembling the pope's infallibility—an independent state supremacy—a power over the liberty and property of the subject. His acute perception had already detected in Laud that resolution towards new ceremonies in the Protestant Church which should raise her out of the apostolic simplicity to a worldly equality with the Church of Rome; and in Laud's fervid sincerity on this point he saw the deepest source of danger. It was even now, indeed, in action, for farther news soon arrived that Charles, as supreme governor of the Church, had published an authorized edition of the articles containing the objectionable clause ("the Church hath power to decree rites and ceremonies, and hath authority in matters of faith"), and with an order that no doctrine should be taught that differed from those articles, that all controversies respecting outward policy should be decided by the convocation, and that no man should presume to explain the article respecting justification contrary to its plain meaning, or to take it in any other than the literal and grammatical sense.‡ Nor was this all. The terrors of the Star Chamber and High Commission had followed close upon Laud's new powers; and the cases of Burton, Prynne, and Gill, their zeal and their frightful sufferings, afflicted the country. The political application of these doctrines had received, at the same time, a fatal illustration in various flagrant violations of the petition of rights. A copy of the statute itself reached Cornwall, printed by the king's order (a shameless attempt at imposture, which is scarcely to be credited!), with the addition of his first and rejected answer. Tonnage and poundage had been recklessly levied. Richard Chambers, Samuel Vassal, and John Rolles, three distinguished merchants, the last named of whom was a member of the House of Commons, had submitted to a seizure of their goods, rather than become parties to a violation of the public liberties, and the judges had refused them protection.* Such was the news that travelled day by day to the seat of Sir John Eliot. To crown the whole, Richelieu, laying aside his hat for a helmet, had, by his personal appearance at Rochelle, finally reduced that ill-fated place and driven back the disgraced English fleet.†

But now, bad news having spent itself, the time fixed for the Parliament approached. Eliot left his home, to which he was never to return, and hurried up to London.

Parliament met, having suffered an intermediate prorogation, on the 20th of January, 1829. The spirit with which they reassembled was evidenced by their very first movement. They revived every committee of grievance. Sir John Eliot then moved a call of the House for the 27th, when vital matters, he said, would be brought into discussion. It was farther ordered on his motion, that "Mr. Selden should see if the petition of rights, and his majesty's answer thereunto, were enrolled in the Parliament rolls and courts at Westminster, and in what manner." Selden having reported, almost immediately after, the gross fraud that had been practised, Pym rose and moved an adjournment of the debate "by reason of the fewness of the House, many being not then come up." Sir John Eliot's conduct was characteristic. "Since this matter," he said, "is now raised, it concerns the honour of the House, and the liberties of the kingdom. It is true, it deserves to be deferred till a fuller House, but it is good to prepare things, for I find this to be a point of great consequence. I desire, therefore, that a select committee may both enter into consideration of this, and also how other liberties of this kingdom have been invaded. I found, in the country, the petition of rights printed indeed, but with an answer that never gave any satisfaction. I desire a committee may consider thereof, and present it to the House, and that the printer may be sent for to be examined about it, and to declare by what warrant it was printed." Eliot's influence with the House was paramount; what he proposed was instantly ordered, and the disgrace of the attempted imposition indelibly fixed upon the king.‡

Eliot followed up this blow. The seizure of the goods of Mr. Rolles came into question; some attempt was made to narrow the inquiry, and Sir Robert Philips proposed to refer the matter to a committee. Sir John rose sharply. "Three things, sir," he said, "are involved in this complaint: first, the right of the particular gentleman; secondly, the right of the subject; muskets upon their shoulders, as in a march; not trailing them at their heels, as is usual at a mourning. As soon as the coffin was entered the church, they came all away without giving any volley of shot at all. And this was the obscure catastrophe of that great man."—Hist. MSS., 390.

* Eliot, it may be presumed, was perfectly prepared for this event. The expression I have elsewhere used of Wentworth's having "basely abandoned" the popular cause is somewhat hasty. I think I shall be able to show that he never, in reality, was attached to it. Pym appears to have thought so, but Eliot had watched more closely.

† The memoir of Pym will be a more proper occasion than this for a detailed expression of the exact state of opinions in religion, and the nature of their influence on political questions.

‡ Bibliotheca Regia, 213. See Lingard's History, vol. ix., p. 400.

* The conduct of the judges in this case showed how carefully they had attended to the significant suggestions of the king. "Vassal pleaded to the information the statute de tallagio non concedendo. The Court of Exchequer overruled his plea, and would not hear his counsel. Chambers sued out a replevin to recover possession of his goods, on the ground that a seizure for tonnage and poundage, without grant of Parliament, was against law; but the writ was superseded by the Court of Exchequer."

† See History from Mackintosh, vol. v., p. 110.

* See Parliamentary Hist., vol. viii., p. 245, 246. The proceedings of this session are but imperfectly reported in Rushworth's Collections.

thirdly, the right and privilege of the House. Let the committee consider the two former, but, for the violation of the liberties of this House, let us not do less than our forefathers. Was ever the information of a member committed to a committee? Let us send for the parties. Is there not here a flat denial of the restitution of the goods? Was it not also said that if all the Parliament were contained in him, they would do as they did? *Let them be sent for. The Sheriff of London, Acton, who seized the goods, was in consequence sent for, appeared at the bar on his knees, and was ordered to the Tower. The officers of the customs were, at the same time, punished.†

The fiery decision of Eliot had its usual effect upon the court. The king sent a message to the House to desire them to forbear all farther proceedings until he should have addressed both houses next day at Whitehall as he purposed. His speech was an entreaty that they should not be jealous of him, and an endeavour to impose upon them a self-evident absurdity—that he took tonnage and poundage as a “gift of the people,” but as a gift, forsooth, for his life, according to the custom of his predecessors, which he desired them, therefore, to embody in a bill, since they had no discretion to withhold it.‡ This speech was not noticed by the Commons.

The 27th of January, the day fixed for the call of the House on Eliot's motion, arrived. The House was in debate on religious grievances. I have already alluded to the encouragement given to Arminianism by the court, and to the justifiable alarm it had been viewed with by the popular party. Sir John Eliot's present purpose was to break the power of Laud, and to this full house he now presented himself in all the confidence of an eloquence which worked its greatest influence on minds of the greatest order, which could sway them at will to high excitement or wrap them in deepest admiration. The reader will perceive with what a sober dignity the opening passages of this speech are conceived.

“Sir,” he began, taking advantage of a rest in the debate which had been caused by Mr. Coriton, “I have always observed, in the proceedings of this House, our best advantage is in order; and I was glad when that noble gentleman, my countryman, gave occasion to stay our proceedings, for I feared they would have carried us into a sea of confusion and disorder. And now, having occasion to present my thoughts to you in this great and weighty business of religion, I shall be bold to give a short expression of my own affection, and in that order that, I hope, will conduce best to the effecting of that work, and direct our labour to an end. To enter, sir, into a particular disquisition of the writings and opinions of divines, I fear it would involve us in a labyrinth that we shall hardly get out of, and, perchance, hinder that way, and darken that path, in which we must tread. Before we know, however, what other men have declared, it is necessary that we should presently ourselves lay down what is truth. I presume we came not hither to dispute of religion. Far be it from the thoughts of that Church that hath so long time confessed it now to dispute it. Shall posterity think we have enjoyed our religion fourscore years almost, and are we now doubtful of the defence? God forbid. It may be, however, sir, and out of some things lately delivered I have not unnecessarily collected, that there is a jealousy conceived, as if we meant so to deal with matters of faith that did not perhaps belong unto us, as to dispute of matters of faith. It is our profession. They are not to be disputed. Neither will that truth be receded from, this long time held. Nor is that truth decayed. It is confirmed by Parliament, because it was truth. And this, sir, before I come to deliver myself more particularly, give me leave, that have not yet spoken in this great cause, to give some apprehension I have of fear, for it is not in the Parliament to make a new religion, neither, I hope, shall it be in any to alter the body of that truth which we now profess.”

Eliot now alluded to the declaration which I have already described as published in the king's name, but which had issued from the hand of Laud. “I must confess, sir, among all those fears we have contracted, there ariseth to me not one of the least dangers in the declaration, which is made and published in his majesty's name; and yet, sir, this conclusion exclusively let me state, that I may not be mistaken—whatever in this, or other things shall appear to make mention of his majesty, we have not the least suspicion of jealousy of him. I hope it is by those ministers about him which not only he, but all princes, are subject to.” The speaker then adduced various precedents which covertly aimed at Laud. “As it was in that,” he continued, “so it may be in this. I speak to this end to draw it to this conclusion, that if there be anything that carrieth the title of his majesty, it may be the fault of his ministers. Far be it from me to have suspicion of him. And now to that particular, in that declaration, wherein, I confess, with me, is an apprehension of more fear than I have of all the rest, for in the last particulars we heard what is said of popery and Arminianism. It is true our faith and religion have before been in danger; but it was by degrees. Here, sir, like an inundation, it doth break in at once. We are in danger at once to be ruined and overwhelmed; for, I beseech you mark, the ground of our religion is contained in these articles. If there be any difference of opinions concerning the sense and interpretation of them, the bishops and clergy in convocation have a power admitted to them here to do anything which shall concern the continuance and maintenance of the truth professed; which truth being contained in these articles, and these articles being different in the sense, if there be any dispute about that, it will be in them to order which way they please; and, for aught I know, popery and Arminianism may be a sense introduced by them, and then it must be received. Is this a slight thing, that the power of religion must be drawn to the persons of those men? I honour their profession and honour their persons; but, give me leave to say, the truth we profess is not men's, but God's; and God forbid that men should be made to judge of that truth!”

* Parl. Hist., vol. viii., p. 255.

† Ibid., p. 267.

‡ Ibid., p. 256. Rushworth, vol. i., p. 644.

This passage wrought upon the House; and Eliot, throwing out a sarcasm with his usual skill and effect, thus continued: "I remember a character I have seen in a diary of Edward VI., that young prince of famous memory, wherein he doth express the condition of the bishops and clergy in his time, and saith, under his own handwriting, 'that some for sloth, some for ignorance, some for luxury, and some for popery, are unfit for discipline and government.' Sir, I hope it is not so with us! nay, give me leave to vindicate the honour of those men that openly show their hearts to the truth. There are among our bishops such as are fit to be made examples to all ages, who shine in virtue like those two faithful witnesses in heaven, of whom we may use that eulogy which Seneca did of Caius, that to their memories and merits, 'Nec hoc quidem obstat quod nostris temporibus nati sint;' and to whose memory and merit I may use the saying, that the others' faults are no prejudice to their virtues; who are so industrious in their works, that I hope posterity shall know there are men that are firm for the truth. But, sir, that all now are not so free, sound, and orthodox in religion as they should be, witness the men complained of—and you know what power they have. Witness those men nominated lately—Mr. Montague, for instance. I reverence the order; I honour not the man. Others may be named as bad. I apprehend such fear that, should it be in their power, we may be in danger to have our whole religion overthrown.

"But," Eliot exclaimed, as he saw the excitement rising in the House, "I give this for testimony, and thus far do express myself against all the power and opposition of these men! Whensoever any opposition shall be, I trust we shall maintain the religion we profess, for in that we have been born and bred—nay, sir, if cause be, in that I hope to die! Some of these, sir, you know, are masters of ceremonies, and they labour to introduce new ceremonies in the church. Some ceremonies are useful! Give me leave to join in one that I hold necessary and commendable, that at the repetition of the creed we should stand up to testify the resolution of our hearts, that we would defend that religion we profess. In some churches it is added, that they did not only stand upright with their bodies, but with their swords drawn! and if cause were, I hope, to defend our prince, country, and religion, we should draw our swords against all opposers!"*

This speech, it has been remarked, was a light that fell into a well-laid train. Its result was a "vow," made on the journals, that "the Commons of England claimed, professed, and avowed for truth that sense of the articles of religion which were established in Parliament in the 13th year of Queen Elizabeth, which, by the public acts of the Church of England, and by the general and current exposition of the writers of that Church, had been declared unto them; and that they rejected the sense of the Jesuits, Arminians, and of all others, wherein they differed from it."† Eliot did not fail to follow up this advantage. Some days afterward he fastened upon Laud by name. "In this Laud," he exclaimed, "is contracted all the danger that we fear! and I doubt not but that his majesty, being informed thereof, will leave him to the justice of this House."‡ His majesty, meanwhile, was sending message after message to hasten the tonnage and poundage bill, every one of which, with admirable skill, was foiled by Eliot and his friends.† In vain the king continued his messages. Those were commands, they replied, and commands were inconsistent with their privileges. "The heart-blood of the commonwealth," added Eliot, "receiveth life from the privileges of this House."‡

The question of religion surrendered to a sub-committee—the popular leaders had engaged themselves in a conclusion of the inquiry into the seizure of merchants' goods, with a view to the prevention of such future wrongs, by the infliction of some stringent punishment on the delinquents concerned in the present. The chancellor of the duchy threatened the displeasure of the king, and a close to the Parliament. Eliot, cutting short his threat, quietly observed, "The question, sir, is, whether we shall first go to the restitution, or to the point of delinquency. Some now raise up difficulties in opposition to the point of delinquency, and talk of breach of parliaments. And other fears I met with, both in this and elsewhere. Take heed you fall not on a rock. I am confident to avoid this would be somewhat difficult, were it not for the goodness and justice of the king. But let us do that which is just, and his goodness will be so clear that we need not mistrust. Let those terrors that are threatened us light on them that make them. Why should we fear the justice of a king when we do that which is just? Let there be no more memory or fear of breaches; and let us now go to the delinquency of those men. That is the only way to procure satisfaction."§ Upon this the king sent word that he was the delinquent, for that what the accused did "was by his own direct orders and command."|| This brought matters to a crisis, and the House adjourned itself for two days.

On the 25th of February, when they reassembled, the committee of religion had concluded its report, and a long list of formidable charges, levelled against Laud, was agreed to be presented to the king. The question of the king's offence against the privileges of the House, in the seizure he had avowed, was thus judiciously avoided, yet an opportunity given to Charles, by some redemption of the recently violated liberties, of receiving from the patriot leaders, without betrayal of their trust, a power of raising new subsidies. The king showed his appreciation of this conduct by sending an instant command to both Houses to adjourn to Monday, the 2d of March.¶

Latin edition of that year contained the clause respecting the authority of the ministers of the church.

* Parl. Hist., vol. viii., p. 284.

† Evidences of this will be found throughout the debates. On one occasion, poor old Secretary Cooke fell under a sharp rebuke from Eliot, and narrowly escaped a heavier censure. Parl. Hist., vol. viii., p. 278.

‡ Parl. Hist., vol. viii., p. 311.

§ Ibid., vol. viii., p. 317.

|| Ibid., vol. viii., p. 318.

¶ Ibid., vol. viii., p. 326. Rushworth, vol. i., p. 660.

* Parl. Hist., vol. viii., p. 268.

† Rushworth, vol. i., p. 649; Journals, Jan. 29. The 13th of Elizabeth was selected, because the Legislature had then ordered the clergy to subscribe the articles, and to read them in the churches, yet neither the English nor the Eliot now saw what was intended, and prepared for it with a fearless composure. He drew up a remonstrance concerning tonnage and poundage. In this able document, nothing that is essential to a just opinion of the conduct of the Commons respecting the bill that had been proposed is omitted. The delay is shown to have been necessary, and the purposes of the leaders of the House are nobly vindicated. It concludes with a solemn statement, that "the Commons had so framed a grant of subsidy of tonnage and poundage to your majesty, that you might have been the better enabled for the defence of your realm, and your subjects, by being secured from all undue charges, be the more encouraged cheerfully to proceed in their course of trade; but, not being now able to accomplish this their desire, there is no course left unto them, without manifest breach of their duty both to your majesty and their country, save only to make this humble declaration, that the receiving of tonnage and poundage, and other impositions not granted by Parliament, is a breach of the fundamental liberties of this kingdom, and of your majesty's royal answer to the petition of rights."* Eliot, at the same time, drew up three articles of protestation, which ran thus: "1. Whoever shall bring in innovation in religion, or by favour seek to extend or introduce popery or Arminianism, or other opinions disagreeing from the true and orthodox Church, shall be reputed a capital enemy to this kingdom and commonwealth. 2. Whosoever shall counsel or advise the taking and levying of the subsidies of tonnage and poundage, not being granted by Parliament, or shall be an actor or instrument therein, shall be likewise reputed an innovator in the government, and a capital enemy to this kingdom and commonwealth. 3. If any merchant, or other person whatsoever, shall voluntarily yield or pay the said subsidies of tonnage and poundage, not being granted by Parliament, he shall likewise be reputed a betrayer of the liberty of England, and an enemy to the same."†

With these documents Sir John Eliot entered the House of Commons on the morning of the 2d of March, 1629, for the last time.

He waited only till prayers had been said, and then arose. For the last time, on that fatal day, this great statesman struck, with daring eloquence, at a profligate courtier and a dishonest churchman. "Buckingham is dead," he said, "but he lives in the Bishop of Winchester and my Lord-treasurer Weston!" (Weston, it was understood, had been a party to the disastrous advice by which Eliot had anticipated too surely they were now about to be dissolved.) "In the person of the lord treasurer," the orator continued, amid the interruptions of some and the enthusiastic cheering of others, "in his person all evil is contracted, for the innovation of religion, and for the invasion of our liberties. He is the great enemy of the commonwealth. I have traced him in all his actions, and I find him building on those grounds laid by his master, the great duke. He secretly is moving for this interruption. From fear, these men go about to break parliaments, lest parliaments should break them." Eliot concluded, as if by a forecast of the future, with these memorable words: "I protest, as I am a gentleman, if my fortune be ever again to meet in this honourable assembly, where I now leave, I will begin again!"* Advancing to the speaker, Sir John Eliot then produced his remonstrance, and desired that he would read it. The speaker refused. He presented it to the clerk at the table. The clerk also refused. With fearless determination Eliot now read the remonstrance himself, and demanded of the speaker, as a right, that he should put it to the vote. Again the speaker refused. "He was commanded otherwise by the king." A severe reprimand followed from Selden, and the speaker rose to quit the chair. Denzil Hollis and Valentine dragged him back. Sir Thomas Edmonds, and other privy councillors, made an attempt to rescue him, but "with a strong hand" he was held down in the chair, and Hollis swore he should sit still till it pleased them to rise. The House was now in open and violent disorder. The speaker weepingly implored them to let him go; and Sir Peter Hayman in reply renounced him for his kinsman—as the disgrace of his country, the blot of a noble family, and a man whom posterity would remember with scorn and disdain. Every moment increased the disorder, till at last it threatened the most serious consequences. Some members involuntarily placed their hands upon their swords. Above the throng was again heard the voice of the steady and undaunted Eliot. "I shall then express by my tongue what that paper should have done!" He flung it down upon the floor, and placed the protestations I have described into the hands of Hollis. "It shall be declared by us," he exclaimed, "that all that we suffer is the effect of new counsels, to the ruin of the government of the state. Let us make a protestation against those men, whether greater or subordinate, that may hereafter persuade the king to take tonnage and poundage without grant of Parliament. We declare them capital enemies to the king and the kingdom! If any merchants shall willingly pay those duties, without consent of Parliament, they are declared accessories to the rest!" Hollis instantly read Eliot's paper, put it to the House in the character of speaker, and was answered by tremendous acclamations. During this, the king had sent the sergeant to bring away the mace, but he could not obtain admission; and the usher of the black rod had followed, with the same ill success. In an extremity of rage, Charles then sent for the captain of his guard to force an entrance. But a later and yet more disastrous day was reserved for that outrage; for, meanwhile, Eliot's resolutions having been passed, the doors were thrown open, and the members rushed out in a body, carrying a king's officer that was standing at the entrance "away before them in the crowd."† Such was the scene of

* Parl. Hist., vol. viii., p. 326.

† I state this on the authority of a MS. letter in the Sloane collection (4178). The writer adds, "It is said that a Welsh page, hearing a great noise in the House, cried out, 'I pray you let hur in: let hur in! to give hur master his sword, for they are all a fighting.'" Letter to Paul D'Ewes, dated March 5, 1628.

Monday, the 2d of March, 1629. "the most gloomy, sad, and dismal day for England that had happened for 500 years."*

The king instantly went down to the House of Lords, called the leaders of the Commons "vipers" who should have their rewards, and dissolved the Parliament.†

Two days afterward, Sir John Eliot received a summons to appear before the council table. This memorable scene closed his public life, and closed it worthily. He was asked "whether he had not spoken such and such words in the Lower House of Parliament, and showed unto the said House such and such a paper?" Keenly and resolutely he answered, "that whatsoever was said or done by him in that place, and at that time, was performed by him as a public man and a member of that House; and that he was, and always will be, ready to give an account of his sayings and doings in that place, whensoever he should be called unto it by that House, where, as he taketh it, it is only to be questioned; and, in the mean time, being now but a private man, he would not trouble himself to remember what he had either spoken or done in that place as a public man." He was instantly committed; his study was entered by the king's warrant, and his papers seized.‡

Much time elapsed before his case was finally adjudged. I will present, however, in as few words as possible, the course of the proceedings that were taken. I am able to illustrate it by the help of letters of the time.

Eliot sued for his habeas corpus. An answer was returned in the shape of a general warrant, under the king's sign manual. The insufficiency of this return was so clearly shown by Eliot's counsel in the course of the argument, that the judges, "timid and servile, yet desirous to keep some measures with their own consciences, or looking forward to the wrath of future parliaments," wrote what Whitelocke calls a "humble and stout letter"§ to the king, stating that they were bound to bail Eliot, but requesting that he would send his directions to do so. This letter was not attended to; the judges in consequence deferred the time for judgment, and Eliot was continued in custody. When the day at last arrived that judgment could no longer be deferred, the body of Eliot was not forthcoming. In vain his counsel called for judgment; the judges, in the absence of the prisoner, declined. Eliot had been removed by the king's warrant, the evening before the meeting of the court, from the custody of the keeper to whom his writ had been addressed! Some days after, however, Charles consented that he should be brought up for admission to bail, on condition that he presented a petition declaring he was sorry he had offended. The condition was spurned at once. The offer was repeated by the judges, but Eliot "would do nothing, but resolutely move for his habeas corpus. Whereat one of the judges said, 'Come he to outface the court?'" and the severity of his imprisonment was ordered to be increased.* Some months passed away, and the question still remained unsettled. Charles then offered Eliot his privilege of bail if he would give sureties for good behaviour. Eliot at once declared in answer that he would never admit the possibility of offending the law by liberty of speech in Parliament. The judges are described upon this to have suggested to him the possibility of his remaining in prison even seven years longer.† He answered that he was quite prepared; his body would serve to fill up the breach that was made in the public liberties as well as any other. The king now showed himself equally resolute; and, refusing an enormous sum that had been offered for his bail,‡ ordered the attorney-general to drop the proceedings in the Star Chamber, and to exhibit an information against him in the King's Bench for words spoken in Parliament. As member of a superior court at the period of the alleged offence, he pleaded to the jurisdiction, and thus brought in issue the great question of the privilege of the House of Commons—the question, in point of fact, upon which the character of "the English Constitution" altogether depended. The battle was fought bravely by his counsel, but vainly. The court held that they had jurisdiction; Eliot refused to put in any other plea; and judgment was finally given that he "should be imprisoned during the king's pleasure, should not be released without giving surety for good behaviour and making submission, and, as the greatest offender and ringleader in Parliament, should be fined in £2000."§

This iniquitous judgment found Eliot cheerfully prepared. He immediately sent to the

* MS. diary of Sir Symonds D'Ewes. For the various accounts of this remarkable scene, from which I have drawn the above description, see Rushworth, vol. i., p. 660; Parl. Hist., vol. viii., p. 336-333. See, also, the information lodged against Eliot in the Star Chamber (Rushworth, i., p. 665), and the proceedings on the subsequent information in the King's Bench; State Trials, vol. iii., or Rushworth, vol. i., p. 679-691. The examinations before the council table (Parl. Hist., vol. viii., p. 355) will be found highly interesting. Sir Miles Hobart said, "He would not stick to confess that it was he that shut the door that day; and when he had locked the door, put the key in his pocket [and he did it because the House demanded it]." Denzil Hollis, finding "his majesty was now offended with him, humbly desired that he might rather be the subject of his mercy than of his power." To which the lord treasurer answered, "You mean rather of his majesty's mercy than of his justice." Mr. Hollis replied, "I say of his majesty's power, my lord."

† Parl. Hist., vol. viii., p. 333; and see Whitelocke's Memorials, p. 13. "I must needs say," observed the king, "that they do mistake me wonderfully that think I lay the fault equally upon all the Lower House; for, as I know there are many as dutiful and loyal subjects as any are in the world, so I know that it was only some vipers among them that had cast this mist of difference before their eyes."

‡ Rushworth, vol. i., p. 661. The same was done with the studies of Selden and Hollis.

§ Whitelocke's Memorials, p. 14. The conduct of the judges was execrable; and notwithstanding the efforts of Whitelocke to exculpate his father, Judge Whitelocke (in which he succeeded with the Long Parliament), it is impossible to discern a material difference between him and the rest.

* Sloane MSS., 4178. Various striking accounts of the proceedings, as they affected all the prisoners, will be found in this volume—one of those transcribed by Dr. Birch—especially under dates June 10, June 25, June 28, and October 13, 1629. See, also, p. 92 of the same volume.

† Letter, dated 15th of October.

‡ It is said by Mr. D'Israeli, on a private authority, that £10,000 had been offered. This was vast indeed. Mr. D'Israeli doubts, however (Commentaries, vol. ii., p. 281), whether any bail could be tendered, since Eliot was condemned to be imprisoned at the king's pleasure. Mr. D'Israeli forgets that the bail was tendered during the proceedings, and not at their close.

§ The arguments will be found in the State Trials, vol. iii.; and in Rushworth, vol. i., p. 679-691. The judgment was reversed by the Long Parliament.

lieutenant of the Tower "to provide him a convenient lodging, that he might send his up-holsterer to trim it up." On being told of the fine, he smiled, and said, "that he had two cloaks, two suits, two pairs of boots and galashes, and if they could pick £2000 out of that, much good might it do them." (I have already mentioned the course he had taken to provide for the worldly welfare of his sons. His extensive estates were at present held by relatives in trust for their use,*) "When I was first committed close prisoner to the Tower," he added, "a commission was directed to the high sheriff of Cornwall, and five other commissioners, my capital enemies, to inquire into my lands and goods, and to seize upon them for the king; but they returned a nihil.† I could multiply the evidences of his easy, and even gay, humour at this moment. He is described, for instance, to have "laughed heartily" at receiving a message from the judges complaining of the "misbehaviour of his page and servant, who, with others, had been tossing dogs and cats in a blanket, in the open street of Southwark, near the King's Bench prison, saying, 'We are judges of these creatures, and why should not we take our pleasure upon them as well as other judges upon our master?'" After some short delays, he was conducted to the Tower, where he had twice before undergone imprisonment, and from which he never stirred again. A man named Dudson, the under-marshal of the King's Bench, who guarded him there, appears to have considered his person the peculiar property of a dungeon. "Mr. Lieutenant," he said, on delivering Eliot, "I have brought you this worthy knight, whom I borrowed of you some few months ago, and now do repay him again."‡

A "convenient lodging" had not been prepared. The only accommodation that could be had was "a darke and smoaky room." But he was not denied the use of books, and writing materials were, upon his earnest solicitation, granted to him. Some of the letters written at this period from his dungeon have, fortunately, been preserved.§ A great philosophical work, on which he employed himself, has also come down to us.* They present Sir John Eliot, in this last scene of all, not simply unshrinking in fortitude, true to himself, magnanimous, and patient. All this he was; but something yet greater than this. It would seem certain that, soon after his imprisonment, a secret feeling possessed him that his active life had closed. He did not acknowledge it to himself distinctly, but it is not the less apparent. Daily, under his confinement, his body was sinking. Daily, as his body sank, his soul asserted independent objects and uses. "Not alone," says the poet, whose genius has just risen among us,†

"Not alone when life flows still do truth
And power emerge, but also when strange chance Affects its current; in unused conjuncture
Where sickness breaks the body—hunger, watching, Excess, or languor—oftenest death's approach—
Peril, deep joy, or wo."

And now, as death approached Eliot—for, from the first month of his present imprisonment, it approached with the steadiest and surest step—a new world revealed itself, to be rescued and regenerated by his virtue; a new tyranny to conquer, which needed not the physical aid that had deserted him in his struggle with the old; a new government to establish which was within the control and accomplishment of all—"the monarchy of man." He resolved to occupy the hours of his imprisonment with a work that should have for its object the establishment of the independence of man's mind; of its power over the passions and weaknesses of humanity, of its means of wresting these to the purposes of its own government—the illustration of the greatest good that could be achieved on earth, man's monarchy over himself, a perfect and steady self-control. Such a plan, while it embraced the lofty thoughts that now sought freedom from his over-informed and sinking body, would enable him also to vindicate the course he had pursued in his day of strength and vigour, and, in leaving to his countrymen, finally, an unyielded purpose, an unquailing endurance, a still unmitigated hatred of oppression, would teach them, at the same time, that these great qualities had victories of their own to achieve, in which no worldly power could foil them; and that, supposing the public struggles of the time attended with disastrous issue, it was not for man, with his inherent independence, to admit the possibility of despair. If greater virtue, and beauty, and general perfectness of character have, at any time, in any age or country been illustrated, I have yet to learn when and by whom.

These thoughts and purposes of Eliot soon broke upon his friends. Hampden was watching his imprisonment with the most anxious solicitude. It is one proof of the virtuous character of this great man having already dawned, that Eliot had intrusted to him the care of his two sons. Soon after the commencement of his imprisonment, Hampden, who discharged this duty with affectionate * Boscawen was one of the trustees. A letter to him, written by Eliot during his imprisonment, is preserved among the Eliot MSS. (fol. 56), and sets this beyond a doubt. "Having a great confidence in your worth, as I find you to have been selected by my father-in-law, I have presumed also for myself to name you in a trust for the management of that poor fortune which, through the disturbances of these times, I may not call my own. Your trouble will only be for the sealing of some leases, now and then, upon compositions of my tenants; for which, as there is occasion, I have appointed this bearer, my servant, Maurice Hill, to attend you, to whom your despatch in that behalf shall be a full satisfaction of the trust." Sir John continued, nevertheless, as this extract intimates, to manage his pecuniary affairs himself as long as he was able, and in the early part of his imprisonment he arranged with his own hand many of his tenants' leases. He was liberal in acts of kindness, and strict in matters of justice. He grants his eldest son £200 a year for the expenses of travelling abroad, a very large allowance; and writes back his opinion on a request from one of his tenants to have a wall rebuilt, to which he (Sir John) was not liable. "There would be more charity than wisdom in this." Maurice Hill was an invaluable servant to Sir John in these extremities, and deserved the kindness with which the latter often subscribes himself "your loving master." Mr. D'Israeli has given these interesting circumstances from Lord Eliot's admirable communication. See Commentaries, vol. iv., p. 507, et seq.

† I have derived the above from a letter in the Sloane collection. Mead to Stuteville, dated Feb. 27, 1629-30.

‡ Mead to Stuteville, March 13, 1629-30.

§ Among the Eliot family papers.

* It may be seen in the Harleian collection, No. 2228.

† The author of Paracelsus, Mr. Robert Browning. There would be little danger in predicting that this writer will soon be acknowledged as a first-rate poet. He has already proved himself one.

zeal, received from Eliot a long letter of advice and counsel for them, which sufficiently indicated the studies that already engaged himself. The opening of it shows the last lingering of the struggle which was soon to settle to a perfect composure.* "Sonns," he begins, "if my desires had been valuable for one hour, I had long since written to you; which, in little, does deliver a large character of my fortune, that in nothing has allowed me to be master of myself. I have formerly been prevented by employment, which was so tyrannical on my time, as all minutes were anticipated; now my leisure contradicts me, and is soe violent on the contrary, soe great an enemy to all action, as it makes itself unuseful; both leisure and business have opposed me either in time or libertie, that I have had no means of expression but my priers, in which I have never failed to make God the witness of my love, whose blessings I doubt not will deduce it in some evidence to you. And now having gotten a little opportunity (though by stealth), I cannot but give it some testimony from myself, and let you see my dearest expectation in your good." He goes on to say with what delight he will always hear "of the progress of your learning, of your aptness and diligence in that, of your careful attendance in all exercises of religion, and the instruction and improvements of your minds, which are foundations of a future building." Some of the philosophy of his own life he then presents to them. "It is a fine history, well studied—the observation of ourselves." He describes to them the many evils he has endured, the continuity of his sufferings, "of which there is yet no end. Should those evils," he continues, "be complained? Should I make lamentation of these crosses? Should I conceive the worse of my condition in the study of myself that my adversities oppose me! Noe! I may not—(and yet I will not be so stoical as not to think them evils, I will not do that prejudice to virtue by detraction of her adversaries). They are evils, for I doe confess them, but of that nature and soe followed, soe neighbouring upon good, as they are noe cause of sorrow, but of joy; seeing whose enemies they make us—enemies of fortune, enemies of the world, enemies of their children; and knowing for whom we suffer—for him that is their enemy, for him that can command them whose agents only and instruments they are to work his trials on us, which may render us more perfect and acceptable to himself. Should these enforce a sorrow, which are the true touches of his favour, and not affect us rather with the higher apprehension of our happiness! Among my many obligations to my Creator, which prove the infinity of his mercies, that like a full stream have been always flowing on me, there is none concerning this life, wherein I have found more pleasure or advantage, than in these trials and afflictions (and I may not limit it soe narrowly within the confines of this life, which I hope shall extend much farther)—the operations they have had, the new effects they worke, the discoveries they make upon ourselves, upon others, upon all." Nobly and beautifully he subjoins, "This happiness in all my trials has never parted from me. How great, then, is his favour by whose means I have enjoyed it! The days have all seemed pleasant, nor nights have ever been tedious, nor fears nor terrors have possessed me, but a constant peace and tranquillity of mind, whose agitation has been chiefly in thanks and acknowledgments to him by whose grace I have subsisted, and shall yet, I hope, participate of his blessings upon you. I have the more enlarged myself in this, that you might have a right view of the condition which I suffer, least from a bye relation, as through a perspective not truly representing, some false sence might be contracted. Neither could I thinke that altogether unusefull for your knowledge which may afford you both precept and example. Consider it, weigh it duly, and when you find a signe or indication of some error, make it an instruction how to avoid the like; if there appears but the resemblance of some virtue, suppose it better, and make it a president for yourselves; when you meet the prints and footsteps of the Almighty, magnify the goodness of his providence and miracles that makes such low descents; consider that there is a nature turns all sweetness into venom, when from the bitterest hears the bee extracts a honie. Industry and the habit of the soule give the effect and operation upon all things, and that to one seems barren and unpleasant to another is made fruitfull and delightsome. Even in this, by your application and endeavour, I am confident may be found both pleasure and advantage. This comes only as a testimony of my love (and soe you must accept it, the time yielding noe other waie of demonstration), and by this expression know that I daily praie for your happiness and felicity as the chief subject of my wishes, and shall make my continual supplication to the Lord, that from the riches of his mercie he will give you such influence of his graces as your blessing and prosperitie may satisfy, and enlarge the hopes and comforts of your most affectionate father."

This is the nature which turns venom into sweetness. Hampden hastens to assure him that the present conduct of his sons is all he could desire. "If ever you live," he writes, "to see a fruite answerable to the promise of the present blossoms, it will be a blessing of that weight as will turn the scale against all worldly afflictions, and denominate your life happy." His affection had spoken with too generous a haste. The elder son, John Eliot, who had been sent, by his father's desire, to Oxford, fell into many irregularities, and greatly offended the superiors of his college.* This was afterward only slightly intimated to his father, but it cost him much pain. The younger boy, Richard Eliot, remained at Hampden's seat, and pursued his studies under Hampden's care. He appears to have interested his illustrious tutor extremely. Delicately, however Hampden is obliged to intimate to his friend, at last, that even Richard is somewhat remiss in his studies. Eliot immediately writes to the boy. He begins by a slight reproach for his not having written to his father. "I had no little doubt, after so long a silence, where you were, or whether you were or no." He desires him to forego the temptations of his young acquaintance; to forego, indeed, all society for the present, "that esca malorum, as Cicero calls it," and to retire wholly to himself. "Virtue," he continues, "is more rigid than to be taken with delights; these vanities she leaves, for these she scorns herself; her paths are arduous and rough, but excellent, and pleasant to those who once have past them. Honour is a concomitant they have to entertain them in their journey, nay, it becomes their servant, and, what is attended by all others, those who travel in that way have it to wait on them. And this effort of virtue has not, as in the vulgar acceptance, its dwelling on a hill; it crowds not in the multitude, but extra conspectum, as Seneca says, beyond the common prospect." He illustrates this farther by some quotations from his favourite Tacitus. That there was no pedantry in this habit is proved by such familiar resort to it in an affectionate advice to his boy. At this time, indeed, as I shall presently show, he was living in the world of the illustrious thinkers of old, and had entitled himself to it as his own. He concludes his letter with the following eloquent and earnest remonstrance: "How comes it that your tutor should complain you are careless and remiss! It cannot be, when there is true affection, there should be indiligence and neglect; when studie is declined the desires are alienated from the virtue; for no ends are attained without the means, and the neglect of that shows a diversion from the other. If it be since my last, I must resume my fears that, though your own judgment did not guide you, my cautions should be lost. If it should be hereafter, when that advice, those reasons, and the commands and authority of a father (a father most indulgent to the happiness of his child), which I now give you—to redeem the time is spent, to redeem the studies you have missed, and to redeem yourself who are engaged to danger, or that hazard and adventure—if these make no impressions, and these must be read in the characters of your course, if they work not an alteration; if they cause not a new diligency and intention, an intention of yourself, and intention of the object, virtue; an intention of the means, your study, and an exact intention of the time to improve it to that end; I shall then receive that wound, which I thank God no enemy could give me, sorrow and affliction of the mind, and that from him from whom I hoped the contrary. But I still hope, and the more confidently for the promise which your letters have assured me. Let it be bettered in performance by your future care and diligence, which shall be accompanied with the prayers and blessings of your most loving father."

* All the extracts from letters that follow, unless otherwise specified, are from the Eliot family papers, already referred to.

* This youth afterward, as I have already noticed, "ran off" with a ward in chancery. He became, ultimately, a hanger-on in the court of Charles II. Evelyn mentions him.

Ultimately, Eliot, having been much entreated to it by his son John, consents that he shall go abroad, and writes to Hampden mentioning this, adding his desire that, before the youth's departure, he should endeavour to obtain his "license," or degree, at Oxford. He forwards, at the same time, a letter of advice and instruction respecting a course and object in travel. He is particular in his directions as to the places to be visited, in what order, and with what purpose. He shows, in this, a lively knowledge of the state of politics on the Continent. "Be careful," he urges in conclusion, "in your religion, make your devotions frequent, seeke the blessing from above, drawe your imitation to goode patternes, lett not vaine pedantries deceive you, prepare your estimation by your virtue, which your own carriage and example must acquire, wherein you have assistants in the most earnest prayers and wishes of your loving father." In the same communication to Hampden, Eliot sends an expression of his views respecting his younger son, Richard. He considers that the best mode of employing with a good purpose his quick and vivacious humour will be to send him to the Netherlands, to learn the art of war, in the company of Sir Horace Vere. A passage from Hampden's reply on these points, which is charmingly written, will properly close this subject. "I am so perfectly acquainted," he says, "with yr cleare insight into the dispositions of men, and ability to fitt them with courses suitable, that had you bestowed sonnes of mine as you have done yr owne, my judgm^t durst hardly have called it into question, especially when in laying downe yr designe you have prevented the objections to be made ag^t it: for if Mr. Richard Eliot will, in the intermissions of action, adde study to practice, and adorne that lively spirit^t with flowers of contemplation, he'll raise our expectations of another Sir Edward [Horace] Vere, that had this character, all summer in the field, all winter in his study, in whose fall fame makes this kingdome a great loser: and having taken this resolution from counsaile with the Highest Wisdom (as I doubt not but you have), I hope and pray the same Power will crown it with a blessing answerable to your wish."

It is a great privilege to be thus admitted to the private thoughts and conduct of such men as Eliot and Hampden. The secret of their public exertions is here expressed. It is by the strenth and right direction of the private affections that we are taught the duty of serving mankind. The more intense the faculty of enjoyment and comfort in the narrow circle of family regards, the more readily is its indulgence sacrificed in behalf of the greater family of man. The severity of Eliot in the House of Commons is explained by the tender sweetness of these letters from the Tower.

Without a hope of release, Eliot's imprisonment continued. The whole county of Cornwall, I learn from a manuscript letter, petitioned the king for his freedom,* but no answer was deigned. Sustained by the genius of Wentworth, Charles's tyranny was now open and undisguised; and, in a royal proclamation, he had forbidden even the name of Parliament to pass the lips of his people.† Eliot was not even suffered to remain quietly in his wretched lodging. He was removed from place to place, each one as "darke and smoakey" as the first. "The lodging which I had upon my first remove before Christmas," he writes to Sir Oliver Luke, "being again altered, I may saie of my lodgings in the Tower as Jacob for his wages, 'Now, then, ten times have they changed it;' but, I thank God, not once has it caused an alteration of my mind—so infinite is that mercie which has hitherto protected mee, and I doubt not but I shall find it with mee." He concludes by referring to some "light papers" which seem to have engaged him in the intervals of his greater work. "When you have wearied your good thoughts with those light papers that I sent you, return them with the corrections of your judgment. I may one day send you others of more worth, if it please God to continue me this leisure and my health; but the best can be but broken and in patches, from him that dares not hazard to gather them. Such thinges, from me, falling like the leaves in autumn soe variously and uncertainly, that they hardly meet again; but with you I am confident what else my weakness shall present will have a faire acceptance." This allusion to his health was ominous. Sickness had already begun to threaten him.

* Mead to Stuteville, Sept. 26, 1629. MS. letter. Nor was Eliot without the sympathy of men of learning, correspondents of Sir Robert Cotton, in London, at the universities, and on the Continent. "I should gladly heare some cheerful news of Sir John Eliot," writes the learned Richard James. "Will the tide never turn! Then God send us heaven at our last end!" Nor is it to be supposed that any possible exertion was wanting on the part of his friends. Sir Bevil Grenville, in a letter to his wife, "his best friend, the Lady Grace Grenville," speaks of Eliot as "being resolved to have him out of his imprisonment." (Nugent's Memorials.) Every exertion failed.

† Rushworth, vol. ii., p. 3. In this extraordinary docu-

Some days after this, he writes to his kinsman Knightly (whose son afterward married one of Hampden's daughters) a description of what he conceives to have been the commencement of his disorder, the colds of his prison. "For the present I am wholly at a stand, and have been soe for this fortnight by a sicknesse which it hath pleased my Master to impose, in whose hands remain the issues of life and death. It comes originally from my colds, with which the cough having been long upon me causes such ill effects to follow it, that the symptoms are more dangerous than the grief; it has weakened much both the appetite and concoction, and the outward strength; by that some doubt there is of a consumption, but we endeavour to prevent it by application of the means, and, as the great physition, seek the blessing from the Lord." Good humour and easy quiet, however, did not desert him, though his disease steadily advanced. A week after the date of the foregoing, he writes to Hampden: "Lately my business hath been much with doctors, so that, but by them, I have had little trouble with myself. These three weeks I have had a full leisure to do nothing, and strictly tied unto it either by their direction or my weakness. The cause originally was a cold, but the symptoms that did follow it spake more sickness; a gradual indisposition it begot in all the faculties of the bodie. The learned said a consumption did attend it; but I thank God I did not feel or credit it. What they advised as the ordinance that's appointed I was content to use, and in the time I was a patient, suffered whatever they imposed. Great is the authority of princes, but greater much is their's who both command our purses and our wills. What the success of their government wills, must be referred to him that is master of their power. I find myself bettered, though not well, which makes me the more readie to observe them. The Divine blessing must effectuate their wit—it is that medicine that has hitherto protected me, and will continue me among other affairs to remain your faithfull friend." It is affecting to observe, even in his manner of writing, a characteristic of the fatal disorder that had seized him.

As his illness became more determined, the severity of his imprisonment was increased. Pory the letter writer, indeed, remarked, about this time, "I heare Sir John Eliot is to remove out of his darke smoakey lodging into a better;" but I can find no evidence of the removal. On the contrary, shortly before his last letter to Hampden, he had written to Bevil Grenville (who then opposed the court, but afterward, with no suspicion of his virtue, died fighting for the king at Landsdowne) a statement of increased restraint. His friend had by letter alluded to some rumours that were then abroad,* and on the faith of which Pory seems to have gossiped, as above, of his probable liberation. "The restraint and watch upon me," Eliot answers, "barrs much of my intercourse with my friends; while their presence is denied me, and letters are soe dangerous and suspected, as it is little that way we exchange; soe as if circumstances shall condemne me, I must stand guiltie in their judgments; yet yours (though with some difficultie I have received, and manie times when it was knocking at my door, because their convoy could not enter they did retire again, wherein I must commend the caution of your messenger, but at length it found a safe passage by my servant) made mee happie in your favour, for which this comes as a retribution and acknowledgment. For those rumours which you meet that are but artificial, or by chance, it must be your wisdom not to credit them. Manie such false fires are flyinge dailie in the ear. When there shall be occasion, expect that intelligence from friends; for which in the meene time you do well to be provided; though I shall crave when that dispute falls, properlie and for reasons not deniable, a change of your intention in particulars as it concerns myselfe; in the rest I shall concur in all readiness to serve you, and in all you shall command me who am nothing but as you represent." His concluding ment, the king took occasion also to attack Eliot. In reference, it may be supposed, to his commissioners of inquiry into Eliot's property having had a "nihil" returned to them, Charles observes, "Notwithstanding his majesty's late declaration, for satisfying the minds and affections of his loving subjects, some ill-disposed persons do spread false and pernicious rumours abroad; as if the scandalous and seditious proposition in the House of Commons, made by an outlived man, desperate in mind and fortune, tumultuously taken by some few, after that by his majesty's royal authority he had commanded their adjournment, had been the voice of the whole House, whereas the contrary is the truth." The words I have printed in italics are not in Rushworth, but Rymer supplies them. (Federa, xix., 62.) The infatuated king continues, "This late abuse having for the present driven his majesty unwillingly out of that course, he shall account it presumption for any to prescribe any time to his majesty for Parliaments; the calling, continuing, and dissolving of them, being always in the king's own power."

* These rumours prevailed strongly at one time. They arose out of whispers of a possibility of a Parliament; and I find it stated in a letter among the Harleian MSS., 7000, dated Dec. 14, 1631-2, that "Sir John Eliot had lately been courted and caressed in his prison by some great men who are most in danger to be called in question." If any such overtures were made to him, it is certain that he continued immovable. Rapin, indeed, says distinctly (vol. x., p. 263, note), "Sir John Eliot had been tampered with, but was found proof against all temptation."

words are affecting. "My humble service to your ladye, and tell her that yet I doubt not to kisse her hand. Make much of my godson."

Immediately after this, instead of any evidence of better treatment, I have to furnish proof of an accession of the most savage and atrocious severity. Eliot hitherto had been permitted, under certain restrictions, to receive visits from his friends. This poor privilege was now withdrawn, and—it is well that this is to be offered on the best authority, or I could not have asked the reader to give credence to it—the comfort of a fire, necessary to life in a damp prison, whose inmate already struggled with a disorder brought on by cold, was, in the depth of winter, wholly, or almost wholly, denied to Eliot! On the 26th of December, 1631, he thus writes to Hampden: "That I write not to you anything of intelligence, will be excused when I do let you know that I am under a new restraint, by warrant from the king, for a supposed abuse of liberty, in admitting a free resort of visitants, and under that colour holding consultations with my friends. My lodgings are removed, and I am now where candle-light may be suffered, but scarce fire. I hope you will think that this exchange of places makes not a change of minds. The same protector is still with me, and the same confidence, and these things can have end by him that gives them being. None but my servants, hardly my son, may have admittance to me. My friends I must desire, for their own sakes, to forbear coming to the Tower. You among them are chief, and have the first place in this intelligence. I have now leisure," he continues, with affecting resignation, "and shall dispose myself to business; therefore those loose papers which you had, I would cast out of the way, being now returned again unto me. In your next give me a word or two of note; for those translations you excepted at, you know we are blind towards ourselves; our friends must be our glasses; therefore in this I crave (what in all things I desire) the reflection of your judgment."

Thus, in the midst of his worst sufferings, Eliot had the consolation and sustainment of the philosophical work in which he had engaged. His own study, as I have described, had been plundered of its papers and sealed up by the king; but his friends supplied him with books; and in this office, as in every other care and kindness, Hampden was most forward.* Sir Robert Cotton's library would have proved of inestimable value to Eliot at this time, as some few years before it had served a kindred spirit,† but the atrocious tyranny that now prevailed had reached its learned owner. Accused of having furnished precedents to Selden and Eliot, Sir Robert Cotton's great library was seized and held by the king; and, unable to survive its loss, the great scholar died.‡

* I shall have a more proper opportunity (in the notice of Hampden) of eliciting a number of delightful personal characteristics from his present conduct to his friend.

† Sir Walter Raleigh. See an interesting letter in the Biographie Britannica, vol. v., p. 3485.

‡ The following extract from Sir Symonds D'Ewes's diary is deeply affecting: "When I went several times to visit and comfort him [Sir Robert Cotton] in the year 1630, he would tell me, 'they had broken his heart, that had locked up his library from him.' I easily guessed the reason, because his honour and esteem were much impaired by this

I have spoken of a kindred spirit with that of Eliot. It is impossible, in describing Eliot's labours at this moment—when,

Active still, and unrestrain'd, his mind
Explored the long extent of ages past,
And with his prison hours enrich'd the world—

not to recollect Sir Walter Raleigh. Kindred they were, at least in magnanimity of spirit and largeness of intellect. If it were worth while, I could point out other resemblances. Their faces, in portraits I have seen, were strongly like. They were both of old Devonshire families; both were new residents in Cornwall; and, through the Champenownes, one of whom had given birth to Raleigh, their families were in a degree related. They both died victims of the grossest tyranny, but not till they had illustrated to the world examples of fearless endurance, and left, for the world's instruction, the fruit of their prison hours. In one particular here, or, rather, accident, the resemblance fails; for Raleigh's intention of benefit was fulfilled by the publication of his labours, while Eliot's have remained to the present day unpublished, disregarded, almost unknown. I shall shortly endeavour to remove from literature, at least, a portion of this reproach; and, in so doing, an opportunity will be given to Eliot himself to complete this allusion to Raleigh, by one of the finest tributes that has yet been paid to that gallant and heroic spirit.

The health of the imprisoned philosopher sank day by day. His "attorney at law," however, told Pory that he was the same cheerful and undaunted man as ever. His friends now appear to have resolved to make a desperate effort to save him. I quote from one of Pory's manuscript letters to Sir Robert Puckering: "On Tuesday was sennight, Mr. Mason, of Lincoln's Inn, made a motion to the judges of King's Bench for Sir John Eliot, that, whereas the doctors were of opinion he could never recover of his consumption 'untill such time as he might breathe in purer air, they would, for some certain time, grant him his enlargement for that purpose. Whereunto my Lord-justice Richardson answered, that although Sir John were brought low in body, yet was he as high and lofty in mind as ever, for he would neither submit to the king, nor to the justice of that court. In fine, it was concluded by the bench to refer him to the king by way of petition."

Eliot refused to do this, proceeded still with his treatise, and uttered no complaint. Hampden continued to send him books, and, with delicate good sense, rallies him to his labours: "Make good use of the bookes you shall receive from mee, and of your time; be sure you shall render a strict account of both to your ever assured friend." As the work progressed, fatal accident; and his house, that was formerly frequented by great and honourable personages, as by learned men of all sorts, remained now, upon the matter, empty and desolate. I understood from himself and others, that Dr. Neile and Dr. Laud, two prelates that had been stigmatized in the first [last?] session of Parliament in 1628, were his sore enemies. He was so outworn, within a few months, with anguish and grief, as his face, which had formerly been ruddy and well coloured, was wholly changed into a grim and blackish paleness, near to the resemblance and hue of a dead visage." Within a "few months" more he died.

* See a statement at p. 1 of this memoir; and Biog. Brit., vol. v., p. 3467.

† Sloane MSS., 4178.

it was sent in portions to Hampden, who criticised it, and, as I shall show, gave value to his praise by occasional objection: "And that to satisfy you, not myself, but that by obeying you in a command so contrary to my own disposition, you may measure how large a power you have over John Hampden." Very little political allusion passed in these letters. It was a dangerous subject to touch, for Eliot's correspondence was never safe from exposure.* Some time before, he had mentioned this, as we have seen, to Grenville; and he wrote to Denzil Hollis a letter which bears upon political affairs, but only in dark hints, which he might not express more plainly. "Through a long silence," he says, "I hope you can retain the confidence and memoir of your friend. He that knows your virtue in the generale cannot doubt any particular of your charitie. The corruption of this age, if no other danger might occur, were an excuse, even in business, for not writing. The sun, we see, begets divers monsters on the earth when it has heat and violence; time may do more on paper; therefore, the safest intercourse is by harts; in this way I have much intelligence to give you, but you may divine it without prophesie."

Nearly four years had now passed over Eliot in his prison. Those popular leaders who had been subjected to confinement at the same time, had all of them, within the first eighteen months, obtained their release.† Eliot only was detained. After the conclusion of the treatise that had so long served to keep up his interest and attention, he appears to have sunk rapidly. Almost worn out by his illness, his friends at last prevailed upon him to petition the king. The account of his "manner of proceeding" is affecting to the last degree. I give it in the words of a letter from Pory to Sir Thomas Puckering: "Hee first presented a petition to his majesty, by the hand of the lieutenant, his keeper, to this effect: 'Sir, your judges have committed mee to prison here in your Tower of London, where, by reason of the quality of the ayer, I am fallen into a dangerous disease. I humbly beseech your majesty you will command your judges to sett mee at liberty, that, for recovery of my health, I may take some fresh ayer,' &c. Whereunto his majestie's answer was, 'it was not humble enough.' Then Sir John sent another petition, by his own sonne, to the effect following: 'Sir, I am hartly sorry I have displeased your majesty, and, having so said, doe humbly beseech you once againe to comand your judges to sett me at liberty, that, when I have recovered my health, I may returne back to my prison, there to undergoe suche punishment as God hath allotted unto mee,' &c. Upon this the lieutenant came and expostulated with him, saying it was proper to him, and common to none else, to doe that office of delivering petitions for his prisoners. And if Sir John, in a third petition, would humble himselfe to his majestie in acknowledging his fault and craving pardon, he would willingly deliver it, and made no doubt but hee should obtaine his liberty. Unto this Sir John's answer was: 'I thank you, sir, for your friendly advise, but my spirits are growen feeble and faint, which, when it shall please God to restore unto their former vigour, I will take it farther into my consideration.'"

That this is a perfectly correct account cannot be doubted. Pory collected the particulars after the death of Eliot, and gives us his authority. "A gentleman," he says, "not unknown to Sir Thomas Lucy, told me, from Lord Cottington's mouth, that Sir John Eliot's late manner of proceeding was this." Moreover, in one of Lord Cottington's own despatches to Wentworth, the savage satisfaction with which the court had received, and with which they knew Lord Wentworth would also receive, the assurance of the approaching death of the formidable Eliot, is permitted to betray itself. "Your old dear friend, Sir John Eliot," observes the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the Lord-deputy of Ireland, winding up a series of important advices with this, the most important of all, "IS VERY LIKE TO DIE."‡

Within two months from that date Lord Cottington's prediction was accomplished. Eliot, however, had yet a duty of life left, which he performed with characteristic purpose. He sent for a painter to the Tower, and had his portrait painted, exactly as he then appeared, worn out by disease, and with a face of ghastly paleness. This portrait he gave to his son, that it might hang on the walls of Port Eliot, near a painting which represented him in vigorous manhood—a constant and vivid evidence of the sufferings he had unshrinkingly borne—"a perpetual memorial of his hatred of tyranny." These pictures are at Port Eliot still. I have been favoured with a loan of the earlier portrait, by the courtesy of Lord St. Germain's. It represents a face of perfect health, and keenly intellectual proportions. In this respect, in its wedge-like shape, in the infinite majesty of the upper region, and the sudden narrowness of the lower, it calls to mind at once the face of Sir Walter Raleigh. Action speaks out from the quick, keen eye, and meditation from the calm breadth of the brow. In the disposition of the hair and the peaked beard, it appears, to a casual glance, not unlike Vandyke's Charles. The later portrait is a profoundly melancholy contrast. It is wretchedly painted, but it expresses the reality of death-like life. It presents Eliot in a very elegant morning dress, apparently of lace, and bears the inscription of having been "painted, a few days before his death, in the Tower."

In the last moments of his life, Eliot presented the perfect pattern of a Christian philosopher. I quote the last of his letters to Hampden. "Besides the acknowledgment of your favour that have so much compassion on your friend, I have little to return you from him that has nothing worthy of your acceptance, but the

* Many of Hampden's most beautiful letters never reached him.

† Before Valentine had obtained his bail, Eliot began to suspect him of juggling for release; and he writes of him to a friend, Thomas Godfrey, "This is all I can tell you of him, unless by supposition I could judge him in his reservations and retirement, knocking at some back door of the court, at which, if he enter to preferment, you shall know it from your faithful friend." I could furnish many such proofs of the jealous care with which Eliot watched the virtue of his friends.

* Harleian MSS., 7000.

† Strafford's State Papers, vol. i., p. 79, dated October 18, 1632.

contestation that I have between an ill bodie and the aer, that quarrell, and are friends, as the summer winds affect them. I have these three daies been abroad,* and as often brought in new impressions of the colds, yet, body, and strength, and appetite, I finde myself bettered by the motion. Cold at first was the occasion of my sickness, heat and tenderness by close keepinge in my chamber has since increas my weakness. Air and exercise are thought most proper to repaire it, which are the prescription of my doctors, though noe physic. I thank God other medicines I now take not, but those catholicons, and doe hope I shall not need them. As children learn to go, I shall get acquainted with the aer; practice and use will compasse it, and now and then a fall is an instruction for the future. These varieties He does trie us with, that will have us perfect at all parts, and as he gives the trial, he likewise gives the ability that shall be necessary for the worke. He has the Philistine at the disposition of his will, and those that trust him, under his protection and defence. O! infinite mercy of our master, deare friend, how it abounds to us, that are unworthy of his service! How broken! how imperfect! how perverse and crooked are our waies in obedience to him! how exactly straight is the line of his providence to us! drawn out through all occurrents and particulars to the whole length and measure of our time! how perfect is his hand that has given his Sonne unto us, and through him has promised likewise to give us all things—relieving our wants, sanctifying our necessities, preventing our dangers, freeing us from all extremities, and dying himself for us! What can we render! what retribution can we make worthy soe great a majestie! worthy such love and favour! We have nothing but ourselves, who are unworthy above all, and yett that, as all other things, is his. For us to offer up that, is but to give him of his owne, and that in far worse condition than we at first received it, which yet (for infinite in his goodness for the merits of his Sonne) he is contented to accept. This, dear frend, must be the comfort of his children; this is the physic we must use in all our sicknesse and extremities; this is the strengthening of the weake, the nuriching of the poore, the libertie of the captive, the health of the diseased, the life of those that die, the death of the wretched life of sin! And this happiness have his saints. The contemplation of this happiness has led me almost beyond the compass of a letter; but the haste I use unto my frends, and the affection that does move it, will, I hope, excuse me. Frends should communicate their joyes: this, as the greatest, therefore, I could not but impart unto my frend, being therein moved by the present expectation of your letters, which always have the grace of much intelligence, and are happiness to him that is trulie yours."

I add to this an extract from one of Pory's letters, dated November 15, 1632. "The same night, Monday, having met with Sir John Eliot's attorney in St. Paul's churchyard, he told me he had been that morning with Sir John in the Tower, and found him so far spent with his consumption as not like to live a week longer."*

He survived twelve days. On the 27th of November, 1632, Sir John Eliot died. Immediately after the event, his son (Richard, as I presume, since he did not go abroad as he purposed) "petitioned his majesty once more, hee would bee pleased to permitt his body to be carried into Cornwall, there to be buried. Where to was answered at the foot of the petition, 'Lett Sir John Eliot's body be buried in the church of that parish where he dyed.'"+ This attempt to wreak an indignity on the remains of Eliot was perfectly in accordance with Charles's system. A paltry piece of heartless spite on the lifeless body of a man appropriately closes a series of unavailing attempts to reduce his living soul. What remained of the great statesman was thrust into some obscure corner of the Tower church, and the court rejoiced that its great enemy was gone.

Faithful and brave hearts were left to remember this, and the sufferings of Eliot were not undergone in vain. They bore their part in the heat and burden of the after struggle. His name was one of its watchwords, and it had none more glorious. His sufferings, then, have been redeemed. The manner of his death was no more than the completion of the purposes of his life. Those purposes, and the actions which illustrated and sustained them, I have described in these pages, for the first time, with fidelity and minuteness. In doing this, I have also endeavoured to exhibit his personal and intellectual qualities so fully, that any reiteration of them here might be tedious, and is certainly unnecessary. In estimating his character as a statesman, our view is limited by the nature of the political struggle in which he acted. We have sufficient evidence, however, to advance from that into a greater and more independent field of achievement and design. His genius would assuredly have proved itself as equal to the perfect government of a state, as it showed itself supreme in the purpose of rescuing a state from misgovernment. As a leader of opposition, he has had no superior in history, probably no equal. His power of resource, in cases of emergency, was brilliant to the last degree, and his eloquence was of the highest order. The moral structure of his mind was as nearly perfect as that of the most distinguished men who have graced humanity. It ranks with theirs.

Yet this is he whose memory has been insulted by a series of monstrous slanders flung out against it by political opponents with a recklessness beyond parallel! The time for such slanders, however, has happily passed away, and the name of John Eliot may now be preserved, unsullied, for the affection and veneration of his countrymen.

What remains to be said of this great person, I shall subjoin as an appendix to this me-

* The precincts of his prison, it is unnecessary to add, enclosed the "abroad" of Eliot. The "air and exercise" he afterward mentions, as having somewhat "bettered" him, were only what he could win from a few narrow paces within the walls of the Tower. It is easy to conclude from this, that a sight of his native country, the greeting of one healthful Cornish breeze, would almost instantly have restored him.

moir. I am about to examine his philosophical treatise for, I believe, the first time. It has been mentioned, certainly by more writers than one, and about twenty lines have been quoted from it ; but this is the utmost extent of appreciation it has received. No one has yet shown any evidence of other than the most superficial glance at its contents ; none of its passages of mingled sweetness and grandeur have been quoted ; no attempt has even been made to describe them. I am about to remove this reproach from literature, and to enrich it with several specimens of thought and style, which might give an added lustre to the reputation of our loftiest writers in prose—to a Hooker or a Milton.

APPENDIX.

SOME ACCOUNT OF AN UNPUBLISHED PHILOSOPHICAL TREATISE, ENTITLED

THE MONARCHY OF MAN,

WRITTEN BY SIR JOHN ELIOT DURING HIS LAST IMPRISONMENT.

A CONSIDERATION of such affecting interest is so immediately and vividly excited in looking at the first page of this manuscript, that I have had it carefully copied for the reader. It presents at once the scene of Eliot's imprisonment, and the lonely and weary hours this cherished work may have lightened. The pure exaltation of the philosopher is approached most nearly by the simplicity of a child; and how touching is the childlike care and interest which, to while away the lingering time, has so elaborately wrought itself within every letter of this exquisite title! Crouching under the T and the M two faces will be detected—rather ungain, indeed, but still sufficient to remind the solitary prisoner of the more "human face divine." I leave the rest to the imagination of the reader, which is, in many respects, silently and deeply appealed to. I will only add that the omission of the word "fecit," in the truly and touchingly noble motto, appears to me to be in the highest taste. It reads, as it stands, like an abridged motto on a shield, chivalrous and significant. It is no proof of the judgment of the only two writers who have given the title of this treatise, that they undertake to repair Eliot's omission in this respect

The Monarchie of Man.
A Treatise Philosophicall and morall wherein some questions of the Politics are obviously Discusst.

By
J. John Eliot Kn. Prisoner in the Tower.

Deus nobis hac otia munus

Virg:

This wood-cut, it is to be observed, is very considerably reduced from the original, which is of a folio size. The treatise itself occupies two hundred and forty folio pages, which are written over with extreme closeness, and by no means so legibly as the specimen before the reader. Eliot was fond of abbreviations; and the key of his style, in that particular, has grown something rusty, and tries the patience.

The treatise opens with a general proposition in favour of what Eliot calls the covenant of monarchy. The example of man's monarchy follows the monarchy of the mind as the greatest of those covenants, after that of the government of nature, of God.

"Of all covenantes, kingdomes are the best, answering to the first and highest, both of institutions and examples, either in the policie of man or the president of his maker.

Next to that great monarchy and kingdome, quod sub Iove, nomen habet, in which the microcosme, the whole world, is comprehended, is the monarchie of man, that little world and microcosme, coming the neere, both in order and proportion, for excellencie of matter and exquisitnes of forme. In tyme and order nothing makes to question it; it beeing the instant and immediate successor of that greater, wherein, the Creation being accomplit, man was made a governour. In excellency and proportion what paralell may it have? what similitude can be given it? its forme beeing like the disposition of the heavens, soe geometricall and exact, that each part, each orbe, hath his owne motion, in his own tyme, to his owne ends, genuine and proper."

The course of each "orbe and member" is pursued in terms of exalted eulogy, and the "matter" is next handled. By this is meant the subject matter of the proposed government, which embraces nothing extraneous, nothing connected with creatures that are inferior, in point of grandeur, to man himself.

"The excellence of the matter likewise does appear, in that it is not an invention of humanity, a fabrique of art, but of a substance heavenly, the perfection of all creatures, the true image of the Deity. 'Twere too love, too narrow, for the founder to reduce the government to beasts, and to confine it to that compass, which yet likewise was cast within man's will, and those things submitted to his use. This were unworthy the original, that transcendent greatness from whence this excellence is derived, to apply it only to such things. And much more were it unworthy the ends, the glory and the honor, of that greatness which reflects from purer objects. 'Tis larger, 'tis better. 'Tis of man chiefly this government consists. Man, to be the governor of himself, an exact monarchie within him, in the composition of which state nothing without him may have interest, but all stands subservient to his use, hee only to his maker."

Eliot then proposes to consider the component parts of this monarchy, and the relative duties they sustain.

"In this monarchie of man, to make the excellence conspicuous, first is requisite a description of the parts, then the knowledge of their duties; that, every member beeing scene, and the office it sustains, it may then appear of what use and advantages they are, what severall innerts they imple, both in degrees and simple, what conference they have, of how much importance to the generall, what correspondence and relations with themselves.

"In the parts, the minde doth sitt as soveraigne, in the throne and center of the heart, the station of most aptnes both for intelligence and comand. Two sorts of servants doe attend him, daylie administering in that court; the one for use and businesse, as Plutarche has it of Craterus, friends and servants to the KING; the other, like Hephæstion, for pleasure and delight, friends and servants unto ALEXANDER. These, the rational and brute faculties of the soule, are both necessarie in their kinds, both usefull to their soveraigne, though differing in their service, and differing in the way.

"Of the first a senate is compos'd, a solid body for council and advice, still intent on the government. Such are memories, judgement, fancie, and their like. The second are the waiters and followers, which respect not the affaires, but the presence, of their king, as the will and affections that accompanie him. Subservient to these, and according to these principles, all other things are mov'd, every part and member in his place; the great officers beeing the senses; and ministers subordinate, the organs; the subject, the body, in which all these subsist, and though the most unactive part it be, yet it is truly called the center and foundation of the rest.

"This is the frame and constitution of this monarchie, and of these parts it does consist."

The question follows of the several offices and duties of these various parts, and "On this point," Eliot observes, with an allusion of extreme elegance, "wee shall endeavour to expresse, as young painters doe rare beauties, some lines and slight resemblances, though, in the exactness, wee come short of the true figure and perfection."

"There is one common dutie of them all, to which all are equally oblig'd; prince as well as subjects, subjects as their prince; all offices are directed to this end, and all are accountable for that trust; proportionably indeed to the qualities they are in; geometrically, and ad pondus, though not arithmetically and alike. The greater and more dignified, for more, as more advantage has been given them; the lesse, and all, for somewhat to the capacities they have. Which is for the conservation of the whole, the publike utilitie and good, wherein all endeavours must conterminare as their absolute and true end.

"And the reason is binding in this point. For if the whole fabrike be desolved, how can a part subsist? Be it the chamber of the councill, the head; or the king's throne, the heart; or yet, which is more excellent, what they both containe, the king himself and councill, the mind and faculties of reason; what subsistence can they have, or what being can they hold, without that frame and body of which they are king and councill? A father is soe called, but in relation to a child; and if that childhood cease, he ceases to be a father. It is ignorance, madness, to think that in a disjuncture they can stand, either the prince or the subject; when the prince is such but in reference to the subject, and the subject has not being without the subsistence of the state. Ad eo manifestum est (as an emperor speaks in Tacitus) neq; perire neq; salvos esse, nisi una, &c. The conjuncture is so strict, that in the dissolution of the generall, noe particular can be fast; and, without preservation of the members, the body cannot stand; therefore each part must strive for the conservation of the whole, and that whole intend the preservation of the parts."

Eliot then reduces to two heads, the division and limitation of their respective duties. The passage is striking.

"The king is to command; the subject to obey. Both, however, with like readines in their places, and like affection to each other. The subject must not make his center in himself, and direct only his indeavours to that end, as if there they were to terminate; but they must alwaies be with respect unto his soveraigne, and to the publike good, therein inclining his will. As the king is to answer this observance in correspondency thereof, he must not retire his thoughts to private purposes and designs, respects that are particular, peculiar interests of his owne; but his authority must move as it has been appointed, in ordine, for his subjects, for the common use and benefit, for the safety and tranquillitie of the state, for the singular advantage of each member, and the universall happiness and good."

The treatise now flows naturally into an examination of the analogies of civil government.

"And in this, generally, this monarchie is agreeable to all others, of the same frame and constitution; and what is true in them is conclusive upon this, their reasons being alike; as conversively from this, may be argued to the rest. Wee will therefore consider them together, to see how the authority does arise, and what powers and judgments have been given them. That done, wee will descend to exercises and corruptions, with the effects and consequences that are incident, from whence, by comparison, the knowledge will be easie. Where the advantage rests, that shall be an evidence to iustifie the right. Even the fruite and profit shall be made arguments to prove it. Wherein, notwithstanding all disguises to the contrary, the true utile shall be seen, like the heliotropium, that beautie of the gardens, always converting to the sunne, the honestum, to which it shuts and opens, as that is present or removed."

The original of civil monarchy Eliot seeks for in the heavens. From the solitude of his dungeon, into that clear region, "above the thunder," it was some consolation to pass!

"To finde out the original of these excellencies, the beginning of these monarchies and monarchs, wee must first search the heavens, and, by ascending thither by thought and speculation, bring down the knowledge of that truth. Wee shall there see them, from before all eternitie, written in the counells of the court, the great ruler there haeving so decreed it, in conformity to his government. From his owne excellence and perfection was their idea taken, the patterne and example being himselfe, the worke his owne, the institution and invention his, and the end and scope for which it was ordained. See thence wee shall finde their originals derived; there they haue beginning; from thence they haue continuance; there both their Genesis and Exodus are inroll'd. All their degrees, periods, and revolutions, their remissions, and intentions, are guided by this influence. Inde est imperator (saith Tertullian), unde et homo; inde potestas, unde et spiritus. The same power which first created man gave their original to princes. He who of nothing gave being unto all things—he that to man whilst he was yet but clay, that unactive piece of element, infused a spirit and fire to give him life and motion—from him proceeds this power."

Aristotle, Dion, Plato, and Pliny give the strength of their authority to the writer; and, pursuing various monarchical analogies, in a manner much resembling that of Sydney's treatise, through families, cities, and so on, he arrives at the government of the "great globe itself," in considering which, he says, the reason sinks, for, since it cannot ascend up to "nature, which is but the daughter of the world," much less should it compass "the world, the universall mother of all nature." Eliot then exclaims, with a passing eulogy on Cicero, which, considering the many points of literary resemblance between them, is very interesting: "Without a maker the world had not been at first, without a ruler it would have no continuance. The varieties and contrarieties that are in it, beyond the understanding of weeke man, so reconciled to order and agreement, give it a full expression. O the height of this gradation, which none but Cicero could climbe!" And thus he proceeds through a laboured praise, considering the accomplished Roman in all his aspects, "resorting to the person from the cause, from the client to the advocate," till he knows not, as he expresses it, "whether his truth or eloquence be more admirable."

The next passage I shall quote is beautiful and characteristic. Eliot proposes to examine the authority of princes, their powers and judgments, with their controlling rules and limits. In the course he lays down towards this, I recognise an admirable sense of the proprieties in argument, with a feeling of the probable public appearance of his labours; a glance at the strange aspect of the times, and an endeavour to save his work, as it were, from the severities that had fallen on himself; which will not be read without much interest. It is full of delicate beauty. I subjoin to this the commencing passages of the argument which follows it, bespeaking toleration for the objects and intentions of man, on the ground of the wretched dependancy and infirmity of his acts.

"Thus then wee see how the authority does rise, and from whence princes have original, both in particular, for ours, and generally, for all nature, therein assenting. Our next view must be of the powers and judgements that are given them, wherein likewise there is community. Then their rules and limits wee will touch, with some notes of advantage and disadvantage from the use. Which done, wee will draw the application to ourselves, to our owne monarchie, the mind, and shew the propriety of that; handling by the way the questions most in controversie touching the exercise of that power; which wee will take, as they are emergent from our subject, and arise naturally in discourse; not compelling, not coveting, any that does not voluntarily come in, and readily accost us; nor balking those which the occasion shall present, for any fear or difficulties. Only this far wee petition, which candor will allow us for our encouragement in the worke, that no prejudice may impeach us in the censure of our reason; if it tide contrary to the tymes, if it oppose the stream and current wee are in, either in dilating or contracting the interests and pretensions, superior or inferior. Wee shall impartially deliver it, if not to the truth of the cause, which may exceed our judgement, yet to the truth and identity of our sense; and if in that we fail, though it be an error, 'tis not a crime unpardonable, uncapable of remission. Yet wee shall be careful to avoid it, and are not unhopfull in that point, having our affections on a right level, so equally disposed as nothing but ignorance can divert them.

"First then, to take the just height and latitude of this power, we must begin our consideration at the end—the end and scope—for which it was ordain'd, which is the perfection of all workes and the first thing always in intention. Acts may have diverse inclinations and effects, from the accidental interurrence of new causes contrary to their institution and design, whereon no sound judgement can be grounded. To an act of virtue there may be a concurrence of vice, through the corruption and infirmities of the object. A charity may be interverted to ill uses, as not seldom happens thro' the depravity of men, and so lose the fruit of virtue. The council of Achitophell may be folli, though an effect of wisdom. Equity may be converted to iniquity. Justice into injury, or into cruelty of extremity. No virtue, indeed, in operation is so sacred, but circumstance may corrupt it, diverse effects may follow it, as from new causes and intentions intervenient. Thus we see it in the motion of the spheres, the perfection of whose course revolves from east to west, and yet all the lesser and lower orbes run a counter course to that, turning from west to east. Their natural motions and inclinations are irregular, ad raptum. So, in the acts of virtue, oblique intentions may occur to corrupt it in particulars, though the virtue be the same. Therefore, as the intention must be the indication of the act, the end must shew the intention. For as a good act may be ill done in respect of the intention, so the intention of what purity soever may be corrupted by the end. If our descent and end shall terminate in the east; if our horoscope and ascendant shall be placed in the period of the west; if we shall then, as Strato saith, seek the sunne itself rising in the west, we cannot conclude properly, or right. For the end of the great workman must direct us, not the effect and operation of the worke. Finis operantis, the end and the proposition of the first mover, the maker of those powers; not finis operis, the practice and exercise of man, who, like those lower orbes, has no regularity, but ad raptum."

The authority to be committed to princes, with the assistance of their deliberative and executive governments, and the duties required of them, are then treated by Eliot. He tempers the apparent remoteness of such an authority by many familiar analogies, and illustrates the dangers that beset a prince in the example of the pilot of a ship: "The leaks," he says, "are infidelity and treachery in ministers; the rocks, inequality and distemper in the government; the sands and synks are factions and divisions; the winds and waves, the attempts and invasions of the enemy; the pyrats are the false and subtil underminers, that would robb and steale away all law, liberty, and religion."

A singular passage follows, but it is too long for my present purpose. Eliot takes up the power to be given to ministers as a thing to be limited, invariably, and in all things, by rule; "secundum artem, according to certainty;" that it should be, in fact, a PRINCIPLE, or the man to whom it is intrusted will turn, as he says, "a sophister and impostor." He then ranges through several chemical analogies, combining and condensing them, with a rich facility and skill. He that desires to have "the gold and quintessence" at last, must search laboriously from "metal to metal, element to element;" and so, in the view of Eliot, must the course of that man be laid who seeks the true understanding of government, "emergent and resultant from the world." Government, he proceeds to reason, is called "supreme," but it is only so "for the good and welfare of the subject. The latter part of which definition, though it be not expressly in the words, is included in the sense, as the end and object of all such authority and power. And it follows likewise by inference and reason, if the use and interest be not severed. For, as Cicero says, respublica is but respulpi; and if the right and interest be the people's, so should the benefit and use." This supreme power of the state Eliot now reduces to two divisions; "the first concerning the exercise of that power as it is distributive to others," the ministers of princes, which he ties down, with much strong sense and argument, to a strict obedience of the laws; "the other reflecting particularly upon princes, and the privilege and prerogative of their persons," which, when he comes to discuss, he introduces with a melancholy application to himself. Nothing, at the same time, can be more quiet or firm. I have not found, indeed, in the whole of this remarkable work, one touch of querulous impatience. "The next thing that comes to meet us in our way is the second question we expounded, whether the lawes have an operation upon princes. And this with more difficulties is involved, as lying within that mysterie, the prerogative of kings, which is a point so tender as it will hardly bear a mention. We may not therefore handle it with any roughness, lest it reflect some new beam of terror on ourselves; but with what caution we may, yet without prejudice to truth; that in what freely we have undertaken we may faithfully be delivered, and safely render the opinion which we gave without suspect of flattery."

In the next sentence Eliot sets such a suspicion at rest! With a sudden and indignant sense that the claims set up for princes in that day are even too absurd for argument, he exclaims, "It falls not into question whether lawes have an influence on kings, but conclusive and in right! It is to question how far such persons should be subject to the lawes, what bounds and circumscriptions they have given them, and in what compass and degrees they ought to be limited and confined." He then continues (following up a precedent passage of elaborate eulogium on the law, which I ought to have mentioned, and which is so nobly carried out in Pym's great speech against Strafford, that I cannot help imagining Pym to have been admitted to some knowledge of the composition of this treatise by his imprisoned friend), "Two things occur in this, the lawes and privileges of each country, in both which the subject has like interest. By the privilege the prince is free from all things but the law; by the law he craves in all things to be regulated. By the privilege he has a propriety of consent in the sanction of all lawes; by the lawes he has a certain rule and level by which to square his actions. By the privilege all approved customs are received in the strength and vigour of the lawes; by the lawes no actual repetitions shall create a custom, without acceptance and allowance. The law is rex omnium, as Pindarus says, the king and governour of all things; the other is regi similis, something like unto a king, as Bodin has it; as absolute, though less known."

Eliot, in the next passage, brands the slavish sycophancy of his time. "Of these lawes and privileges," he says, "(which we shall join together, making but one joint subject of this question), the discussion will be easier if we turn our disquisition, and thus state it: What power the king has upon them? Wherein there is such a confuency of flattery, conducing to our prejudice; such labour to make monarchie unlimited, an absoluteness of government without rule; so much affection, or corruption rather, specified; such distortion and perversion of authorities to that end; learning made prostitute to fallacy; religion turned to policie; heaven brought down to earth; light transformed to darkness; as to attempt against it, is now to row against the tide! against the stream and current of these times to seek a passage unto truth!" Not the less did the philosophic patriot seek it, and he could afford pity, from his dungeon, to the hollow meanness of the slaves whose doctrines kept him there. "Some would insinuate," he says, pointing to the sermons of Sibthorp and Laud, "from the debortation of the Israelites, a warrant and authority for the extension of that power. What then was said in terror, they now make it a conclusion of the right! Others infer from the confession made by David, 'Against thee only have I sinned,' that princes offend not men, and therefore have a liberty upon them to do what acts they please. Which judgements we shall rather pity than contest! The heathens, likewise, both Greeks and Latins, have been search to have their attestations for this sense; but how truly we shall, in a few general instances, soon shew!" Eliot then brings up to his aid what Prynne would have called "squadrons" of authorities. "Plinie shall be first, who in direct terms avers, non est princeps supra leges, sed leges supra principem, noe prince is without the regulation of the lawes, but they are far above the authority of princes. We know in what time and state that author wrote, where monarchie and empire had not their meanest exaltation. No princes had a power beyond the authority of the Romans—no Romans greater than the princes of that age. Yet of them he speaks it, who were the masters of all others, that the lawes and statutes of their country had a mastery upon them. And so Tacitus does expresse it, of the first lawes at Rome." Valentinian follows, and Plato, and all are shown to be emphatic assertors of the great principle, that "nothing but ruin can be the fortune of that kingdom where the prince does rule the lawes, and not the lawes the prince." Aristotle, in the same way, and with the same spirit and wisdom, does confirm it, speaking of the miseries and fatalities of those states which happen, as he says, where kings endeavour more than is fitting in the government. A very sharp and masterly dissection of a disputed passage in Aristotle follows, when Eliot shows that the "court parasites" of the day have basely abused the text. Several fine quotations from various parts of Cicero are next brought forward, which, as if exultingly, Eliot exclaims, "make it against the law and principles of nature for one man to act his pleasure on another! 'To detract any thing from any man,' says he, 'and this man to draw a benefit to himself from the hurt and prejudice of that, is more contrary to nature than all poverty and sorrow, than whatever can happen to the body, not death itself excepted, or to the outward condition of a man.' What more fully or more plainly can be spoken? What greater authority can be had, either for the persons or the reasons? The Greeks, the most excellent of them, and from whom the contrary is insinuated (but how truly have we observed by the way), the Latins likewise, and not the meanest of their kind, whose judgments no posterity can impeach, we have really and actually on our side. Princes and emperors consenting! We may confirm it by the examples of some others, if number be more valuable than weight; yet not such as shall lessen the esteem; for if no other were produced, their worths might serve for a counterpoise to all opposites."

I do not know if every reader will agree with me, but, in this picture of a great mind, forcing itself, as it were, in obedience to the sad necessity of the time, to appear to need satisfaction for the penetration of its own genius in the authority and reverence of past ages, I recognise an object of very deep and affecting interest. The treatise, indeed, is scarcely so remarkable to me for the power it exhibits, great and truly valuable as that is, as for the evidences of a wider power which it restrains. It will be seen, however, as Eliot emerges from the fetters of political discussion, into what beauty and grandeur he ascends, mastering, moulding to his immortal purpose, and impregnating with his own intellectual power his variously fine attainments. I may with propriety furnish the reader at this moment with a passage of the criticism of Hampden, written on receiving the first rough draft of this portion of the treatise. "When you have finished the other parts, I pray think me as worthy of the sight of it as the former, and in both together I'll betray my weakness to my friend by declaring my sense of them. That I did see is an exquisite mosaic, composed of curious flowers, bound together with as fine a thread. But I must in the end expect honey from my friend. Somewhat out of those flowers digested, made his own, and giving a true taste of his own sweetness. Though for that I shall await a fitter time and place." And again, of other extracts from this portion of the manuscript, with no less delicate expression, Hampden says, "This I discern, that 'tis as complete an image of the patten as can be drawn by lines; a lively character of a large mind; the subject, method, and expressions excellent and homogenous; and, to say truth (sweet heart), somewhat exceeding my commendations. My words cannot render them to the life; yet (to show my ingenuousness rather than witt) would not a lesse model have given a full representation of that subject? Not by diminution, but by contraction, of parts. I desire to learn; I dare not say. The variations upon each particular seem many; all, I confesse, excellent. The fountain was full; the channel narrow; that may be the cause. Or that the author imitated Virgil, who made more verses by many than he intended to write, to extract a just number. Had I seen all his, I could easily have bidd him make fewer; but if he had bidd me tell which he should have spared, I had been apposed. So say I of these expressions." It is very truly and beautifully said, and, as we advance, the reader will see ample reason for the more exalted and enthusiastic praise which Hampden afterward bestowed on his friend's labours. Meanwhile he will pardon this digression.

Eliot, producing his examples of princes who have willingly ranged themselves on his side, in acknowledgment of the supremacy of law, proceeds: "Plutarch relates it of Antiochus, that great king of Asia, the third of his name, but the first in honour and accomplishment, that he, in conformity of this duty, sent despatches to his princes for prevention of the contrary; intimating that if any letters or commands should be brought in his name, adverse or incongruous to the laws, they should believe that (ignaro se) they were given without his knowledge and consent, and therefore that no other obedience should be yielded than was challenged by that rule. For which Gratian, on the like occasion, gives a reason, and thereupon reduced it to a law." The words of Gratian are then given. I may here observe that Eliot is scrupulously exact in his method of quotation; that where the words of the original authority are used in the text, the book and chapter are carefully written down in the margin; and that, where the sense only of the authority is employed in the treatise, a note generally supplies the exact quotation and its reference. He must have had at least the companionship of many books in his prison. The majority of his extracts from Plato and Aristotle are given in Latin, evidently to help himself on the faster, for the original editions are always referred to, and when he uses the Greek letters, he writes them with too much neatness and labour to have permitted himself their constant use. Other authorities follow Gratian; and the writer then triumphantly appeals to the opinion of a master among "both emperors and civilians," to an edict of Prince Theodosius.

"By him it was thus written for posterity. 'It is the majesty of him that governeth to confesse himself bound to the laws; so much doth authority depend on law, and so much is submission to the laws greater than authority. And that we will not to be unlawful, we shew it unto others by the oracle of this present edict.' In this," Eliot continues, "a conclusion is laid down, not only that all princes are subject to the laws, but that it is their majesty, their honor and exaltation, so to be! And the reason follows it, that the law is the ground of authority, all authority and rule a dependant of the law. This edict was not only an edict for that time, but for the generations of succeeding ages, and for all posterity to come. Rightly, therefore, and most worthily, stiled an oracle. And in correspondence to this is the moderne practice of these times. Almost in all the states of Europe princes, at the assumption of their crowns, assume and take an oath for the maintenance and observation of the laws. So, if we look either into authority or example, the use and practice of all times, from the moderne to the ancient, the reason is still cleare, without any difficulty or scruple, de jure, in right, that princes are to be regulated by the laws, and that the laws have an operation on the prince."

"Yet two things," Eliot observes, in a passage of much interest, and which illustrates an opinion I have expressed above, "we are told, do oppose, and are made arguments against this: the honor and the profit of the king, which are said to have some prejudice by this rule. Many pretensions there are made, by those that are enemies to law, to invalidate this doctrine unto princes, which in particular to convince were not a task of hardness, if the danger exceeded not the trouble. But the infection of these times is incompatible of such labours, when scarce the least disease is curable. We shall therefore follow them as wee did in the strength and assistance of authorities, which, in point of profit, do conclude that there is no fruit or advantage in injustice. Ubi turpitudine, says Cicero, ibi utilitas esse non potest—where shame and dishonesty inhabit, there profit cannot sojourn. And that dishonestie he puts for the violation of a dutie. Again, nihil utile quod non idem honestum, et nunquam potest utilitas cum honestate contendere."

Some historical examples, very graphically told, are now adduced in illustration of the last noble maxims, and Eliot hints at the contrast they present to the examples of modern days. "And yet how much more should those conventions be observed which are ratified by oath, and made with friends and citizens, fellow-citizens and brethren, of the same mother!" He then handles the question of the position in which a king is placed by having the authority of the law upon him; whether or not it is a failure of dignity. The following is subtly expressed: "In reason first, how can it be dishonour to a king to be subject to himself? No man repines at the motions of his will; no man thinks those actions dishonourable which flow from his own intentions; nor holds that phisike vilifying which works his health and safety. Yet all these must be granted to infer dishonor from the laws. Phisike that works a safety must have a vilified reception; actions free and voluntary must be in antipathy with our thoughts; affections must dispense; and so, too, the inclinations of the will (not as they are depraved, but simply as affections); and kings must hold it base to be governed by themselves, before it be concluded that there comes dishonor by the laws; which are but the promulgations of royalty; the proper motions and dispositions of that power; the special acts of princes; their own influences and intentions; a health-giving composition of their own, either made actually by their hands, or prepared for them by their fathers, their predecessors, and accepted by themselves, so that they become their own; and in being subject unto them they are but subject to themselves, which cannot be dishonorable. No man can be said to be inferior to himself, yet this must be granted in this case. Upon this honorable punctilio, kings must become inferior to themselves, and a loyal king must be less than an illegal. Yet all power has root but in the wills of men. Via omnis imperij in consensu obedientium constat, all empire and authority rests in the obedience of the subject, and the true forme of all obedience is comprehended in the laws. For those services are false, imposed by fear and terror, and so is that maxime that procures them—Oderint dum metuant! Let them hate so that they fear. That versus execrabilis, as Seneca calls it! for he gives it this operation on a prince, and therefore it is well termed execrable. If it be driven from extremity to extremity. He is hated because feared, and will maintain that fear because he is so hated."

The greater value of love, far beyond this, is next shown, in the example of an affectionate people. Eliot then looks back upon his arguments; and, in summing them up, enforces them again with new authorities, and shows great learning in the fathers. He also refers to the great textbook of constitutional law in that day, the famous treatise of Fortescue. "Fortescue, that learned chancellor of England, calls it impotence and non-power to do things contrary to the laws; and therefore the laws, he says, are no restriction to power, for to do contrary to them is no act of power; as it is no power to sinne, or to do evil, or to be sick, or old; for all these are instances that he gives, and in these respects he says they are contingent unto men. Men are less perfect than the angels, who have not libertie in those, and therefore those laws that regulate the will cannot be dishonourable." Comes, that wise Frenchman, has also a question to this purpose, upon the restraint of Lewis XI., when in the distraction of his sickness."

Before closing this branch of his subject finally, Eliot devotes some space to an exposure of the false constructions that had been placed upon writings of authority by various prerogative men. I regret that I cannot give an extract, as it exhibits a very searching vigour. With the following severe similitude he closes:

"He that governs not after the laws and customs of his country, is to be held a tyrant. To him Tacitus has applied the fable, Quod quisque viscera humana, cum aliorum victimarum visceribus forte gusteret, lupus fieri cogitur, that whoever shall taste the interior of a man, though but by chance in the mixtures of the sacrifices, he transforms into a wolf. Those human entrails in the morall are but the public rights and privileges; the devouring whereof, though but by mixture and confusion, is like that cruelty in the proverb, homo homini lupus, man a wolf to man, a transformation of humanity into the beastly nature. In the Psalms it has an expression that is higher, to which no aggravation can be added, no accumulation can be given. And that likewise proceeding from a king, who, enumerating some acts of oppression and injustice (which are the effects of an arbitrary and unlimited dominion, a tyranny, as elsewhere he does call it), accepting of persons, not defending of the poor, destroying of their rights, want of preservation and protection to the people, for which, he says, all the foundations of the earth are out of course! as if the whole frame of nature had a dependance upon justice, and that the violation of the one threatened the dissolution of the other!"

The next division of the treatise is devoted to a consideration of the power of government, and the qualities necessary for its legitimate exercise. Here, under one of many heads, a severe education is insisted on, with great force, as absolutely necessary to a prince. Eliot contrasts vividly Cyrus and his sons. "But the accession of Cyrus to the crown was from a harder fortune, which fitted him with virtue. His sonnes had a softer education, being brought up by women, eunuchs, and the like, who infused principles of weakness, and with their flattery and adulations taught nothing but the doctrine of greatness. No man was suffered to oppose them in any exercise or purpose; but all was praising and commending of all they said or did (as who dares yet do otherwise in the familiarity of princes!)" Dismissing this, however, Eliot proceeds to argue—with something like an uneasy sense of the absurdities in abstract reasoning, which are unquestionably connected with the monarchical principle—that, taking kings at the very best, as models of temperance and fortitude, they must be allowed to need something more. "Princes might have that plenitude of temperance as should restrain them from all license and exorbitance. That likewise should be accompanied with a fortitude to manage and subdue all loose appetites and affections, and make them impenetrable in that part. Yet there would be wanting one thing more necessary to perfection, nay, most necessary for the perfection of a king, which is a kind of all knowledge and omniscience, a vast and general comprehension of all things in his government, with their several incidents, emergents, and contingents, their conjunctures, disjunctures, relations, and dependencies."

This is a formidable list, and the passage which follows it is striking. Eliot revives, from his favourite author, the image of that Roman tyrant which, at the impeachment of Buckingham, had struck such dismay into Charles, for the purpose of proving that there have been princes in the old time, who, affecting a love for parliaments, were wont to commence projects by that authority, and to carry them on without it! "In this we have the confession of Tiberius, not the unwise, though not the best, of princes, who saith, non posse principem sua conscientia cuncta complecti, a prince cannot have that universality of science to comprehend all things in his braine. A senate, therefore, was thought necessary to be auxiliary and assistant, wherein that emperor did concur. With all the wisdom of his elders, squaring his profession out to justice, though his actions spake the contrary. Cuncta per consules incipiebat, says Tacitus, he began all things by the consuls. In relation to the senate, indeed, and in a public oration to that court, he did declare the necessity of their counsel, saying, experiendo didicisse quam arduum, quam subjectum fortune, regendi cuncta onus, that by experience he had found the danger and difficulty of sole government." The hypocrisy of Tiberius is afterward shown, and at the same time wrested to a finer purpose in argument than sincerity itself could have illustrated. Eliot closes with some noble passages out of Plato.

The nature of parliaments themselves, granting the necessity of their existence, is next examined. The powers which were granted them among the Jews at their sanhedrim, at Athens, in Ætolia, at Rome, in Carthage, and Sparta, are alluded to. The base purposes of those men who poison the ears of princes with jealousy of parliaments are bitterly exposed, and some of the doctrines of Machiavelli held up to scorn. A vast number of authorities are quoted, and much use is made of the arguments of Philip de Comines. Eliot, in his course, speaks highly of the genius of Sallust, and bursts into a fine eulogium at the mention of Aristotle, "that stupendum hominis, that wonder and miracle of reason!" He closes with some general arguments out of Bodin, and, winding up his parallel between a tyrant and a king, strikes heavily at the recent exactions of royalty. "This feeds on the affections of his subjects, the other on their fears. This has his fears principally for them; the other has them for the objects of his fears. This takes nothing from his subjects, but on public warrant and necessity; that drinks, carouses in their blood, and does fatten him with their marrow, to bring necessity upon them." The entire subject of the civil government of man is then wound up in the following broad and satisfactory proposition. "Monarchy is a power of government and rule for a common good and benefit, not an institution for private interests and advantage. To this runs the concurrence of all authority and reason, either grounded on the end, or the definition and examples of the order."

Eliot now advances to the grander purpose of his treatise, the consideration of the monarchy of the mind. He opens with some general comparison of the civil with the metaphysical relations in this government. He treats of the "councillors of the mind," and carries them up to their final aims, "the end and perfection of all empire, the bonum publicum of the politics; that summum bonum of philosophers, that ne ultra in felicitate." From this inquiry, however, he intimates that we must exclude at once the vanity of ambition, with its "heapings of Pelion on Ossa," and, in working the inquiry out, we must be prepared for the weaknesses of man in many points, since even the wisest men, the philosophers of the old time, have not been able to agree. This carries Eliot into an interesting expression of their differences. He describes them by the fable of Menippus.

"He found nothing but confusion upon earth, nothing but uncertainty with men. Doubt and ambiguity in some; dissent and contradiction among others; difference and disagreement amongst all. Then see the philosophers, at least their sects in controversy, if not the particulars of all kinds, yet the kinds of all particulars. The Stoicks and Epicureans opposed. The Peripateticks varying from both. The Academics differing from all. And these divided between the old and new, the Eretrians, Megarians, and Cyrenians, all in opinions separate and distinguished. Like Heterogenials, rather, and things contrary; not as professors of one science, masters of philosophy, lovers of truth and wisdom!"

This is well said. In their differences, however, Eliot discerns elements of the truth. He proposes, therefore, to examine them. "It may be we shall draw some advantage for the information of ourselves by contraction of their fancies; as was thought by a concussion of the atoms, towards the making and creation of the world. Wee will therefore take a short survey of them, and try what they will yield; judging, not by number, but by weight, what estimation may be given them; and as we find their true worth and value, so will we rate them in our book, casting the profit which they bring in the account of our own endeavours. To which we shall add what in reason or authority we shall find necessary for the opening of this secret; this end of all our labour; this scope and object of our hopes; that summum bonum in philosophie, that bonum publicum in our policy, the consummation and perfection of our happiness!"

In accordance with this design, Eliot plunges at once into the various schools of ethics that prevailed among the ancients, describes them all, and discusses their respective doctrines. At every step he gives proof of the profound scholar, of a man of wide compass of thought, and of that peculiar power in the application of learning which stamps it with the creative genius. A trail of light runs along the track of the old systems as we follow them in his pages. The Peripateticks first appear, the Academics next, and the Stoicks follow, with the thunder of Aristotle striking down their systems from beyond. The Eretrians are afterward introduced, and to them the Epicureans, in open opposition. And thus we follow all in turn, the genius of Eliot quickening these dead systems into an active present knowledge. Suddenly he exclaims, "But let us draw nearer to the light, and dispel those mists that shadow and obscure it, by the beames and radiance of the sun, that so we may find the summum bonum which we look for."

"SENECA, 'Romani nominis et sapientie magnus sol,' as Lipsius styles him, 'that great glory of the Roman name and wisdom,' thus compounds it: 'Ex bonâ conscientia, ex honestis consiliis ex rectis actionibus, ex contemptu fortuitorum, ex placido vitæ et continuo tenore, unam prementis viam.' 'Of a knowledge and intentions uncorrupted, of council liberal and just, of actions rectified and exact, of scorn of accident, of a propitious and even course and constancy of life, its diameter and straightness kept without reflection or transition.' Where these are met in a true diagram and mixture, where these ingredients are consolidate, there he makes that summum bonum, that great happiness, the term of man's perfection, the true end and object of his hopes."

Following up the principle of this moral system, Eliot defines with an exquisite clearness the relations of virtue. In the midst of this, while borrowing an illustration from Seneca, he breaks into a magnificent eulogy of the wisdom and sublimity of his ethics. His speculations in philosophy, "exclaims Eliot, with an intense fervour and beauty of expression, 'doe preach divinity to us, and his unbelief may indoctrinate our faith! Is it not shame,' he afterward asks, 'that we that are professors in the art should have less knowledge than those that never studied it! that their ignorance should know that of which our knowledge is still ignorant! at least in the exercise and practice!'" In the following I recognise the sublimity and sweetness of Hooker. "In this he puts that summum bonum and chief good, Deo parere, to be obedient unto God, to be obsequious to his will. Hoc fac, ut vires, as was the motto of the law—doe this and live. Live in all happiness and felicity; in all felicity of mind, in all felicity of body, in all felicity of estate! For all these come from him; he only has the dispensation of these goods; and he that serves him shall have the fruition of them all. His was the notion of that Heathen, which, what Christian can hear and not admire it! It strikes a full diapason to the concord of the Scriptures, and concurs with that sweet harmony! O let us then apply it to ourselves, and make his words our works! Let us endeavour for the benediction in the gospel, knowing these things to be blessed, that we do them!"

Suddenly Eliot checks himself: "But to return to our own charge and province, that we be not taxed for usurpation in intruding on another; to resume the disquisition we intended for the end and object our government, the perfection of our monarchy, which our divine Seneca doth determine in that axiom and theorem, Deum sequi." Several neat touches of statement and description succeed, with the object of a wider direction to Seneca's maxim, after which Eliot remarks: "We will now endeavour, upon all that has been said, to extract a quintessence from the variety of expressions and opinions which we have mentioned; to make one solid globe, one entire and perfect conclusion." In the course of this the moral and physical relations of the world are surveyed, and from them is shown the possibility of the attainment of a firm and independent position for the mind.

"This habit and position of the mind, to constitute perfect happiness, must be both clear and firm; clear without cloud or shadow to obscure it, and firm in all constancy. Immovable like the centre! Add then to this that it does come from God—that it is munus Dei, his free gift and largesse—and then we see what is this choice happiness and good, that summum bonum in philosophy, that bonum publicum in our policy, the true end and object of the monarchy of man! It is a clear and firme habit and position of the mind by knowledge, rectifying all the actions and affections to the rule and conformity of reason. It is to be happy. Not in greatness, and honor, riches, or the like, but in any state or quality, that elixir may be found; from the most simple being of mankind that quintessence may be drawn. The mind being brought to that quality and condition, the faculty working on the object, not the object on the faculty, there is in any state, how mean or low soever, an equal passage and ascent to that great height and exaltation!"

The elements by which the proposed monarchy of the mind may be constructed having been thus established, and the possibility of its construction shown, Eliot mentions with exultation the great virtues which, once it is constructed, shall tend to its immortal sustenance. But then he restrains himself. Before we triumph we must subdue. Through sorrow it may be necessary to advance to joy. "We must do as Æneas did with Dido, through sad stories of tragedies and disasters make a transition unto love. As mariners in rowing look contrary to their courses, so we, in the search of happiness and felicity, must have our eyes upon the subject of our misery. Those we must first behold which are enemies of our state, and from them make a passage to our government. Wherein, if, by knowledge of the adversaries, we can find means to conquer and subdue them, if, by the strength and opposition of the virtues, we can overcome and subjugate the affections, then we may triumph in our victory, and in all security and peace erect that trophy of felicity, that summum bonum and chief happiness of man."

The impediments to man's happiness are accordingly treated, and, from this onward, with such a union of power and sensibility, of sweetness and grandeur, as I do not think has ever been surpassed by the best prose writers in our language: It is the privilege of true intellectual greatness to glorify itself in what the world calls adversity, and never did it employ a means more noble than this of Eliot's. Rewarded with a prison for the service of active years devoted to his country; the tyranny apparently triumphant, to oppose which he had surrendered fortune and freedom; a disease induced by the foul air of his dungeon making rapid strides upon his life, yet only in its prime; it is impossible to detect in this illustrious person the quailing of a single nerve. He rises superior to all extremities, in simply continuing equal to himself. The philosopher of the Tower is no more and no less than the statesman of the House of Commons. The essential object of his exertions is in both cases the same, and I look upon these exalted meditations as only a continuance, in intense expression, of the active energies of his life. The steady invasion of disease forbade him to hope that the latter could ever be renewed; and, thus excluded from the sphere of virtuous public action, he left an example of even greater value to the world—an example to console them in temporary defeat, to carry ardour and enthusiasm unhurt through trial—an example that should multiply their powers of action and resistance, by strengthening their moral purposes. I see no unnatural contrast, therefore, in any portion of Eliot's life. I recognise his old brave fearlessness in his present inculcation of a perfect restraint and self-command; I trace the rapid grandeur of his younger days in the composed magnanimity of morals which sustains him through this "last scene of all."

Through the impediments that obstruct man's happiness in self-government, Eliot, as I have said, proceeds. Hemmed in as the mind is shown by him to be, he undertakes to point out the passage of escape from this "bondage and captivity." The first impediment he notices is "fear." He goes through the various chances that may occasion it, with a pregnant personal reference; he describes the "effects of power sudden, various, and fearful; wherein imprisonment, wounds, and death, and that in a thousand forms, are threatened; in which both sickness and poverty are involved;" but in none of these, he says, is there real cause of fear. He concludes his masterly examination thus: "Fears must yield to happiness, or happiness to fears."

Eliot then passes to what he calls "the next link of this chain of our unhappiness, another part of the fetters that we wear"—to that "inexplicable piece of vanity, our hope." This he considers in many respects a great evil. "But not to be mistaken," he says, "for want of some distinction in this case; all hopes are not like, nor alienenies of our government, though all have one uncertainty, by the trouble of expectation, and the dependence upon time. All have this vanity and weakness, that their rest is upon others, not in themselves, and in that respect they are obnoxious unto fortune: yet all have not a participation in the evil; all are not sharers in the guilt; some are natural, and have their principles in nature." The exceptions are occasionally treated, and with a prodigious mass of learned allusion. In conclusion, Eliot dwells with much intenseness on the perpetual agitations in which hope keeps a man; the fear to lose, the jealousy, the satiety, and all the incidents that fall to it.

Sorrow approaches next, and this is described as the worst and least excusable of the impediments yet named. For yet, Eliot says, fear has some resource of safety, hope has some desire of happiness. "These," he strikingly continues, "have somewhat for justification and apology, at least for excuse and extenuation of their evils. But sorrow only is inferior to them all. No argument can be made for her defence; she can pretend neither to happiness, nor safety, nor to what might be subservient to either. As the professed enemy to both, her banners are displayed. She fights against all safety, and bids defiance unto happiness. Her ends, her arts are in contestation of them both. Reason has nothing to alledge why sorrow should be used; it propounds no advantage in the end, no advantage in the act, but the mere satisfaction of itself, the sole expletion of that humour; therefore is it the most improper of all others, as incomparably the worst, and that likewise the effects and consequence on the body will show." The conclusion of the subject is a subtle treatment of the selfishness of sorrow. It is not called forth, he says, by the misfortunes of our friends, for that feeling is pity; nor by the triumphs of our enemies, for that is envy. "Sorrow is selfishness." For the "privation of whatever we hold dear, of whatever is in a tender estimation," Eliot suggests nobler and better remedies.

Pleasure follows. "And thus we see how these enemies doe threaten us. Fear does anticipate, hope divert, sorrow overturn the happiness we look for; or, rather, they fight against the happiness itself; fear secretly undermining, hope circumventing, sorrow charging it at full. But, above all, the most dangerous is behind—PLEASURE!" The reason of the peculiar danger that attends the indulgence of pleasure is then shown to consist in the so false resemblance it bears in itself to happiness, that it is like to steal through all the "guards and watches" that we keep, into our strongest "retreats and strongholds." Nothing, Eliot observes, in the course of much splendour of eloquence and reason, "nothing is so petulant and refractory, so exorbitant and irregular, as pleasure. No rule, no law, no authority can contain it; but, like Semiramis, admit her government for a day, she usurps the rule for ever."

Having considered these impediments to happiness, these obstructions to the monarchy of man, Eliot indulges a speculation on the design of Providence in thus appearing to have opposed, by the creation of such unworthy passions, its own vast and pure design.

"But here an objection or wonder may be made, how, from one fountain, such different streams should flow; how, from the self-same head, such contraries should derive themselves; and that greater wonder may arise how the great architect and workman, who gave being to all things in his divine wisdom, did so create the mind by the infusion of such principles, that the contrariety of their motions should threaten the destruction of his work! For faction and division imply this, and the dissension of the parts hazards the confusion of the whole. It's a great cause of wonder, in the thing, that it is so, but of far greater admiration in the reason. That he, thus wise, thus willing, thus able to give perfection to his art, should, in the masterpiece thereof, in his own portraiture and image, leave it with imperfection! This is enough for wonder and admiration (if it were so). But yet the next has more the inscrutability of that reason; which turns these imperfections to perfections; which in these contrarieties makes agreement; by these differences, these divisions, these dissensions, works unity and concord! This is a cause of wonder and admiration so transcendent, as human capacity cannot reach. O! the incomprehensible glory of the wisdom by which such secrets are disposed! We may see it almost in every thing, as the effect gives illustration to the cause; and so in fact confirm, though we cannot penetrate, the reason itself. All things, almost generally, will demonstrate it. If we look into the universality of the world, or the concurrence of its parts, are there more contraries than in the common materials they consist of! Can there be more antipathy than the elements sustain! What greater enemies than their wars? And so with the air and earth. Dryness and moisture are opposed; than which no things can be more different; yet amongst these what a sweet league and amitie is contracted! What mutual love and correspondency they retain! Fire agrees with water, earth with air, the latter with the former, each severally with other, and so respectively with all! and that which is the perfection of them all, the composition which they make, the frame of those materials, the body so compounded, has its being and existence by the very mixture and diagram of these! Nay, by the want of either, their dissolution is enforced. So necessary is the contrariety of the parts, and the opposition which they make, that, without it, the whole cannot subsist. As thus in the generals, so in the particulars from thence. In the immense infinite of creatures, amongst the dead or living, are their antipathies to be numbered? Can arithmetic define the contrarieties they have? Stone opposing stone, metal against metal, plant against plant; all war! And animate beasts contrary to beasts, fowls against fowls, fishes against fishes; in hate, in cruelty opposed, killing and devouring each other; and yet all made serviceable to man! Amongst men, too, what contentions are there extant; what wars, what quarrels, what dissensions! Nation in antipathy with nation, kindred opposed to kindred, family against family, man against man! And, besides, how infinite is their difference and variety in temper, in affection, in condition; so that reconciliation seems impossible, and, without it, their subsistence. Yet in the revolution of that wisdom these things are so turned, in the divine wheel of providence their conversions are so made, that all move directly to one end! The alloy and contentions of the parts work the conservation of the whole."

Eliot now sums up the character and objects of the monarchy he seeks to establish; ranging against it its various impediments, that he may enlarge on the means of their removal. This is beautifully done, by an exhibition of the utter vanity of the causes to which, in general, they owe their existence. Poverty, for instance, he begins with, as a thing which provokes fear, but in which there is no essential cause for fear. He treats this at great length, and with much fervour. Don Guzman himself never said finer things in behalf of poverty. "Are riches," he asks, "of that virtue that their want should seem so terrible? How many have they sold to misery and unhappiness! What worlds of men have they corrupted and betrayed! corrupted in manners and affections, betrayed of their liberties and lives!" Out of these reflections he plunges into a praise of poverty. He tells the poor what they escape. He sums up the diseases of the rich, famous for their excruciating pains; and contrasts with them the "privileges of poverty, the immunities of want." He then drags forth from antiquity a long list of illustrious poor; he speaks of the lives of Fabricius, Curio, Menenius, Valerius, and Seneca; and holds them up as the best of all examples to comfort and to teach. "Who more valiant than Miltiades?" he exclaims; "who more wise than Cymon? who than Aristides more just! who more temperate than Phocion? Yet all these the poorest as the best of all their times!"

Sickness is treated of by Eliot next, as no just cause of fear. From sickness, suggested by his own sufferings, he advances through the various effects of power, to imprisonment, to death, but in none can he find "just cause of fear." He acknowledges their aspects to be startling. "To dispel the fears of that which power and greatness may impose requires a harder labour, because the dangers seem far greater, and are more various and more sudden. For—not to reflect on poverty and sickness as incidents to this (which wounds and confiscations do imply), those too frequent and two known effects of power—but to look for ward and to view it in the other issues, which it has; disgrace, imprisonment, DEATH, and those in all their ugliness and deformity. This last is that tyrant which our apprehensions do so fear; that monstrum horrendum informe, which strikes us with such terror; this is that dire aspect at which our resolutions do so fly; this is that traitor that makes such sedition in our government, and which we must the more carefully oppose for the vindication of our happiness. In this place, therefore, we will only deal with it, and with the rest hereafter."

Into these passages respecting death Eliot throws all his eloquence: "Death," he says, "has its consideration but in terror; and what is assumed from that is like the imaginations of children in the darke, a mere fancy and opinion." With a melancholy fondness, the anticipation of their approaching intimacy, he defends death as a friend might be defended. It has been slandered, he says, by those who cannot have known it, "most untruly, most unjustly slandered." "For either happiness it contains, or it repels calamity, or gives satiety and weariness an end, or does prevent the hardness of old age! A conclusion 'tis to all; to some their wish; but to none more meriting and deserving than to whom it comes uncalled for! It frees from servitude, dissolves the chains of captives, sets all prisoners at liberty, and restores the banished to their country. All their sorrows and disasters have termination in this point. It has been called humanis tempestatibus portus, the harbour of human miseries, the sedation of our troubles. Implying thus the comparison of our life to a fluctuation on the seas, we as poor mariners sailing in the weak vessels of our nature and fortune, the wind tossing us by the continual agitation of her tempests, trouble being instant and upon us, danger most imminent and before us, hope fled, safety nowhere to be found; death only is the haven to receive us, where there is calmness and tranquillity, where there is rest from all these storms and tempests! In that port all fluctuations of our life are quieted and composed; nor winds nor seas have power upon us there; fortune and time are excluded from that road; there we anchor in security, without the distractions of new troubles; there without danger or hazard do we ride."

With a slight shade of humour, such as issues so naturally out of a subject of this sort, and suits with it so well, Eliot next calls for the evidence of men who have themselves died, as to the character of death. "No great variety," he observes, "can be looked for in this strange kinde of proof, men so seldom returning from the dead." This is simply an introduction to the story of that Athenian whom Plato raised to speak of the terrors below the earth. Such terrors were only for "the oppressors of mankind, such as had made their wills their laws, tyrants, Arides and his followers, whom hell itself abhorred!" Far different was the lot of the good, "the servants unto virtue." Life is afterward beautifully presented by Eliot, in contrast with its dark neighbour, as only "an inne to rest in, a lodging for the night, an hostelry in our travels, in our continual journey to the mansion of our fathers!" Nay, life itself, he exclaims, taken at the best, is only made up of various deaths, one passion dying, another succeeding but to die. "So that our whole life is but an exercise of dying, and all the changes and vicissitudes of nature, death, in a measure and degree! Why then should death be thought so terrible? where is the reason of that fear?" Rather, he afterward suggests, should it be made a matter of triumph and of glory. "What martyrs have there been even in the work of dying! More joying, more rejoicing, than in all the acts of life! The glory of the Deity, the incarnate majesty of the Son, those incomprehensible mysteries of divinity, then appearing to them, by revelation to their sense, or by illumination of the fancy—the heavens opening to give free passage to their view—these, as it were, descending unto them, giving them the possession here of that happiness that eternal happiness and felicity, which is the chief object of all hopes; not that happiness we treat of, the sumbonum of this life, the bonum publicum of our monarchy, but the supernatural felicity to come, the transcendent happiness hereafter!"

Nor will Eliot rest at these examples of the victorious agonies of martyrdom, since they are sustained as it were by the divine presence. There is a bravery which comes nearer to his own, a grandeur of moral courage which needs no miracle to help it. "I will resort," he says, "to patterns of morality. Then, to see the confidence in them, the willingness and cheerfulness of dying—take it from those Grecians, those three hundred at Thermopolis, who, for their country, opposed themselves to all the power of Xerxes—to those many millions of the Persians whose thirst scarce seas could satisfy, nor whole regions for one day find provisions for their hunger! Yet unto these those Grecians could expose themselves, so few against so many, for the safety of their mother. The clouds of darts that fell on them they term'd an umbrella for the sunne; their danger they made glory; their death they thought their life; so far from terror was it that they made it the subject of their hopes. O happy men! thus for their country to have died! Most happy country, to have brought forth such men! whose death became the character of her life, and was to her and them a patent of immortality!" Among the crowding thoughts of many examples of this kind, Eliot kindles into a greater fervour, and he fills the solitary recesses of his dungeon with men of Rome, of Athens, and of Sparta, "fellows whom death itself might fear, sooner than be fearful unto them. Mirrors of men," he finely continues, "are chronicle'd for a free acceptance of that fate; women did scorn their children that did not scorn to die it!" And as Eliot thus recalls the past, an example nobler than all the others rises up, because complete in the elements of moral grandeur, in the perfection of self-control, the monarchy of man. The philosopher Ramus stands before him, "who did not as Cato, to avoid the dying by his enemies, nor suddenly, to prevent the torment of the time, nor as those Grecians, in the heat of blood and danger, when death does come unthought—but giving it all leave of preparation, admitting all circumstance of terror, in that form which his enemies had cast, to the extremity of their malice—so he encounters, so he receives and meets it, even in its very contemplation! His speculations were upon it, it was the subject of his thoughts, and in that he valued it more precious than his life."

To this illustrious shadow of the past SIR WALTER RALEIGH succeeds! His image, indeed, had scarcely vanished from those dark walls that now surrounded Eliot, and his spirit remained in the magnanimity of Eliot's soul. "Shall I not add, as parallel to this, a wonder and example of our own? such as if that old philosopher were yet living, without dishonour he might acknowledge, as the equal of his virtue. Take it in that—also unmatched—fortitude of our RALEIGH! the magnanimity of his sufferings, that large chronicle of fortitude! All the preparations that are terrible presented to his eye—guards and officers about him—fetters and chains upon him—the scaffold and executioner before him—and then the axe, and more cruel expectation of his enemies! And what did all this work on the resolution of this worthy? Made it an impression of weak fear? or a distraction of his reason? Nothing so little did that great soul suffer! but gathered more strength and advantage upon either. His mind became the clearer, as if already it had been freed from the cloud and oppression of the body; and the trial gave an illustration to his courage, so that it changed the affection of his enemies, and turned their joy to sorrow, and all men else it filled with admiration; leaving no doubt but this, whether death were more acceptable to him, or he more welcome unto death!"

How nobly expressed this is! The style of Eliot, uncramped by the authorities to which he chose at times to link it, was as free and grand as his own free thoughts. These his friend Hampden, as the treatise advances, alludes to with a profound deference. "Your apprehensions, that ascend a region above those clouds which shadow us, are fit to pierce such heights; and others to receive such notions as descend from thence; and which, while you are pleased to impart, you make the demonstrations of your favour to become the rich possessions of your ever faithful friend."

Eliot betrays a melancholy reluctance to let the subject of death pass from him. Assuming that these examples of fearlessness in dying are of too exalted a character for the emulation of all men, that all have not the same motives or means of sustenance, he very beautifully says: "There is no affection within man but has given examples in this case. Hope, joy, sorrow, fear itself, has conquered it, the weakest of all others! Fear of death has forced men to act the thing they fear." And, after some very subtle reasoning to this point, he proceeds: "Therefore, that truth so known, we may in a generality conclude that death and fear are conquered both by love. Sorrow can do as much." And we have it in the infirmity of her daughters, pity, which is the tenderest of all thoughts, yet that subdues this fear, as Tacitus notes it of the multitudes after the fall of Otho." Yet Eliot concludes not even here. Still he lingers on the praise and the privilege of death. "I shall then no more be sick; I shall then no more be bound; I shall then leave off to fear; I shall then not die again. If death were an evil at the first, then it shall be no more. All the crosses and disasters, all the calamities and afflictions, all things that are fearful and evil in this life, then shall I be free from! No death shall therefore be an interruption to my happiness, therefore why should I fear it? But if death have all these privileges, why then do we live? why do we not, as Cleombrotus, having read Plato's discourses of the immortality of the soul, precipitate ourselves? hasten to that excellence? press to that rich magazine of treasures? why do we bear such miseries in life, there being such felicity in death? and the transition in our power, so facile and so ready? The answer with the ethicks is emergent: mors non debet esse fuga actionum, sed actio—death must not be a flight from action, but an action. Subterfuge is the property of a coward; blows and wounds are the honor of a soldier. Dangers must not affright, but harden him, where the cause requires his hazard." And through much eloquence he proceeds, impressing over again, and with an increased fervour, the necessity of subduing fear, "though the sun itself should tremble—though the immense fabric of the world should shake;" and at last concluding by praying of all men, in all cases, to "expect calmly that issue which time and virtue have appointed. Thus we must look for death; not as an enemy, but a friend; which in his own hours visits us, expects no invitation, may not be compelled, but has a free liberty before him. When he comes, he comes attended by many privileges, decked with flowers of happiness, rest, and sweetness, and exemption of all the evils of life. Therefore there is not the least cause to fear it, or to raise that jealousy and distraction in our government."

The duty of opposing the desires is the next matter discussed. Eliot, after a delicate handling of the bodily passions, points out the jealousy and restless irresolution of desire, agitated between the doubt of attainment and the doubt of loss, hindering even its own satisfaction, and joined with sorrow. "Shall this, then," he asks, "have entertainment in the heart, where happiness and felicity should dwell? That it is a vanity and mere nothing, either the act or the consequence do prove it; for, in itself, what is it more than an imagination and light fancy! In the effect and consequence, does any man conceive there is the least advantage in the thought? Does the most affectionate in this case think that the object is drawn nearer by his wish? 'Tis true, of faith 'twas said, 'believe, and then thou hast,' but never of this desire. We may desire and want; nay, that want is but desire. Desire does make the want. As it is nothing in itself, nothing but want does follow it—a vain and fruitless issue, like the mother. Nor is this all for which wisdom does oppose it, that it is, thus, a vanity and mere nothing. No! as an evil likewise she contests it; nay, as the ground and root of all our miseries, the spring and fountain of calamity!" Wielding, then, vast knowledge with the most perfect ease, giving freshness to old truths, and binding together by living ties the rude materials of dead learning, Eliot goes through the dangers that are in desire; "the cares, anxieties, and doubts; the thousand troubles and distractions which men in hope and men in love are charged with; for these in the notion are but one, though distinguished in the expression. Pardon me, Love," interposes Eliot here, "that so hardly I have matched thee! it is my reason, not my affection, that does speak it." He passionately continues, "What theatre or amphitheatre will serve to represent the tragedies it has acted? In tragic scenes of blood, what executions have been done by the hand of this affection! Man a butcher upon man, acquaintance on acquaintance, familiar on familiar, friend upon friend, kinsman upon kinsman, brother upon brother, father upon son, the son upon the father! drinking up blood like leeches; nay, making sacrifices of themselves, to eternal horror and confusion; and, with their own hands, forcing a passage to that darkness which even hell itself does tremble at! What numberless examples of this kind have love, covetousness, ambition, and their like, almost every day exhibited, and are still contriving, to threaten, as it were, the destruction of mankind!"

In accordance with his general plan of showing in the profoundest view the vanity of the particular passion, by showing the objects that usually excite it to be vain, Eliot now treats the ordinary motives to love. In a portion of his previous discussion of it he had reduced it simply, in its voluptuous form, to "what is pleasant;" and "pleasure" he had shown to be unworthy. "The felicitie we look for is an action: not a thought, not a dream, or imagination of the fancy; it is an action of virtue!" As of one of the motives to the passion, he then speaks of the vanity of beauty. "What," he asks, "can be found in beauty—the object that love has—so to possess the affection of the mind, and cause a defection from reason? The description that was given it by that unfortunate piece of merit who died where now I live, may be a resolution in this point, who has it in that idea of his wife, that

"Carnal beauty is but skin deep,
But to two senses known;
Short even of pictures, shorter lived than life,
And yet survives the love that's built thereon?"

"wherein there is such a latitude of sense, such a perspicuity of truth, that, if all other fancies were collected, this might be the judgment of them all. Here, in an abstract, is a full comprehension of their natures, with all plainness, yet elegantly rendered."

The name of this "unfortunate piece of merit" may have already suggested itself to the reader. It is Sir Thomas Overbury. Keen was Eliot's sympathy for oppression in all cases; and here, in his love of literature (which Overbury's writings, as I have before had an opportunity of saying, had, in that age, most delicately adorned), and in some circumstances of his own condition, much conspired to sharpen even that sharp sympathy. He dwells for some time with fondness on this quotation from Overbury's poem, and then, in a passage of lively interest, apologises, as it were, to the reader. "Let it not," he says, "seem a wonder that I write this fancy for authority, being so new, and borne amongst ourselves. I must confess my ignorance, if it be so. I esteem it not the less as begotten in this age, and as it is our own I love it much the more. 'Tis truth which I do look for, and the propriety of expression to endure it, not only to the judgment, but the affections: making an insinuation also by the language for the sense and reason of the thing. This I find here, in this Theoreme, in as great fullness, and as succinctly rendered, as the exotics can pretend. Why then we should not value it to the truth and merit which it bears is a wisdom past the apprehension of my weakness. I must declare my folly in that point. As it is of my country, I honour it the more; and as it was the production of this place, my admiration is the greater, that in such solitude and darkness, where sorrow and distraction mostly dwell, such happy entertainments and such minutes were enjoyed."

I am not acquainted with any passage in the language which expresses, in a few admirable words, a sounder canon of criticism than is to be observed in the course of the above. It is unnecessary to direct the reader's attention to the deep meaning of the closing lines. I may add, that the feeling so strongly intimated here, of opposition to a prevalent fashion of that age, a fashion which belongs, perhaps, to the literary coxcombry of all ages, is in many other parts of his work emphatically urged by Eliot.

Another object of desire—riches—is now discussed. The passage is a beautiful companion to that of the deprecation of poverty as an object of fear. His opening reasons against the avarice of wealth are strongly stated. "Preposterous and absurd" are the mildest epithets he affords to it at last. He describes riches to be "deceitful in their nature, whereas we think them somewhat, when truth does speak them nothing; deceitful in their qualities—being flitting and uncertain, without any constancie or stabilitie, always wing'd, and flying from one subject to another; deceitful in their use—as we take them to be helpful to our happiness, though working the contrary by continuall anxieties and cares! Why should we then desire them, being no way to be trusted, but in all consisting of fallacie and frauds?" Very beautiful are the series of questions that follow. "Hast thou worth or merit that might challenge them as due? That is a mystery to them. They cannot discern it. The worthless and the worthy are equal in their sense." "They are the maine occasion," he continues, "of all differences, the ager contentiosus, as it were, the field of quarrel and contention, as that antiently neare Berwicke to the English and Scotch nations." Nobly Eliot sums up their high demerits. "If these be their proprieties, how can we then desire them? If they be but serviceable to these, if they have no fellowship with honesty, if they dissolve the powers of reason and of virtue, if they be distractive and contentious, blind, mad, deceitful, and uncertain, what is it that should make that attraction in our hearts, and disturb our self-sovereignty and command?" The subject is closed with a very fine allusion to the only mode of converting the dross of riches into true gold, by the alchemy of virtue. You may have riches, Eliot says, you may desire them, if your purpose is to convert them to good. "But how is that?" he asks; "by what means must it be done? The poet does expresse it:

"Divitias probæ
Virtutis instrumenta facite. Sic
Bonæ credimini, et vitam beatam Degere poteritis!"

"Make riches instruments of virtue, let them be servants to that mistress. See you may live happily and well."

Honour is the next subject treated by Eliot as an object of desire. This, in the worldly acceptance, is regarded by him with an extreme scorn. "Something still may be said for beauty and for riches; but the honour and glory that the world so names have no reality or substance, no solid being or existence, but are suppositious and imaginative, like those essences of philosophers, quæ quasi sunt, as they say, which are but as if they were." "Let the description of that author," Eliot continues, having indulged a severe censure upon the worldly cause of honour, fame, "let the description of that author speake the nature of the subject. Let Fame, from which honour is deduced, show what this honour is, it being the daughter of that mother. In that mother take the qualitie of the daughter. Of which Virgill thus:

"Ilam Terra parens, ira irritata deorum,
Extremam, ut perhibent, Cæo Enceladus sororem
Progenit, pedibus celerem, et pernicibus alis.
Monstrum horrendum, ingens: cui, quot sunt corpore
Tot vigiles oculi subter, mirabile dictu, [plume,
Tot lingue, totidem ora sonant, tot subrigit auris.
Nocte volat celi medio terraque, per umbram
Stridens, nec dulci declinat lumina somno.
Luce sedet custos, aut summi culmine tecti,
Turribus aut altis, et magnas territ urbis:
Tam ficti praviqve tenax, quam nuntia veri."

(which Eliot translates with freedom)—"First, as sister to the Giants, the Earth produced it in malice of the Gods—swift-footed, light-winged, a huge and horrid monster; having that strange thing to be told under each feather of her body, a prying watchful eye; and unto that both ears and tongues as many, and mouths not fewer, always in sound and motion. All night it flies through the middle of the heavens, and divides the darkness, giving no place to rest. And in the day it sits on the supreme tops of houses, or in high turrets, a terror to whole cities, being as well the herald of lies and mischiefs as a reporter of the contrary." This Virgill makes both her nature and descent."

Adopting the suggestion of the Latin poet, Eliot now works out a very fine contrast between the huge, but incapable, energies of the Titans, and the calm accomplishing grandeur of the gods. In the eyes of the latter, he says, and to the perceptions of philosophy, fame is nothing. The following passage succeeds. It is a masterly dissection of one of the things denominated honour, in shape of an inquiry into the claim of hereditary rank; which for sober satire, joined to exalted reason, could with difficulty be excelled. It calls to my memory some forcible and eloquent things, which are urged in a style precisely similar, by one of the most original thinkers of this or of any age, Mr. Walter Savage Landor, in his delightful "Examination of Shakspeare for Deer-stealing." "And now to see," says Eliot, "whether this 'honor' be confined within an order, limited to persons and degrees, or left promiscuously to all, as their worths and qualities shall deserve it. Wherein let reason be the judge. Is if the reward of virtue or of fortune they would make it? Let them answer who so magnify this pretence. Do they apply that honor to their houses or themselves? Is it the distinction of their families, or the guerdon of their merits? If they will take it for distinction, 'tis but a name, and the poorest. The basest have as much, and small cause there is to glory in that subject. If it be the distinction of their families, the character of their houses, though it once implied a glory, what can it be to them more than treasures are to porters? But they will say it is the glory of their ancestors, the acquisition of their virtues, and from them it does descend hereditarily to us. So may the porter say. That treasure is his master's, and by his will imposed upon his shoulders; but to whose use, and in whose right, has he received it? In his own, or to his own profit and advantage? Masters would take this ill, if their servants should usurp it; and all men would condemn them, both of falsehood and ingratitude. So is it, in the other, an injury to their ancestors, if they pretend that honor to be theirs. They can but carry it to their use, as a monument of their virtues that acquired it, not in their own interest and right, to the glory of themselves; nay, not without their shame, whose purchase cannot equal it, being but the sole inheritors of the fortune, not the worth. But if they waive their families, and reduce it to themselves, between their virtues and their fortunes, how will they divide it? If fortune do appropriate it, then the most vicious, the most ignorant, the most dishonorable may be honorable; slaves, and they, may be equal in this kind; for not seldom have they tasted the liberality of fortune, and this honor none will envy them. If virtue be the loadstone that procures it, where is it? Let them shew it in the effect, and then I hope they'll grant that all so qualified may be honorable. All men that have the virtue may participate. Where, then, is the propriety they challenge? where is that peculiar interest they claim? Certainly not in this. This honor will not bear it, which is the crown of virtue! All persons, all orders, all degrees extant may be capable thereof. They are without exception or exclusion, and, for such other honors as are fancied, let them enjoy an immunity therein; I shall rather pity than malign them!"

After this, as it were to wai away the time, Eliot brings up in aid of the general question new "squadrons of authorities;" disputing some, exalting others. "In one word," he subsequently says, "honor is no other than to follow goodness. To be a servant unto virtue is to be master of true honor, and without that service no honor can be had. Therefore the Romans, those most honorable above all men, in the temples which they dedicated, joined those of virtue and honor to each other, and to that of honor left no entrance or accession but through the gate of virtue; shewing by that symbol where true honor rests, and how it is attained, which is by following virtue. But how is that? how is virtue to be followed? in a fair and easy pace? will that conduce to honor? can honor be so had?" Eliot answers these questions with elaborate care, and closes the subject, after a strong reiteration of his protest against the hereditary claim, that honour should not be "appropriated to any order or degree, as is pretended," for that "to be gotten and descended even of princes is an accident," with an allusion to those enemies of Roman tyranny whose honour, because it was true, outshone the worst envy of the times. Eliot had a peculiar right to call to mind these men, for in his own nature he presented some of their noblest qualities—the fiery energy of Cassius, and Brutus's brave philosophy. "Tactius," he says, "notes it upon the funeral of Junia, where so many famous images were exhibited, the glory of their families, that Brutus and Cassius being omitted through the envy of those times, they outshined the rest because their statues were not seen. Et ipso quod effigies eorum non viscebantur pręfulgebant," as he has it. They being so concealed, their glory was the greater. Which shews that honor is most had when it is least affected. Why, then, should this disturb us with ambition? why should it make a faction in our government? why should it cause the distraction of our hopes? Ambition cannot purchase it, the hope thereof is vain; no art, no practice can acquire it but by the rule of virtue. And so only, as the virtue is intended, let virtue be our aim. Leave that desire of honor. Let it not be a work of our affections, for in that case we must fight with honor as with enemies."

The reader will have remarked with what a steady purpose, in how close a vice of logic, the main object and argument of the treatise is kept. Eliot now examines his position. "And thus we see from the several objects of desire how little cause there is for that disturbance and impulsion. Honor contains no reason, being rather an enemy than friend to that affection, flying and not following it. Beauty has as little, consisting but of vanity. Riches much less, that are but instruments of corruption. Also for fear, poverty, death, sickness, and the like, which have as small warrant and authority for that passion. Let us now search what more there is in Pleasure, that counterfeit of happiness, and apply our laws to that; for, being the most dangerous of our adversaries, it must the more cautiously be dealt with." To the subject of pleasure, accordingly, Eliot reverts, with the intention of impressing more emphatically in that regard the duty of self-restraint. A vast number of authorities are brought to bear upon it, and Eliot takes occasion to express the most exalted admiration of Homer. He calls him a "prophet and a poet." He amuses himself, at the same time, with notices of Lucian's comments upon Homer, and pursues at great length the analogy between the resistance of Ulysses to the Syrens, and a perfect self-restraint in man. He bound himself, he says, he restricted his liberty. "But wherewith was that done? What were the obligations he incurred? How shall this come to us? Most properly and most readily, if we will endeavour but that means, if we will use the example of that worthy. The same safety is for us which was then wrought to him, and that that great prophet has delivered, with all sincerity and fulness. You know he makes Ulysses then on ship board. And that much experienced man, most curious of all knowledge, would needs add to that the music of the Syrens, the perception of that excellence, though not trusting to himself for the resistance of their powers, in which both danger and destruction were implied. To avoid this, he feigns to be fastened to the mast; his men, meanwhile, do intend their labours, having their senses stopped (vulgar appetites being not capable of such dainties). Now, as this music was but pleasure, those Syrens the occasion, so the virtue were the cords that did restrain and bind him, reason the mast to which he was so fastened, philosophy the ship in which he sailed and went; and in this ship, thus fastened to that mast, having had both the occasion and delight, he escap't the dangers threatened, and in that preserved the safety of his course. But what was that? the same that is our government, the way to happiness and felicity! this was his Ithaca, this was that course intended, and with these hopes, notwithstanding all the difficulties, this he accomplished and performed! Now is not this a plain direction unto us? Is not our remedy, our deliverance from this danger, apply expressed in this mirror and example? Our syrens are not more, their harmonies not stronger; the same ship we have, with the same tackle; the same ropes, the same mast continue still. Cannot our course, then, be the same! Is not the same safety yet before us? If we doubt that tackle will not hold us against those strong enchantments, let us stop our senses, as Ulysses did with his men, and first avoid the occasions. Nothing is lov'd, not known. Let us, then, stint our curiosity herein, and the desire will leave us. But how is that? how shall that work be done? Is it to shun all pleasure, all occasions? That cannot be, nor is it requisite to this! For virtue in the concrete is not absolute, nor to be so expected in our monarchy."

All this is subtly and well expressed; and its deep spirit of philosophy has farther vent in the following remarkable passage: "We daily see it in experience, that those who have least affections are most violent (least, I mean, extensively, in respect of number, and the object); their passions being impetuous as contracted to that narrowness, and masterless in that. As Tacitus notes it in Tiberius, who, being most reserved and hidden unto all men, to Sejanus yet was open and incautions. So it is likewise unto others. The heart, being straitened by some objects, grows more violent in those passions; the affection does enlarge as the scope thereof is lessened. Therefore we thus expose that precept of division: that pleasures may be a remission to the mind, not an intention—that we may taste, not swallow them—that the appetite may be more temperate to reason, wherein only true pleasures doe consist."

Carrying out his plan of reverting to the more dangerous impediments in the way of man's monarchy, Eliot now resumes the subject of sorrow: "Sorrow," he again insists, "is a perfect enemy, standing in such antipathy with happiness, that it is irreconcilable for our government: therefore to this also we must oppose all the resistance we have, for this moves most violently against us; and if it get possession of our hearts, if it once enter on that fort, all our happiness is gone, our monarchy is subverted! For it destroys the end, the felicity we look for, and then the means is useless. It dissolves it in the principle, and so brings it to confusion. For where sorrow is no felicity can be, and a mind so affected can have no taste of happiness. To encounter it, therefore, as physicians do diseases, we will first meet it in the cause; for if that can be removed, the effect forthwith will follow it. The object being gone, the affection must fall after it." Eliot then points out, with renewed earnestness, the fallacy and folly of supposing that things which assume at times the aspects of sorrow are in reality sorrowful. He argues the great principle of the poet of nature, that "there's a Providence that shapes our ends, rough-hew them how we will." Above all, however, he impresses the virtue of opposing whatever appears in sorrow's shape. The exercise, he says, will be great, a discipline of humanity, and an invaluable example to others. "For are not soldiers sometimes heightened in their courage by the valour of their fellows? Do not the valiant often receive new fortitude and spirits by the acts of magnanimity of others? Has not admiration, has not emulation this effect, to work the likeness of that virtue which it has seen before it? to reduce to act the image of that idea which the apprehension has conceived, and, from the excellence of the pattern, to draw an antitype thereof. Wherefore were exhibited those bloody spectacles at Rome—those butcheries of men—those tragic representations to the people—but to inure them to blood, to harden them in dangers, to familiar them with death? And shall not better acts, to better ends directed, have the like power and operation? Shall not divinity, by the works of divine men opposing their afflictions, have as great force in precedent and example as these Romans had by that fighting with beasts, or contesting one another, to harden, to encourage the minds of the more virtuous against all difficulties, all dangers?"

Eliot, after remarking on Plato's noble commentary of the inscription on the Delphic oracle, γνῶθι σεαυτὸν, farther, urges this consideration: "It is required of man that he should profit many. It is a common duty of mankind, as far as ability may extend, still to do good to all, or, if not that, to some, as opportunity shall be granted him. Or, if he fail in that, yet to his neighbours, or at least unto himself. But here, in this act of passion and wrestling with calamities, there is advantage given for all. In this contestation of those things we call miseries there is a performance of all these. First, to thyself, thou profitest through the favor of the gods, that give thee this instruction, this education, this trial, this knowledge of thyself, this confirmation of thy virtue. Then to thy neighbours, and all others, thou art profitable by thy precedent and example. Thy fortitude adds courage unto them, stout and valiant. How then—how, in this excellence of duty, in this great duty of advantage—of advantage to ourselves, of advantage to our neighbours, of advantage unto all—we should repine and sorrow, as 'tis a prejudice to our happiness, it's a wonder unto reason?" With much beauty Eliot afterward disposes of the last and best plea that would seem to remain for sorrow—a friend at the grave of his friend. "Let me first ask this question of the sorrower: For whose sake that passion is assumed? for his that is so lost, or for thine own that lost him? Answer to this, and make a justification for thyself. If thou wilt say for his, where is the evil that he suffers? Wherein lies the reason of that grief? Design it out; give it some character to express it. Is it in that he is dead? in that he has made a transition to the elders? That cannot be: for death contains no evil, as our former proofs have manifested; but is a privilege of immortality, an eternity of happiness. Is it for that he is not? that he is not numbered with the living? That were to lament but because he is not miserable. Thou canst not but acknowledge the distraction of thy fears, the anxiety of thy cares, the complexion of thy pleasures, the mixture of thy sorrows! With all these, and upon all, no rest, no quiet, no tranquillity, but a continual vexation of thy thoughts, a servile agitation of thy mind from one passion to another! And wilt thou grieve for him that has his freedom, his immunity from these? On the other side: is that sorrow for thyself, that thou hast lost a friend—the sweetness, the benefit of his friendship—thy comfort in society—the assistance of thy business—the sublevation of thy cares—the extenuation of thy griefs—the multiplication of thy joys—thy castle—thy counsel—thy sword—thy shield—thy store—thy health—thy eye—thy ear—thy taste—thy touch—thy smell—the CATHOLICON of thy happiness (for all these are attributes of friendship)? consider, first, whether friendship may not change, whether a breach and enmity may not follow it, as not seldom happens in the most strict conjunctions, with which then no enmity may compare? Then 'twere better thou to have lost it, that evil being prevented, and the obligation, the virtue kept entire! But if that doubt prevails not; if thou supposest a perpetuity in that friendship, an assurance of that love; is it not envy in thee, and unworthiness thereof, for these respects, those temporary benefits to thyself, to grudge at his happiness and felicity, which is infinite and celestial? Justice may resolve how far this is from friendship, how unworthy of that name! This sorrowing, Eliot afterward observes, is variously applied. "Marcellus wept when he had taken Syracuse; Alexander, to have no more worlds to conquer." Concluding with the phrase of the ethics, that to conquer what might be fancied real calamities "not only makes a man a conqueror, and wise, but equal, nay, superior to the gods," Eliot, in a passage of great eloquence, banishes sorrow from his government.

Having thus disposed of the impediments to the monarchy of man—of the obstructing passions—Eliot now turns to the elevation of the monarchy itself, to the virtues by whose exercise and operation, condensed into two great purposes, the structure is to be raised. "Our next care must be how to obtain the virtue, how to possess the means which must procure that end; and if that can be acquired, then is our felicity complete, then we have that perfection of our government, the summum bonum in philosophy, the bonum publicum in our policy, the true end and object of the monarchy of man. Two parts it has—action and contemplation; of which the first divides itself into two branches, as the virtue agendo and dicendo, doing and saying, both which concur to action. By doing, is intended those travels and motions of the body that are necessary in the performance of those works which the duty and office of our callings require; by saying, is meant that expression of the tongue whereby the intelligence of the heart is made communicable to others, and the thoughts are conveyed to the understanding of the hearers. In these two all action does consist, and so that part of the virtue and perfection. Both these have a rule, and level, and direction, which we did touch before, as the common duty of mankind. In that duty their office is implied, which is that it be profitable to many. In the general good and benefit it must be extended, first to all, then, after, to ourselves." Here Eliot interposes in a parenthesis this valuable reminder: "For all right of office is destroyed by the inversion of this order. To reflect first upon ourselves, our own particular interests, and then upon the general, is the contrary of duty, the breach of office and relation. Therefore to the public both our words and actions must first move, without respect, without retraction for our private. They must first intend the common good and benefit, and so descend by degrees unto ourselves. For as members are in bodies for the perfection of the man, so men in bodies politike, as parts of these societies, and for the conservation of the whole, and to that end their chief endeavour must incline." Eliot then, with a noble fervour, inculcating the practice of his own life, thus resumes: "Here some questions will arise; how far this shall engage us? what latitude it imports? what cautions and exceptions it admits? Difficulties may occur, and then involve us in anxieties, with troubles and perplexities disturbing our tranquillities, distracting the quietness we are in. And shall we forsake that sweetness? shall we neglect that fatness of our peace (as the fig and olive said of old) for the public use and service? for the profit and commodity of others? Yes! no difficulties may retard us, no troubles may divert us, no exception is admitted to this rule! but where the greater good is extant, the duty and office there is absolute, without caution or respect. That greater good appearing, nothing may dissuade us from the work—no respect of ease, no respect of pleasure, no respect of the troubles we may meet; but in performance of that duty, in accomplishment of that office, our troubles must seem pleasant, our labours must seem facile, all things easy, all things sweet therein; for the rule is, Officium non fructum sequi, to observe the duty, not the benefit, to seek that end which is propounded in the general, not to propound an end and reason of our own. But danger may be incident! it may betray our safeties, and expose our fortunes, expose our liberties, expose our lives to hazard! and shall we, then, adventure upon these? shall we forsake our safeties? shall we incur those dangers, for foreign interests and respects, for that which concerns but others, which is foreign unto us? Yes, this likewise we are bound to; our obligation lies in this. No danger, no hazard may deter us. The duty and office stand entire."

In this first division of material for Eliot's grand structure the reader will recognise the old principle of the ancients, in their separation of the characteristics of wisdom. The one, which we have just seen described, comprehending the beginning and end of all things to be done, φρόνεις, prudentia; the other, which Eliot is now about to subjoin, compassing the manner and ways conducing to those ends, σοφία, sapientia. "The rest," he says, describing the latter, "all follow this, and are but servants to this mistress, several operations of this faculty having their appellations from their works. If we would ask what fancy does intend, what is the signification of that name, the answer is, 'This wisdom, the divine spirit of the mind, that hunts out all intelligence. If we may inquire what memory does import, the same answer serves, 'This wisdom, the influence of that faculty. For where the fancy cannot keep all things upon intention, memory is suggested for supply of that defect, and so makes up the wisdom. If we would know what judgment does imply, the resolution is the same. 'Tis but an act of wisdom, the operation of that power. Therefore in this consists the perfection of all theory, the sum of all contemplation, and so that other part of virtue.' Very beautiful is the passage that follows: "But how may this wisdom, then, be had? Where may we seek and find it? The answer is most obvious: In the doctrines of philosophy; for philosophy is the introduction to this wisdom; so both the word and reason do import; for by the word is signified only a love of wisdom, a love of that wisdom which we speak of; and that love will be accompanied with an endeavour to attain it, which is intended in the common sense and notion. For that science of philosophy is but a guest of wisdom, the study of that excellence: and so Plato gives it in his gradations unto happiness. Philosophy is the first step he makes as the desire of wisdom; to which he adds the study and contemplation to attain it. From that study and speculation he arises unto wisdom, from that wisdom unto happiness. So that philosophy is the principle. Wisdom does there begin, which has its end in happiness, and happiness in this order is the production of philosophy. In sum, all contemplation is but this, but this study of philosophy. If it ascend the heavens to view the glory of that beauty, philosophy does direct it. If it descend to measure the centre of the earth, philosophy goes with it. If it examine nature and her secrets, philosophy must assist it. If it reflect on causes or effects, that turn is by philosophy. The contemplation of all ends, all beginnings, all successes, is propounded by philosophy. So that philosophy, in contemplation, is as prudence in the virtues, the architect and chief workman, that gives motion and direction to the rest. Great is the excellence of philosophy, as it is chief in contemplation, and the accompaniment of that virtue. Greater much it is, as it is a principle to wisdom, and an instructor to the counsellor. But beyond all comparison it is greatest, as it is the first degree to happiness, as it leads on to that perfection of our government! No words can sufficiently express it, nor render a true figure of that worth. Being in contemplation, contemplation only must conceive it!"

The question then occurs: Which of these great divisions of the virtues is to be considered the highest and most perfect? And Eliot answers it. As an exercise of the faculties, in pure and single grandeur, he pronounces at once in favour of philosophy, of contemplation; but is careful to modify this immediately after, by pronouncing no wisdom complete without the active practices of virtue. Speaking on the first head, he urges the superior greatness of the contemplative philosopher, in regard that his thoughts are fixed on the final intelligence: "Yet And he that levels at that mark, though he come short, yet shoots higher than he that aims but at man. Besides, there is this advantage in it, that nothing can be contracted from the president to prejudice or corrupt it, which lower examples may induce; but much perfection may be added by the elevation of the mind. As chemicks in the disquisition of the elixir, though the wonder be not found, yet have extracted great varieties by that labour, excellent demonstrations by that work. It is the way in part to resume the image we have lost, for that was not an outward figure, but a resemblance in virtue. If that similitude was laid in virtue, it cannot so aptly be repaired as by the imitation of the Deity, in whom the exactness of all virtue does remain. This help philosophy does give us in the speculation of eternity; and likewise it derives to our present view and prospect the knowledge of all antiquity, in what their happiness consisted, what were the ingredients of that compound, and how it was lost at first, whence the judgment may resolve what is true happiness to us." On the second head, however, Eliot immediately subjoins: "But if so, if philosophy and contemplation have this fruit, that these degrees of happiness be in them, and so direct a way to happiness itself, how is it that we involve us in such toils, such anxieties and perplexities, to acquire it? It is a vanity and folly by such hard labour to effect, when a less trouble, a less travail comes so near! If philosophy and contemplation can procure it, those sweet and gentle motions of the soul, what need the co-operations of the body, those actions and those passions, which virtue does require, and which so often force distraction, nay, destruction upon men? Yet they are needful, for without virtue true happiness cannot be, and these compose the other half of virtue. For contemplation and action make the whole. Virtue consists only in both, and in part there is no perfection. Therefore to contemplation action also must be joined, to make a complete virtue, and by that virtue only true happiness may be had." And, careful not to be misunderstood in what he had said before of the supremacy of contemplation, he adds (with an intimation that he will discuss the matter more fully in a future treatise—a project stopped by death!) that contemplation must be considered the chief, for "contemplation is the beginning of all action, the principle of that motion: action but a derivative of that, and no derivation can be equal to the primitive, no second comparable with the first. All actions are but the emanation of the will, and the will receives her instance from the apprehension of the mind. But still," he adds, "both must be concurrent. Virtue is a composition of them both. Contemplation must prepare the matter of our happiness, action dispose and order it."

Eliot's great purpose now accomplished, he closes his labours with an exalted eulogy on the independence and superiority of the mind. I present it to the reader entire. It is worthy to have closed a work of such nobility in conception and power in execution.

"This makes up that perfection of our monarchy—that happiness of the mind which, being founded upon these grounds, built upon these foundations, no power or greatness can impeach. Such is the state and majesty, that nothing can approach it but by the admission of these servants; such is the safety and security, that nothing can violate or touch it but by these instruments and organs; such is the power and dignity, that all things must obey it. All things are subject to the mind, which, in this temper, is the commander of them all. No resistance is against it. It breaks through the orbes and immense circles of the heavens, and penetrates down to the centre of the earth! It opens the fountains of antiquity, and runs down the streams of time, below the period of all seasons! It dives into the dark counsels of eternity and into the abstruse secrets of nature! It unlocks all places, and all occasions are alike obvious to it! It does observe those subtil passages in the air, and the unknown paths and traces in the deeps! There is that great power of operation in the mind, that quickness and velocity of motion, that in an instant it does pass from extremity to extremity, from the lowest to the highest, from the extremest point of the west to the horizon and ascendant in the east. It measures in one thought the whole circumference of heaven, and by the same line it takes the geography of the earth. The air, the fire, all things of either, are within the comprehension of the mind.

It has an influence on them all, whence it takes all that may be useful, and that may be helpful in its government. No limitation is prescribed it, no restriction is upon it, but in a free scope it has liberty upon all. And in this liberty is the excellence of the mind; in this power and composition of the mind is the perfection of the man; in that perfection is the happiness we look for; when in all sovereignty it reigns, commanding, not commanded; when at home, the subjects are subject and obedient, not refractory and factious; when abroad, they are as servants, serviceable and in readiness, without hesitation or reluctance; when to the resolutions of the counsell, to the digests of the laws, the actions and affections are inclined—this is that summum bonum, and chief good, which in this state and condition is obtain'd! The mind for this has that transcendence given it, that man, though otherwise the weakest, might be the strongest and most excellent of all creatures. In that only is the excellence we have, and thereby are we made superior to the rest. For in the habits of the body, in all the faculties thereof, man is not comparable to others, in sense and motion far inferior to many. The ancients suppose it the indiscretion of Epimetheus, having the first distribution of the qualities, to leave us so defective, when to the rest he gave an excellence in their kinds. As swiftness and agility to some, strength and fortitude to others; and whom he found weakest, these he made most nimble, as in the fowls and others it is seen; and whom he found most slow, to these he gave most strength, as bulls and elephants do express it; and so all others in their kinds have some singularity and excellence, wherein there is a compensation for all wants; some being armed offensively and defensive, and in that having a provisional security. But man only he left naked, more unfurnished than the rest; in him there was neither strength nor agility to preserve him from the danger of his enemies—multitudes exceeding him in either, many in both—to whom he stood obnoxious and exposed, having no resistance, no avoidance for their furies! But in this case and necessity, to relieve him upon this oversight and improvidence of Epimetheus, Prometheus, that wise statesman, whom Pandora could not cozen, having the present apprehension of the danger by his quick judgment and intelligence, secretly passes into heaven, steals out a fire from thence, infuses it into man, by that inflames his mind with a divine spirit and wisdom, and therein gives him a full supply for all! For all the excellence of the creatures he had a far more excellence in this. This one was for them all. No strength nor agility could match it. All motions and abilities came short of this perfection. The most choice arms of nature have their superlative in its arts. All the arts of Vulcan and Minerva have their comparative herein. In this divine fire and spirit, this supernatural influence of the mind, all excellence organical is surpast; it is the transcendent of them all; nothing can come to match it; nothing can impeach it; but man therein is an absolute master of himself; his own safety and tranquillity by God (for so we must remember the ethicks did express it) are made dependant on himself. And in that self-dependance, in the neglect of others, in the entire rule and dominion of himself, the affections being composed, the actions so directed, is the perfection of our government, that summum bonum in philosophy, the bonum publicum in our policy, the true end and object of this MONARCHY OF MAN."

THOMAS WENTWORTH, EARL OF STRAFFORD.—1593–1641.

THOMAS WENTWORTH was born on the 13th of April, 1593, in Chancery Lane, at the house of his mother's father, Mr. Robert Atkinson, a bencher of Lincoln's Inn.* He was the eldest of twelve children, and the heir of "an estate which descended to him through a long train of ancestors, who had matched with many heiresses of the best families in the North, worth at that time 6000*l.* a year."† His father, Sir William Wentworth, continued to hold a manor which his ancestors had held from the time of the Conquest downward.‡

The youth of Wentworth was passed, and his mind received its earliest and strongest impressions in the midst of the aristocratic influences. And he was by no means taught to disregard them. He must have considered the various ramifications of the family pedigree with a very early pride and zeal, to have been so well prepared, on his sudden elevation to the peerage, with the formidable list of progenitors that were cited in his patent. It was there set forth, among other grand and notable things, that he was lineally descended from John of Gaunt, and from the ancient barons of Newmark, Oversley, and so forth; and that his ancestors, either by father or mother, had matched with divers houses of honour; as with Maud, countess of Cambridge, daughter to the Lord Clifford of Westmoreland; with Margaret, daughter and heir to the Lord Philip de Spencer; the lords D'Arcy of the North; Latimer, Talboys, Ogle; Ferrers, earl of Digby; Quincy, earl of Winchester; Beaumont, earl of Leicester; Grantmesnil, baron of Hincley and lord-high-steward of England; Peveril, earl of Nottingham; Leofric, earl of Mercia; and Margaret, duchess of Somerset, grandmother of Henry VII.§ It was from the high conventional ground of such proud recollections that Thomas Wentworth looked forward to the future.

Little account of his early education has been preserved, but he afterward proved that no accomplishment suited to rank and lofty expectations had been omitted; and it is characteristic of the encouragement given by his father to his aristocratic tendencies, that the college selected for the completion of his studies should have been that which was founded by the illustrious grandmother of Henry VII., whom he claimed as one of his ancestors. He was sent to St. John's College, Cambridge.¶ Here he soon gave evidence of the powers of a fine intellect, and of that not ungenerous warmth of disposition which is lavish of gratitude and favour in return for personal service. He met with a tutor, Mr. Greenwood, whose useful attentions to him at this time were secured for the future by a prompt appreciation of their value; he availed himself of them through his after life, and never at any time failed faithfully, and even affectionately, to remember and reward them.* I may add, in farther proof of this characteristic quality, that we find him shortly after profiting by the active service of a person named Radcliffe,† connected with his family by some claims of clan-ship, and that, from this time, Radcliffe never left his side. He had been found useful.

Wentworth left his college while yet very young; he cannot have been more than eighteen. But he had received benefits from his residence there, and he did not fail to exhibit his recollection of these also, when the power and opportunity arose.‡ Not that it required, in this particular case, the circumstance of service rendered to elicit Wentworth's return. The memory of his proudly-recollected ancestress was abundantly sufficient to have called it forth, "being," as he himself, shortly after this, writes to one of his country neighbours, "I must confess, in my own nature, a great lover and conservor of hereditary good-wills, such as have been amongst our nearest friends."§ When a hereditary good-will happened to be associated with one of his greatest ancestral glories, it ran little chance of being lessened or lost.

The next circumstance I trace in the scanty memorials of this portion of his history is his acquisition of the honour of knighthood.¶ This title was then to be purchased at a reasonable rate of money; doubtless Wentworth so purchased it; and the fact may be taken, along with the evidences I have already named, in farther corroboration of the development of the aristocratic principle. Though still extremely young, this remarkable person had been left to all the independence of mature manhood; was treated with deference by his father; and even now, having not yet passed his eighteenth year,

* I shall have other occasions to allude to this. It may be worth while to add, that Greenwood was himself a man of ancient family, and not likely, on that account, to prove less suitable to Wentworth. See Biog. Brit., vol. vii., p. 4173, note C.

† Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 125, 189; ii., p. 390. I may allude to this again. On his promotion to the earldom, two years before his death, he acknowledged, in warm phrase, the congratulations of the provost and fellows of his old college: "After my very hearty commendations, so mindful I am of the ancient favours I received in that society of St. John's whilst I was a student there, and so sensible of your present civility towards me, as I may not upon this invitation pass by either of them unacknowledged. And therefore do hereby very heartily thank you for renewing to me the sense of the one, and affording me the favour of the other. And in both these regards shall be very apprehensive of any occasions, wherein I may do any good offices either towards that house or yourselves, the provost and fellows thereof."

‡ Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 25.

§ The writer in the Biog. Brit., and Mr. MacDiarmid, assign a later period to this, but without authority. Radcliffe distinctly, in his Essay, names the year 1611; and there is extant a letter of Sir Peter Frecheville's to Wentworth's father, Sir William Wentworth, dated in this year, which commences thus: "I do unfeignedly congratulate the honourable fortunes of my cousin, your eldest son;" in reference, as must be supposed, to the youth's new title. While on this subject I may add, that Mr. MacDiarmid has also fallen into error in attributing certain praises (vol. i., p. 1, of the Strafford Papers) to Thomas Wentworth; they distinctly relate to his brother William, then educating for the bar.

* Radcliffe's "Essay towards the Life of my Lord Strafford," published as an appendix to "The EARL OF STRAFFORD'S LETTERS AND DISPATCHES," 2 vols. folio, Dublin edit., 1740, vol. ii., p. 429. Biographia Britannica, vol. vii., p. 4173.

† Knowler's Dedication to the Letters.

‡ An account of the Wentworths will be found in Collins; and see Thoresby's Ducatus Leodiensis.

§ Collins's Peerage of England, vol. ii., p. 20, 21.

¶ Radcliffe's Essay.

aspired to the hand of Frances, eldest daughter of the Earl of Cumberland, whom he married before the close of 1611.* If it has seemed strange to the reader that the immediate successor to an ancient patrimony should have sought to feed his love of rank by the purchase of a paltry knighthood, here is the probable reason that influenced him. A title of any sort matched him more fittingly with a lady of title. Immediately after his marriage, in November, 1611, he went into France.† Mr. Greenwood, his former tutor, joined him there, and remained with him.‡

Strange events at that moment shook the kingdom of France. Henry IV. assassinated, the Parliament invaded and beset; Marie de' Medicis regent, Sully disgraced, Concini in favour! These things sunk deep into the mind of Wentworth. "Il put faire dès lors," exclaims the Comte de Lally-Tolendal, "de profondes réflexions sur les horreurs du fanatisme, sur les abus du pouvoir, sur le malheur d'un pays dépourvu de ces loix fixés, qui, dans l'impossibilité d'annéantir les passions humaines, les balancent du moins l'une par l'autre, et les forcent par leur propre intérêt à servir, même en dépit d'elles, l'intérêt général."§ Without adopting M. de Lally-Tolendal's exact construction, it is certain that the events I have named, occurring as it were in the immediate presence of Wentworth,|| were not calculated to weaken his impressions in favour of strict establishment, and in scorn of popular regards. The image of a Ravillac, indeed, haunted his after life!¶

Meanwhile events, in themselves not so startling and painful as these, but not the less ominous of a stormy future, were occurring in England. In the biography of Eliot I confined myself strictly to an explanation of the circumstances of general history under which he entered his first Parliament: I must now retrace my steps.

James I. had many reasons to be weary of his own kingdom, when the death of Elizabeth seated him on the English throne. He came to this country in an ecstasy of infinite relief. Visions of levelling clergy and factious nobles had vanished from his aching sight. In hopeful conceit, he turned to his Scotch followers, and remarked, they had at last arrived in the land of promise.

His first interviews with his English counsellors were no less satisfactory. "Do I mak the judges! do I mak the bishops?" he exclaimed, as they pointed out to his delighted attention the powers of his new dominion—"then, Godis wauns! I mak what likes me law and Gospel." There is enough of shrewdness in this remark to express James's character in that respect. He was not an absolute fool, and little more can be said of him. It is a pity he was not, since he was deficient in much wisdom. It is the little redeeming leaven which proves troublesome and mischievous; the very wise or the very foolish do little harm. His "learning," such as it was—though not open to the serious censure which is provoked by his preposterous vanity in the matter of "kingcraft," his disgraceful love of personal ease, and his indecent and shameless fondness for personal favourites—never furnished him with one useful thought, or a suggestion of practical benefit.* He wrote mystical definitions of the prerogative, and polite "Counterblasts to Tobacco;" issued forth damnation to the deniers of witchcraft,† and poured out the wraths of the Apocalypse upon popery; but whenever an obvious or judicious truth seemed likely to fall in his way, his pen infallibly waddled off from it. He expounded the Latin of the fathers at Hampton Court,‡ but avoided the very plain and intelligible Latin of Fortescue.

Not so the great men, his opponents, who were now preparing for a constitutional struggle, of which Europe had as yet given no example. At the close of Elizabeth's reign they had risen to a formidable party; they had wrung

* Bacon's opinion has been urged against this, as evidence of genuine praise or of the basest sycophancy. He dedicated his greatest work, the "Advancement of Learning," to James. It is worth while, however, to quote the exact words of this dedication. They are very curious. If they were meant seriously, never was so much flattery ingeniously mixed up with so much truth. They savour much more of irony. "I am well assured," writes Bacon, "that this which I shall say is no amplification at all, but a positive and measured truth; which is, that there hath not been, since Christ's time, any king or temporal monarch, of which Caesar the dictator, who lived some years before Christ, and Marcus Antoninus, were the best learned; and so descend to the emperors of Græcia, or of the West, and then to the lines of France, Spain, England, Scotland, and the rest; and he shall find his judgment is truly made. For it seemeth much in a king, if by the compendious extractions of other men's wits and labour, he can take hold of any superficial ornaments and shewes of learning, or if he countenance and prefer learning and learned men: but to drink indeed of the true fountain of learning, nay, to have such a fountain of learning in himself, in a king, and in a king born, is almost a miracle." This makes out too formidable an exception to be quite complimentary, and perhaps James's irreverent joke about the book itself was not unconnected with its dedication. "It is like the peace of God," he said, "it passeth all understanding!" It was a fair retort upon the sycophancy of James's more profligate flatterers, when Henry IV. of France admitted that he might be "Solomon, the son of David."

† See the preface to his "Dæmonologie."

‡ An extraordinary account of the indecent conduct of James at this conference is given by Harrington, an eyewitness (Nugæ Antiquæ, vol. i., p. 181), and is worth referring to. Barlow, a partial observer of the king and bishops, gives a long account of the discussion in his Phoenix Britannicus, p. 140, et seq., edit. 1707. See, also, Winwood's Memorials, p. 13. James and his eighteen abject bishops boasted that they had thoroughly beaten their four Puritan adversaries; and beat them, it must be confessed, they did, with the rudest and most atrocious insults; certainly not with learning. In the latter respect, Dr. Reynolds, the Puritan leader, had the advantage of perhaps any other man in England. See Hallam's Const. Hist., vol. i., p. 405.

* Radcliffe's Essay.

† He married Margaret, eldest daughter of Francis Clifford, fourth Earl of Cumberland: for which statement, see Strafford's life in Jesse's Court of Stuarts.—C.]

‡ Radcliffe's Essay.

§ This is the only remark with any pretension to originality I have been able to find through the course of a long "Essai sur la Vie de T. Wentworth, Comte de Strafford," which the Comte de Lally-Tolendal (penetrated with profound disgust at the patriotic party in England, and with the striking resemblance between Strafford's fate and that of his own unfortunate father) undertook to write for the instruction of his countrymen. He perpetrated a very ridiculous tragedy on the same subject.

|| He does not appear to have visited France only at this period, as has been supposed. He went on to Venice, where he formed a friendship with Sir Henry Wotton. We find him afterward, in his correspondence, contrasting to his friend the ambassador, "these cold and sluggish climates," with "the more sublimated air of Italy."—Papers, vol. i., p. 5. Wotton continued his ardent friend and admirer.

¶ His letters afford very frequent evidence of this.

concessions even from her splendid despotism, and won for themselves the courteous title of "mutineers."* They soon found that they had little to fear from her successor. He had no personal claims on their respect,† no dignity to fence in royalty. They buckled on the armour of their privileges, and awaited his ludicrous attacks, without respect and without fear.‡

James soon commenced them, and with a hand doubly defenceless. He had impoverished his crown by conferring its estates on his needy followers; he had deprived it of the sympathy and support of the wealthier barons, in disgusting them with his indiscriminate peerage creations.§ From this feeble hand, and a head stuffed with notions of his royal "divinity," he issued the first of his proclamations for the assembling of Parliament. It contained a deadly attack on the privileges of the House of Commons, in an attempt to regulate the Parliamentary elections. This was resented and defeated, and so the fight began.||

* Sloane MSS., 4166. Letter of Sir E. Hoby to Sir T. Edmonds, dated Feb. 12, 1605. See, also, Hallam's Constitutional Hist., vol. i., p. 401. A curious tract in the Sloane MSS., 827, confirms the loss of Elizabeth's popularity, and states its cause, in a short history of the queen's death, and the new king's accession. See, too, the proceedings in the case of Peter Wentworth (a Cornish Wentworth), Parl. Hist., vol. iv., p. 186, et seq. The name of Wentworth fills up more than one illustrious era of the English history.

† The news of the progress of his journey, from Scotland had travelled before him! "By the time he reached London," says Carte, a friend of the Stuarts, "the admiration of the intelligent world was turned into contempt." The reader will find good reason for this in Harrington's Nugæ Antiquæ, vol. i., p. 180; Wilson, in Kennet, vol. ii., p. 667; Neal, p. 408, quarto edit.; Fuller, part ii., p. 22; Hallam, vol. i., p. 402, 403. Nor is it likely that this contempt should have been diminished by his personal aspect, which Weldon (quoting Balfour) has described, and Sanderson (in his Aulicus Coquinarius—an answer to Weldon's book) has not dared to contradict. "He was of a middle stature," says Balfour, "more corpulent than his clothes then in his body, yet fat enough; his clothes ever being made large and easie, the doublets quilted for steeletoe prooff; his breeches in grate pleits and full stuffed; he was naturally of a timorous disposition, which was the greatest reason of his quilted doublets; his eye large, ever rolling after any stranger came in his presence; insomuch as maney for shame have left the roome, as being out of countenance; his beard was wery thin; his toung too large for his mouthe, vich ever made him speake full in the mouthe, and made him drinke wery uncomelie, as if eating his drinke, wich cam out into the cupe in each syde of his mouthe; his skin vas as softe as tafta sarsnet, wich felt so because he neuer washt his hands, unlie rubbed his fingers' ends slightly with the vett end of a napkin. His legs wery wenke; having had, as was thought, some foule play in his youthe, or rather, befor he was borne; that he was not able to stand at sevin zeires of age; that weaknes made him ever learing on other men's shoulders." "His walk," subjoins Wilson, "was ever circular." The satirical Francis Osborne has certainly completed this picture: "I shall leave him dressed for posterity," says that writer, "in the color I saw him in, the next progress after his inauguration; which was as green as the grass he trod on; with a feather in his cap, and a horn, instead of a sword, by his side. How suitable to his age, calling, or person, I leave others to judge from his pictures."—Trad. Mem., c. xvii.

‡ An ominous hint of relative advantage may be quoted from the Journals, vol. i., p. 156. "That a people may be without a king, a king cannot be without a people."

§ See Bolingbroke on the History of England, p. 237, 238. Harris's Life of James, p. 69, 71. "A pasquill," says Wilson, "was pasted up at St. Paul's, wherein was pretended an art to help weak memories to a competent knowledge of the names of the nobility."—P. 7.

|| See Commons' Journals, p. 147, et seq., 166; Carte, vol. iii., p. 730; Winwood's Memorials, vol. ii., p. 18; Bolingbroke's Remarks, p. 250. Hume observes that "the facility with which he departed from this pretension is a proof that his meaning was innocent" (vol. v., p. 12). Fear, his saving characteristic, is the more obvious solution.

H

The popular party proclaimed their intentions at once with boldness, and in explicit language. They warned the king of his imprudence; they spoke of the dissolute and abandoned character of his court expenses. They did not refuse to assist his wants, but they maintained that every offer of money on their part should be met with corresponding offers of concession on the part of the crown. They brought forward a catalogue of grievances in the practice of the ecclesiastical courts, in the administration of civil justice, and in the conduct of the various departments of the government. For these they demanded redress.* Artifice and intrigue were the first answers they received, and a prerogation the last.

James had now sufficient warning, but, nevertheless, plunged blusteringly forward. With no clear hereditary right to the crown,† he flouted his only safe pretension—the consent and authority of the people. With no personal qualities to command respect, he proclaimed himself a "lieutenant and vicegerent of God," and, as such, adorned and furnished with "sparkles of divinity." In total ignorance of the nature and powers of government, nothing could shake his vain conceit of the awe to be inspired by his regal wisdom. The Commons, however, left no point of their claims unasserted or uncertain; they reserved no "arcana imperii," after the king's fashion. They drew up in committee a "Satisfaction" of their proceedings for the perusal of James, who makes an evident allusion to it in a letter of the time.‡ It is vain to say, after reading such documents as this, that liberty, a discrimination of the powers and objects of government, was then only struggling to the light, or had achieved no distinct form and pretension. It was already deep in the hearts and in the understandings of men. "What cause," they eloquently said, "we, your poor Commons, have to watch over their privileges is evident in itself to all men. The prerogatives of princes may easily, and do daily, grow. The privileges of the subject are, for the most part, at an everlasting stand. They may be, by good providence and care, preserved; but being once lost, are not recovered but with much disquiet."

* They tried to get the Upper House to join them in these complaints, but vainly. Their lordships refused. See Somers's Tracts, vol. ii., p. 14; Commons' Journals, p. 199, 235, 238. For the principal grievances, see Journals, p. 190, 215, 251, &c.; Hallam's Const. Hist., vol. i., p. 412, 415; and Lingard's History, vol. vi., p. 23, 27, 88-93, quarto edit.

† Mr. Hallam has admirably and fully discussed this point, Const. Hist., p. 392-400. I have no doubt the king was able to feel his want of clear pretensions acutely; but his blundering shrewdness taught him no better mode of concealing it than by magnifying the inherent rights of primogeniture succession, as something indefeasible by the Legislature. We find him frequently, with much testiness, reminding the Commons, "you all know, I came from the loins of your ancient kings;" a sure proof that he feared they did not know it. See Parl. Hist., vol. v., p. 192.

‡ This remarkable paper will be found at length in Petyt's Jus Parliamenti, ch. x., p. 227; and is extracted into Mr. Hatsell's first vol. of Precedents, Appendix, No. 1. Hatsell states that it was not entered on the Journals. This is partly a mistake, for at p. 243 the first paragraph will be found. Rapin alludes to it; and Mr. Hallam has made very spirited use of it (vol. i., p. 418), though he seems to labour under misapprehension in stating that Hume was ignorant of its existence. Hume, on the contrary, makes special allusion to it (vol. v., p. 15); quotes a passage from it; speaks of it as drawn up "with great force of reasoning and spirit of liberty;" attributes it to Bacon and Sandys; and inclines to think that it had not been presented to the monarch by the House. The last supposition is certainly incorrect; and Mr. Hallam produces a letter which appears to indicate the feelings with which the king regarded it (vol. i., p. 419). About this time, it may be added, mention is made in the Journals that fresh seats were required for the extraordinary attendance of members.—P. 141.

Another session succeeded, and the same scenes were again enacted, with the same results. In vain were monopolies cried down, and the merchants lifted their voices unavailingly against the inglorious peace with Spain. After this prorogation, James's obstinacy held out for upward of two years, when want of money overcame it.

The session of 1610 was a most distinguished one, and called the unjust prerogative to a rigorous reckoning. James had most illegally, in the face of two great charters, and twelve other Parliamentary enactments, imposed certain duties on imports and exports. Bates, a Turkey merchant, refused payment of one on currants, and carried his case into the exchequer.* The judges there refused him justice, in terms more disgraceful and subversive of liberty than even the iniquitous decision. Against this, and in no measured terms, the Commons now protested. Lawyers, more learned than the judges, exposed, in masterly reasoning, the ignorance and corruption of Barons Fleming and Clark. Sir Francis Bacon appealed with all his eloquence to the reverence of past ages, and the possession of the present; but Hakewill proved,† in an argument of memorable clearness and vast knowledge, that the only instances adduced were on forbidden articles, and therefore false as precedents; and Bacon appealed in vain. Still more vain was the rage of the monarch, who hastened to the House to lay his arrogant commands upon them. He told them, after a comparison savouring of blasphemy, that it "was seditious in subjects to dispute what a king may do in the height of his power."‡ They answered in a remonstrance of great strength and spirit, and of much learning.§ After producing a host of precedents, they passed a bill against impositions; but, to use Hume's phrase, "the House of Lords, as is usual, defended the barriers of the throne," and threw out the bill.||

* A very learned preface to the report of the case of Bates in the State Trials, comprising the entire argument on the question, has been written by Mr. Hargrave. Coke, in his 2d Inst., p. 57, proves the illegality of the decision; though, in his Reports (p. 12), he had inclined to its favour, on other grounds than those stated by the judges. See, also, Birch's Negotiations, and an eloquent and very learned note on the subject of impositions, in Mr. Amos's Fortescue, p. 28-31, 142, 143. I cannot leave the latter work without adding that, various and extensive as is the learning displayed in it, it is for those only to appreciate Mr. Amos's profound acquaintance with constitutional law and history who, like myself, have to acknowledge, with the deepest gratitude, information personally communicated.

† See his speech. State Trials, vol. ii., p. 407. Mr. Hallam's statement of the discussion is interesting, vol. i., p. 423-438.

‡ It is worth referring to this speech, as given in King James's Works, p. 529-531. The discontent it provoked will be found by referring to Winwood's Memorials, vol. iii., p. 175; Commons' Journals, p. 430; and Miss Aikin's James, vol. i., p. 350.

§ It will be found at length in Somers's Tracts, vol. ii., p. 159.

|| Hume, referring to this measure, observes: "A spirit of liberty had now taken possession of the House. The leading members, being men of independent genius and large views, began to regulate their opinions more by the future

I may allude a little farther to the proceedings of this distinguished session, since they illustrate forcibly the exact relative positions of the crown and Parliament at the period of Wentworth's return.

Unwearied in exertion, the House of Commons now fastened on a work that had been published by Dr. Cowell, one of the party of civilians encouraged against the Common lawyers, and which contained most monstrous doctrines on the subject of kingly power.* They compelled James to suppress the book. The wily Cecil had striven to effect a compromise with them, by the proposition of a large yearly revenue to the crown, in return for which he promised that the liberality of the sovereign in the matter of grievances should be commensurate. He had entreated, however, without success, that the subsidies should have priority: the Commons were resolute in enforcing the condition before yielding the grant. The fate of their impositions' bill had instructed them. Cecil now pressed again for the subsidies; they persisted in the farther entertainment of grievances. They complained of the ecclesiastical high commission court, and its disregard of the common law; they protested against the recent system of substituting proclamations for laws; they sought redress for the delays of the courts in granting writs of prohibition and hæbeas corpus; they questioned the right of the council of Wales to exclude from the privileges of the common law four ancient English counties; they remonstrated against patents of monopolies, and a late most unjust tax upon victuallers; but, above all, they strove to exonerate the country from the feudal burdens.† They did not dispute that these in right belonged to the crown, but they negotiated for their abolition; for they never then insisted on a right, except with proofs and precedents in their hands for claiming it as such. In that particular stage of the contest, the necessity and justice of such caution is apparent, and forms an important feature of their struggles.

The negotiation now commenced. James did not care to abolish purveyance,‡ which was sought for; but with that was coupled a demand for the exchange of every other kind of tenure into that of free and common socage.§ "What!" said James, "reduce all my subjects, noble and base, rich and poor, to hold their lands in the same ignoble manner?" The indignant "father of his people" would not listen to it, and, after some delay, a compromise was struck. The tenure by knight service was retained; but its most lucrative and oppressive incidents, such as relief, premier seisin, and wardship, were surrendered, along consequences which they foresaw, than by former precedents which were laid before them; and they less aspired at maintaining the ancient constitution than at establishing a new one, and a freer, and a better" (vol. v., p. 34). However true this may be in reference to future proceedings, it is certainly incorrect as applied to the present.

* See Roger Coke's Detection, vol. i., p. 56, edit. 1694. These passages have since been suppressed, and it is now considered a useful book. See Hume's admirable note, vol. v., p. 37.

† See the Parl. Hist., vol. v., p. 225-245. Also, the Commons' Journals for 1610. Winwood, vol. iii., p. 119.

‡ An admirable note on purveyance will be found in Amos's Fortescue, p. 134, 135.

§ Parl. Hist., vol. v., p. 229, et seq.

with purveyance. Still the Commons delayed, for Cecil's demands were exorbitant. They resolved to pause some short time longer, that they might ascertain the best mode of levying so large a sum with the least distress to the nation. The session had already been protracted far into summer; a subsidy was granted for immediate wants, and a prorogation took place.

The loss of the Journals of the ensuing session renders it difficult to follow their proceedings. It is certain, however, from other sources, that the events of the interim had resolved the leaders of the House on abandoning the terms proposed. They saw no signs of greater justice at the outports, or in the proclamations, or in the ecclesiastical courts. The most important of their petitions on particular grievances had been refused, and now, when they sent one up to the throne for the allowing prisoners on a capital charge to bring witnesses in their own defence, the king protested to them that, in his conscience, he could not grant such an indulgence. "It would encourage and multiply forgery," he said: "men were already accustomed to forswear themselves even in civil actions; what less could be expected when the life of a friend was at stake!"* Such was the exquisite philosophy of James. A coolness ensued; threats followed; a prorogation was again the intermediate argument, with a dissolution within nine weeks as the final one. Those nine weeks were employed in vain in the purpose of weakening the popular party, and on the day threatened, seven years from their first assembling, the dissolution took place.†

The interval which ensued was one of profusion, debauchery, and riot in the court,‡ and of attempted oppression and wrong against the people. Fortunately, the spirit of liberty had strengthened to resistance. "The privy seals are going forth," says a contemporary writer,§ "but from a trembling hand, lest that sacred seal should be refused by the desperate hardness of the prejudiced people." It was refused; and the shameful expedient was abundantly resorted to by the court, of selling the honours of the peerage, and of creating a number of hereditary knights, who should pay tribute for their dignity.|| All would not serve, however; and Bacon, reckoning somewhat unduly on his own skill,¶ prevailed upon the king to summon another Parliament.

At this eventful moment Wentworth came

* Commons' Journals, p. 451. Lords' Journals, p. 658. Winwood, vol. iii., p. 193.

† A curious letter of the king, illustrative of the angry feelings that prevailed at the dissolution, exists in Marsden's State Papers, p. 513. See Hallam, vol. i., p. 451.

‡ Observe the account in Fulke Lord Brooke's Five Years of King James; Mrs. Hutchinson's Memoirs; Weldon, p. 166; Coke's Detection, vol. i., p. 42-49. The court presented at this moment a disgusting scene of profligacy. It requires a strong stomach even to get through a perusal of the details. Ladies rendered themselves especially notable, not merely for laxity of virtue, but for the grossest drunkenness. See Nugent's Antiquary, vol. i., p. 348.

§ In Winwood's Memorials, vol. iii.

|| An account of this proceeding will be found in Lingard's History, vol. vi., quarto edit., from Somers's Tracts. See, also, Hallam, vol. i., p. 461; Aikin, vol. i., p. 359. The project appears to have been the suggestion of Salisbury. See Baker's Chronicle, p. 416, edit. 1679; Guthrie, vol. iii., p. 704; and Macaulay's History, vol. i., p. 75.

¶ MS. in the possession of Mr. Hallam, Const. Hist., vol. i., p. 461, 462.

back to England, and was immediately returned knight of the shire for Yorkshire.* It is now my duty to follow him through the commencing passages of his public life, and I hope to do this faithfully. I have felt very strongly that the truth lies (as it generally does in such cases) somewhere between the extreme statements that have been urged on either side, by the friends and the foes of Wentworth.

One of his latest biographers,† who brought to his task a very amiable feeling and desire—which wasted itself at last, however, in an excess of sweetness and candour—sets out with a just remark. "The factions which agitated his contemporaries," Mr. MacDiarmid observes, "far from ceasing with the existing generation, divided posterity into his immoderate censurers or unqualified admirers; and writers, whether hostile or friendly, have confounded his merits and defects with those of the transactions in which he was engaged. Even in the present day, an undisguised exposure of his virtues and vices might be misconstrued by many into a prejudiced panegyric, or an invidious censure of man as well as of the cause." Now from this I shall certainly, in some measure, secure myself by the course I propose to adopt. The collection of documents known by the title of the "Strafford Papers" seems to me to contain within itself every material necessary to the illustration of the public and private character of this statesman, on an authority which few will be disposed to contest, for the record is his own. The general historical statement I have already given was necessary to bring Wentworth more intelligibly upon the political scene; but hereafter I mean to restrict myself almost entirely to the authorities, illustrations, and suggestions of character that are so abundantly furnished by that great work. The letters it contains, extending over a period of more than twenty years, comprise the notices of the country gentleman, the anxieties of the Parliament-man, the growing ambition of the president of the North, the unflagging energy of the lord deputy, the intense purpose and reckless daring of the lieutenant-general, and the cares, magnanimously borne, of the ruined and forsaken aspirant, about to render the forfeit of that life which three kingdoms had pronounced incompatible with their well-being. Their evidence is the more unexceptionable, that they are no hasty ebullitions, the offspring of the moment, a sudden expression of sentiments to be disavowed in succeeding intervals of calm. With a view, as it would seem, to guard against the inconveniences of a naturally fiery and uncontrollable temperament, Strafford wrote with singular deliberation, and his perspicuous and straightforward despatch-

* The writer in the Biographia Britannica, and Mr. MacDiarmid, reject Sir George Radcliffe's dates without the slightest scruple, but without the smallest excuse. They are all of them extremely accurate, and it is quite certain that Wentworth sat in the Parliament of 1614. The writers in the Biog. Brit. plead in apology that Radcliffe's own statement—"my memory is (of late especially) very bad and decayed"—quite warrants their freedom with his dates; but they seem to have overlooked the fact that Radcliffe distinctly restricts the decay of his memory to facts he has altogether forgotten. "Seeing my unfaithful memory," he subsequently says, "hath lost part of the occurrences which concerned my lord, I am loth to let slip that which yet remains."

† Mr. MacDiarmid, Lives of British Statesmen, 2 vols.

es* deliver the results of a thorough conviction. "He never did anything of any moment," remarks Sir George Radcliffe, "concerning either political or domestical business, without taking advice; not so much as a letter written by him to any great man of any business, but he showed it to his confidants if they were near him. The former part of his life, Charles Greenwood and myself were consulted with; and the latter part, Chr. Wandesford came in Charles Greenwood's room, Charles Greenwood desiring not to be taken away from his cure; they met almost daily, and debated all businesses and designs, pro et contra: by this means his own judgment was very much improved, and all the circumstances and probable consequences of the things consulted were discovered and considered."† From the high praise which is given by Sir George to this practice, it is to be inferred, moreover, that it was no cheap expedient to obtain an obsequious and all-approving set of counsellors; for he complacently subjoins, that such a course "is very efficacious to make a wise man, even though he advise with much weaker men than himself; for there is no man of ordinary capacity that will not often suggest some things which might else have been let slip without being observed; and in the debates of things a man may give another hints and occasions to observe and find out that which he that speaks to it, perhaps, never thinks on; as a whetstone," &c., concluding with that very original simile. It may also be remarked here that, of his more important despatches to the king, Wentworth was accustomed to transmit duplicates to the leading members of the council. Thus, in a letter to Secretary Cooke, he writes: "Having such confidence in your judgment and good affection both towards his majesty's service and myself, I hold it fit to give you a clear and particular understanding of all my proceedings in these affairs, to which end I have sent you the duplicates of all my despatches to his majesty and others, as you will find in the packet this bearer shall bring unto you; only I desire you will be pleased not to take notice thereof, unless it be brought unto you by some other hand. These businesses have cost me a mighty labour, having been at first written over by my own hand. And I have been as circumspect and considerate therein as possibly I could. And now I beseech you, help me with your judgment in anything you shall find amiss, and let me clearly and speedily be led into the right path, in case I have erroneously, in anything, swerved from that which is best and honourablest for our master; for it would grieve me more than any other thing, if my weakness should lead him into the least inconvenience; and this you ever find in me, that no man living shall more promptly depart from an error than myself, that have, in good faith, no confidence in my own judgment, how direct and intent soever my affections may be." What these letters want, therefore, in those sudden and familiar outbreaks which are to be looked for in a less guarded correspondence, is amply made up in the increased authority of the matter thus carefully elaborated and cautiously put forth. Nor are instances altogether wanting in which the curb is set aside, and the whole nature of the writer has its resistless way.

I have remarked on the aristocratic influences which surrounded Wentworth's youth. Everything had tended to foster that principle within him. His ancient lineage, extending, at no very distant period, to the blood royal; the degree of attention which must have early attached itself to the eldest of twelve children; his inheritance of an estate of £6000 a year, an enormous fortune in those days; his education; all the various circumstances which have been touched upon, contributed to produce a character ill fitted to comprehend or sympathize with "your Prynnes, Pymes, Bens, and the rest of that generation of odd names and natures,"* who recognised, in the struggling and oppressed Many, those splendid dawns of authority which others were disposed to seek only in the One. From the first, we observe in Wentworth a deep sense of his exact social position and its advantages. This is explained in a passage of a remarkable letter, written at a later period to his early tutor, Mr. Greenwood, but which I shall extract here, since it has reference to the present time: "My sister Elizabeth writes me a letter concerning my brother Mathew's estate, which I know not how to answer till I see the will; nor do I know what it is she claims, whether money alone, or his rent-charge forth of my lands, or both. Therefore I desire the copy of the will may be sent me, and her demand, and then she shall have my answer. This brother, that she saith was so dear unto her, had well tutored her, or she him, being the couple of all the children of my father that I conceived loved me least; it may be they loved one another the better for that too. However it prove, I know not; but this I am most assured, that in case any of the three brothers died without issue, my father ever intended their rent-charge should revert to me, and not lie still as a clog upon my estate; or that any daughter of his, whom he had otherwise provided for forth of the estate, should thus intercept his intentions towards his heir. But how often hath he been pleased to excuse unto me the liberal provisions taken forth of my estate for my brothers and sisters? And as often hath been assured by me, I thought nothing too much that he had done for them; and yet I can make it confidently appear that he left not my estate better to me than my grandfather left it to him by £200 a year; nay, some that understand it very well have, upon speech had with me about it, been very confident he left it me rather worse than better than he received it. But I shall and can, I praise God, and have heretofore, patiently looked upon their peevishness and frowardness towards me, and all their wise and prudent councils and synods they have held against me, as if they had been to have dealt with some cheater or cozenor, not with a brother, who had ever carried himself justly and loving-

* It is much to be regretted that Mr. Brodie, whose work contains several valuable suggestions towards the life of Strafford, should suffer himself to depreciate so strongly the merit of his letters and despatches, and his intellectual attainments generally. I shall have ample occasion to refute this.

† Essay.

* Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 344. Such was Wentworth's ill-judged classification. "Ben" may be presumed to have meant Sir Benjamin Rudyard.

ly towards them; nor do I, nor will I, deny them the duties I owe unto them, as recommended unto my care by my father. Nay, as wise as they did, or do, take themselves to have been, I will say, it had not been the worse for them, as I think, if they had taken less of their own foolish, empty fancies, and followed more of my advice, who, I must needs say, take myself to have been full as able to have directed their course as they themselves could be at that age.”* Here the remark cannot but occur of the very early age at which these extraordinary “excuses” from a father to a son must have been proffered and accepted! Sir William Wentworth died in 1614,† shortly after his son, who had scarcely accomplished his twenty-first year, was returned to Parliament from Yorkshire. This patriarchal authority, then, this strong sense of his hereditary rights of property, was of no late assumption; and, in after life, it was Wentworth’s proud satisfaction that he came not to Ireland “to piece up a broken fortune.”‡ “For,” says he elsewhere, “as I am a Christian, I spend much more than all my entertainments come unto; yet I do not complain; my estate in England may well spare me something to spend.” At his so early maturity, being called to the family inheritance by the death of his father, a new charge devolved to him in the guardianship of his elder sister’s children, the issue of Sir George Savile, which trust he faithfully discharged. His own account of his family regards, generally, given in the passage quoted, appears to me to be perfectly just. His disposition was kind, but exacting. Those of his relatives who paid him proper deference received from him attentions and care. And it is remarkable to observe in those brothers, for instance, who continued attached to him through all his fortunes—one an intimate counsellor, another a “humble poster in his affairs”—the complete deference they at all times cheerfully paid to him.

Such was the new member for Yorkshire, who took his seat in the Parliament of 1614. I have described the condition of affairs. They had arrived at such a point that not to declare in favour of the popular party was to exert an influence against them. The liberal strength had not declined in the present assembly. The confederacy of “undertakers,”§ banded for the purpose of influencing the elections, had pursued their vile avocations without effect. The new members were stanch, resumed complaints against monopolies and other unjust grants, called the Bishop of Lincoln to account for disrespectful words, and received the tribute to their honesty of a dissolution after two months’ sitting,|| and of imprisonment, in many cases, afterward.* During these two months Wentworth had continued silent; not unobserved, but silent. I have examined the Journals, and find no trace of his advocacy of either side in the great struggle.†

At the close of the session he returned to Yorkshire, and a year passed over him at his country residence, engaged, to all appearance, in no pursuits less innocent than his favourite sport of hawking. Let the reader judge, however, if his personal ambitions had been forgotten. Sir John Savile, the father of the afterward Lord Savile—and not, as has been invariably stated by modern writers, the Lord Savile himself‡—at this time held an office of great esteem in the county, that of custos rotulorum, or keeper of the archives, for the West Riding. So strong an influence, however, had for some time been moving against Savile in the county, that the Lord-chancellor Ellesmere was induced to interfere. It is instructive to observe that Sir Thomas Fairfax, a near kinsman of Wentworth’s, was the most active against Savile. I quote a passage of a letter from Sheffield, the lord president of the North, to Ellesmere: “I desired much to have waited upon you myself, to present an information lately made unto me of the evil carriage of one Sir George Savile, a gentleman of Yorkshire, one of the principal in commission, that maketh use of his authority to satisfy his own ends, if sundry complaints be true which of late have been made unto me touching one particular, which, in my opinion, is a matter of foul condition, and which I am bold to intreat your lordship to give me leave to make known unto

* The compilers of the Parliamentary History have denied this, but see debate on it in Journals of Feb. 5, 12, and 15, 1621; and Hatsell’s proof, vol. i., p. 133, 134, edit. 1796. Hume admits the statement, vol. v., p. 50.

† In some of the less precisely accurate histories—in Ebdard’s, Oldmixon’s, and Mrs. Macaulay’s—Wentworth had been erroneously ranked as one of the “factious” members of this session, who had earned imprisonment after the dissolution by a violent personal attack on the king. Mr. Brodie set the mistake completely at rest, by showing its origin. A Mr. Thomas Wentworth, a very popular member, represented Oxford in all the Parliaments of James, and in the first two Parliaments of Charles. It was he, who spoke violently, and was imprisoned. It was he, also, who took the active part against Buckingham in the second Parliament, which had been ascribed to Sir Thomas Wentworth (who did not sit in that Parliament at all), even by Rushworth. In expressing great surprise at this mistake on the collector’s part, however, Mr. Brodie overlooks the circumstance of its having arisen from a mere error of the press. Had it been otherwise, it would have been difficult (considering that Rushworth attended the house himself, and was necessarily acquainted with the persons of the different members) to have received even Mr. Brodie’s authority and that of Wentworth’s own letters against the indefatigable collector. But the context of Rushworth shows the error to have been merely one of the press. He is stating the argument of the lawyers of the House on the difference between “common fame” and “rumour,” and observes: “It was declared by Sir Tho. Wentworth, Mr. Noy, and other lawyers in the debate,” &c.—Now Mr. Wentworth was a lawyer, and an eminent one, the author of a legal treatise of great merit, on Executors, and Recorder of Oxford; but Sir Thomas Wentworth was none of these things. The mistake does not occur again. See Rushworth, vol. i., p. 217. The author of the History continued from Mackintosh has fallen into Rushworth’s error, vol. v., p. 33.

‡ It is singular that this mistake should have occurred; for occasionally, in the Papers, he is called “the old knight,” “old Sir John,” &c. (vol. i., p. 35, &c.); and in his own letter to the Lord-chancellor Ellesmere, on which the whole of the present business turns, he expressly alludes to “service of forty years under the late queen of gracious memory.”—Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 2. But so incorrectly are circumstances looked at, which do not seem to bear immediately on the matter in hand, yet are to illustrate it afterward not unimportantly.

* Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 484. † Radcliffe’s Essay.

‡ Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 138; and see vol. i., p. 79.

§ For the origin of these “strange ugly kind of beasts,” as the king, in his subsequent confession of their existence, oddly called them, see Wilson, in Kennet, vol. ii., p. 696. For James’s present false denial of their having been employed, see Carte, vol. iv., p. 19, 20; Bacon’s Works, vol. i., p. 695; Commons’ Journals, p. 462.

|| “This House of Commons,” says Hume, “showed rather a stronger spirit of liberty than the foregoing, so little skill had the courtiers for managing elections” (vol. v., p. 49). It subsequently received from the politer courtiers the title of the “addle” Parliament, from the circumstance of its not having been allowed to pass a single bill. Aikin, vol. i., p. 439. See a curious fact mentioned in D’Israeli’s Character of James, p. 158, and the king’s assertion, in his remarkable commission for the dissolution.

you by the relation of Sir Thomas Fairfax, a gentleman of good worth, to whom the particulars of that matter are well known." The result was, that in 1615 Savile was removed, and Sir Thomas Wentworth appointed to the office. The court had not forgotten the good services of his silence, and Wentworth was not ungrateful. "Calling to mind," he afterward writes to Weston, "the faithful service I had the honour to do his majesty, now with God, how graciously he vouchsafed to accept and express it openly and sundry times, I enjoy within myself much comfort and contentment. . . . You can best witness the opinion, nay, I might say the esteem his late majesty held of me."*

But a new actor now appears upon the scene, in whose hands James had become a puppet, and to whose shameless influence he had surrendered all his esteems and regards. Having discharged the duties of his new office for nearly two years, Wentworth received (near the close of 1617) a startling notice from no less a person than his grace the Duke of Buckingham. Old Savile had been busy with him. "These are to let you understand that, whereas his majesty is informed that Sir John Savile yielded up his place of custos rotulorum voluntarily unto you, whom now his majesty hath received into favour again, and purposeth to employ in his service, his majesty will take it well at your hands, that you resign it up again unto him with the same willingness, and will be mindful of you to give you as good preferment upon any other occasion."† Buckingham, however, had committed a mistake here. Wentworth replied to this notice in a letter which has, unfortunately, been lost, but whose import may be gathered from some passages in Buckingham's reply: "The reasons set down in your letter are so substantial to prove that Sir John Savile made no voluntary resignation of the place to you, but yielded it up rather out of a necessity to avoid that which otherwise would have fallen upon him, that I see it was a misinformation given to his majesty and to me which occasioned the writing of my letter unto you." Other grounds of apology are added, and Buckingham proceeds: "Upon these grounds I thought it could neither be any wrong nor disgrace to move you in that business; but I pray you believe that I am so far from doing the least indignity to any gentleman of your worth, that I would be ready, upon any occasion, to do you the best service I could. Therefore I desire you not to trouble yourself either with any doubt of farther proceeding in this matter, which went so far only upon misunderstanding, or with so long a journey to give me satisfaction, seeing I have fully received it by your letter, and have acquainted his majesty with the true state of the business, as you have set it down." Buckingham subscribes himself his "very assured friend," and then, in a very curious and significant postscript, betrays good reason for his sudden change of style, and sufficiently explains the shrewd and determined course that had been adopted by Wentworth: "I beseech you to excuse me to my Lord of Cumberland and my Lord Clifford that I write not to them now, as I purpose to do at more leisure; for now I made haste to signify that which I have to you, that I might spare you so troublesome a journey." So Wentworth continued in his place; and old Savile, eaten up with mortified spleen, waited his first opportunity of retaliation.

Wentworth foiled him at that game too, by striking the first blow! A new Parliament was spoken of, and a strong opposition from the Savile party against Wentworth significantly indicated. He went instantly up to London; spoke carelessly, it may be supposed, to his friends at court of his indifference about standing any contest; and so won from the ministerial party an entreaty that he would stand, and endeavour to bring in one of the secretaries of state along with him.* Wentworth then consented, returned to Wentworth Woodhouse, and commenced his election exertions. In these his character had full play; and here, in the first great effort of his public life, were amply vindicated his achievements of a later period. The energy and activity he exhibited amounted almost to a marvel! Every difficulty sank before him. Doubts were satisfied, jealousies put to shame, indifference moved to action, enmity even to friendship, dishonesty foiled in its own way, friends stimulated, the opposition of those who still continued enemies diverted. I mean to quote these letters at some length hereafter, in immediate illustration of the character of the lord-president and lord-deputy, to the right understanding of which they appear to me to offer a remarkable assistance. Wentworth, of course, triumphed, for nothing could withstand his vigour and resources. He went to the poll, after all, on the day of his election, with Calvert, in no vain reliance on friendly professions, but with positive lists, furnished him by the petty officers of the several hundreds, of the names of those voters who had distinctly engaged to support his interests.†

It may be supposed into what a deadly feud the hatred of the Saviles had now been provoked. From this time we hear little more of the father: the son, Sir John Savile the younger, supplies his place. He was a person of mean intellect; but he had a restless ambition, and was active in intrigue. He had "suck'd in with his milk," as Clarendon says, a particular malice to Wentworth; and through his life he had many opportunities of showing how steadily he remembered that "Strafford had shrewdly overborne his father."‡

Disgraceful occurrences had filled up the interval between the last Parliament and this Parliament of 1621. The exaction of benevolences;§ the usurpations of the Star Chamber;

* "I was at London much entreated, and indeed at last enjoined, to stand with Mr. Secretary Calvert."—Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 10.

† Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 13.

‡ Clarendon's History of the Rebellion, vol. ii., p. 155, folio edit.

§ "The benevolence goes on. A merchant of London, who had been a cheesemonger, but now rich, was sent for by the council, and required to give the king £200, or to go into the Palatinate and serve the army with cheese, being a man of eighty years of age. He yielded rather than pay, though he might better have given nine subsidies, according as he stands valued. This was told to me by one that heard it from his own mouth. They talk also of privy seals. His majesty at Theobald's, discoursing publicly how the deaths of the unfortunate Arabella Stuart, of the promising youth Prince Henry,* and of the accomplished Overbury; the rapid rise of Villiers; the pardon, and dark allusions of Somerset;† the disgrace of Coke; these are some of the events which had blotted the history of the nation. And these were of home growth. Abroad, mischief had been equally busy; for the small remnant of foreign policy in the government disappeared with Cecil. The weak and unassisted Frederic, son-in-law of the English king, had been ignominiously driven from his new dominions by Spinola; Prague had furnished its disasters; and the Protestant interest—the faith of which, as he had abundantly assured Vorstius, James conceited himself the defender—was trampled down everywhere.

* Letter, dated 1626, Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 35, 36.

† Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 4.

Proportioned to the disgust and indignation with which these things had been contemplated by the popular party, were the feelings with which they now assembled in this Parliament of 1621. The early sittings were distinguished by active and resolute steps in behalf of privilege. It is not necessary to allude to them at any length here. Some great state criminals were subsequently struck down; and after a few months, the Parliament was dissolved by proclamation, and the king committed himself in many acts of foolish violence.‡

Wentworth had taken little or no part in these proceedings. He avoided the risk of endangering a certain show of country independence, by active opposition to what was called the country party, and held the most moderate of courses between the court and the people. The service he had already rendered to the former in the matter of Calvert's return he had been enabled to render palatable to his country by the circumstances of the Savile feud; and it now left him to a convenient kind of neutrality in other respects, which might be felt, in secret quarters, as no less serviceably intended to the court. I find him acting on committees in this Parliament, but never putting himself forward as a speaker. Shortly after, he explained his policy in this respect in a letter to his brother-in-law, Lord Clifford. Al-he meant to govern, was heard to say he would govern according to the good of the common-weale, but not according to the common will." Such is an extract from a MS. letter of that day. Harl. MSS., 389. It is partly quoted in Ellis's Original Letters, 2d series, vol. iii., p. 241. It is very characteristic.

* For some account of the strange circumstances attending the death of this prince, see Osborne, p. 531; Burnet, vol. i., p. 10; Winwood, vol. iii., p. 410; Harris's Life of James, p. 301, 302. Fox, in his letter to Lord Lauderdale, stated his conviction that Henry had been poisoned. The report of the physicians, however, is unanimous on this point, and unfavourable to the supposition. See Cornwallis's Memoir, in the 2d vol. of Somers's Tracts; and the admirable remark of Hume, vol. v., p. 48.

† See Osborne, p. 534; Weldon, p. 95, 168, 125; and Harris, p. 82-86, for certain remarkable points in the character of James. With respect to the allusions of Somerset, see Weldon, p. 118; the king's letters to Bacon, in the Cabala; Birch's edition of Bacon, vol. iii.; and Von Raumer's sixty-third letter, in his Illustrations of History. Sir Walter Scott has a curious note in his edition of Somers's Tracts (vol. ii., p. 488) on this mysterious affair. See, also, Somers's Tracts, vol. ii., p. 335, 336; and Brodie's History, p. 15-19. I have no inclination to venture an opinion on so extremely unpleasant a subject; but if suspicions reasonably prevailed before, the publication of Von Raumer's work on the history of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries is not likely to lessen them. Dr. Lingard has put forward objections, which see in his History, vol. vi., p. 116, quarto ed.

‡ See Rushworth, vol. i., p. 52-55.

luding to parliaments, he says, "For my opinion of these meetings your lordship knows sufficiently, and the services done there coldly requited on all sides, and, which is worse, many times misconstrued. I judge farther, the path we are like to walk in is now more narrow and slippery than formerly, yet not so difficult but may be passed with circumspection, patience, and principally silence."* The present dissolution Wentworth regretted; but he made silence chiefly serve to assist him in this also. "As for the disaster," he writes to Lord d'Arcy, "fallen upon this so hopeful a Parliament, albeit I should take pleasure to relate it, yet the enclosed proclamation for dissolution might well save me the labour; much more, then, when I cannot think a thought of it but with grief, will it well become me to be silent."†

He had moved his family up from Wentworth Woodhouse before the session; and they resided, during its continuance, in Austin Friars. Here his body first began to show its extreme frailty. He had "a great fever," says Sir George Radcliffe; one of those pestilential fevers, it is to be presumed, which so often ravaged the close and crowded streets of London; and which, at the same time (1622), struck his wife more fatally. He removed from London, but too late to save the Lady Margaret. She died shortly after, leaving no issue, but a memory which he held in respectful regard.‡

In his intercourse with his court friends at London, Wentworth had zealously interested himself in behalf of two or three of his brothers.§ The anxiety with which he sought to get them fairly "settled" somehow was extremely characteristic. The first thing we now find him engaged in at Wentworth Woodhouse after his domestic loss is the following out of these exertions for the youths of his family. He writes to Sir Edward Conway, one of the king's principal secretaries of state, to remind him of his promises in behalf of "the bearer, my fifth brother, who, intending to try his fortune in the wars, desires more than in any place else to serve as a gentleman of the company under my cousin your son." He apologizes for not having seen the secretary before leaving London, on the score of the sudden necessity of his illness. "If you would vouchsafe him," he continues, "so much of your favour, as to recommend him by your letters in such sort, that my cousin may be pleased to afford him his good direction and council, and cast his eye upon him as a kinsman (if his carriage may be such as may deserve it), I should judge myself much bound unto you for this, as for other your many noble courtesies bestowed upon me. And this I will be answerable for, that he shall approve himself, by God's grace, religious, honest, well governed, and daring enough. I conceive, likewise (if it might stand with your good pleasure), that a letter of recommendation to Sir Horace Vere might stand him in good stead, which I humbly submit to your wisdom, and myself to your honourable censure for this my boldness." This is the same thought, the reader will perceive, as that which suggested itself to Eliot when writing to Hampden of

* Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 19.

† Ibid., p. 15.

‡ [She was buried at York.—C.]

§ See Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 14, 16, 18.

his younger son. Sir Edward Conway at once granted his request, and Michael Wentworth was sent off to the wars; not without a letter from his brother, however, of excellent purpose and advice. Among many sound suggestions for his professional advancement, he observes: "Methinks it were good to keep a journal-book of all that passeth during your being in the army; as of your removes, your skirmishes, your encampings, the order of your marches, of your approaches, of your retreats, of your fortifications, of your batteries, and such like; in the well and sound disposal whereof, as I conceive, consists the chief skill and judgment of a soldier." The letter concludes admirably: "Only let me add this one counsel, that if you come in person to be brought on in any service, I conceive you shall do well to go on with the sober and staid courage of an understanding man, rather than with the rash and ill-tempered heat of an unadvised youth. In which course too, I conceive, you may sufficiently vindicate yourself from the opinion of fear and baseness, and gain a good esteem among the wiser sort. And, indeed, a man that ventures himself desperately beyond reason (besides that thereby he too much undervalues himself) shall by men of sure and sad brains be deemed, without doubt, unfit for government and command, that exerciseth none of it first over his own unruly and misleading passions." This conduct, so deprecated here by Wentworth, is a description of that very conduct which it is the general custom to ascribe to the Earl of Strafford, but incorrectly, as I trust I shall be able to show.

His health had now strengthened, and, with it, a flow of good spirits came. Sir George Calvert, the king's secretary of state, was selected for the first advantage of these. "Mr. Tailor telling me," Wentworth writes, "he would see you before the end of this week, I might not omit to present my service unto you in these few lines. Matter worthy your trouble these parts afford none, where our objects and thoughts are limited in looking upon a tulip, hearing a bird sing, a rivulet murmuring, or some such petty, yet innocent pastime, which, for my part, I begin to feed myself in, having, I praise God, recovered more in a day by an open country air than in a fortnight's time in that smothering one of London. By my troth, I wish you, divested of the importunity of business, here for half a dozen hours, you should taste how free and fresh we breathe, and how procul metu fruimur modestis opibus, a wanting sometimes to persons of greater eminency in the administration of commonwealths. But seeing this is denied to you in your course, and to me as part of my misfortune, I shall pray you may ever receive as full contentment in those more weighty as we do in these lighter entertainments."*

This "innocent pastime," nevertheless, did not withhold him from the Parliament, which was now summoned. Its proceedings have been described in the life of Eliot. Wentworth played his usual cautious part, and returned to Wentworth Woodhouse, at its adjournment, a better friend than ever, more playful and more confidential, to his majesty's "principal secretary of state." Calvert himself had gone to his country seat at Thistleworth, and is congratulated by his correspondent with many classical similitudes and quotations on having "retired to the delights of his Tusculanie, ereptus specioso ejus damno." An amusing anecdote of James, then hunting with his court at Rufford, concludes the letter. "The loss of a stag, and the hounds hunting foxes instead of a deer, put the king, your master, into a marvellous chaff, accompanied with those ordinary symptoms better known to you courtiers, I conceive, than to us rural swains; in the height whereof comes a clown galloping in, and staring full in his face: His blood! (quoth he) am I come forty miles to see a fellow? and presently in a great rage turns about his horse, and away he goes faster than he came; the oddness whereof caused his majesty and all the company to burst out into a vehement laughter; and so the fume for that time was happily dispersed."

Seven days after this the "rural swain" of Woodhouse writes again to his selected confidant. He begins by a laughing mention of having written some politics recently to his "cousin Wandesford, as being a statist," a politician, a meddler in state affairs; "but here with you," he adds, "I have matters of other guess stuff to relate, that our harvest is all in, a most fine season to make fishponds, our plums all gone and past, peaches, quinces, and grapes almost fully ripe, which will, I trow, hold better relish with a Thistleworth palate, and approve me how to have the skill to serve every man in his right cue. These only we countrymen muse of, hoping in such harmless retirements for a just defence from the higher powers, and, possessing ourselves in contentment, pray with Dryope in the poet,

'Et siquis est pietas, ab acutis vulnere falcis
Et pecoris morsu, frondes defendite nostras.'

Thus, you see, Ovid serves us at every turn. How bold we are with you since you entred our list; and how we take time, while time serves! For, Michaelmas once come, and your secretary's cloak on your shoulders, I trust you shall find us better manner'd than to interrupt your serious hours with our toys." On the arrival of Michaelmas, however, the Parliament was again adjourned, for the purpose, as it afterward appeared, of a final dissolution. Our rural swain, in consequence, despatches, with an airy sauciness, to his state friend, in a tone between jest and earnest, some slight shades of significant advice, dashed with a sort of reminder that the writer—though given to looking at tulips, and hearing birds sing, and rivulets murmuring, and keeping sheep from biting his hedges, and such like innocent pastime—might yet be called upon, as an effect of want of employment, to play the part of an "unruly fellow in Parliament." The words of this letter are eminently happy and well chosen. "Now," says Wentworth, "that you have given us a put-off till February, we are at good ease and leisure to pry (the true effects of want of employment) saucily out of our own calling into the mysteries of state; to cast about for a reason of this sudden change. In a word, we conclude that the French treaty must first be consummate before such unruly fellows meet in Parliament, lest they might appear as agile against this as that other Spanish match. For my part, I like it well, and conceive the bargain wholsom on our side, that we save three other subsidies and fifteenths. Less could not have been demanded for the dissolving of this treaty, and still the king your master have pretended to suffer loss (no doubt for our satisfaction only), which certainly we should have believed, and reputed ourselves great gainers, and that rightly too. For is it a small matter, trow you, for poor swains to unwind so dextrously your courtly true-love knots? You think we see nothing; but believe it, you shall find us legislators no fools; albeit, you of the court (for by this time I am sure you have, by a fair retreat from Thistleworth, quit your part of a country life for this year) think to bleed our eyes with your sweet balls, and leave us in the suds when you have done. Thus much for the common-weal. For your own self, I am right glad for your ague recovered, hoping it will cleanse away all bad-disposed humours, and give entrance consequently unto a settled continuing health, wherein no man alive shall be more pleased. In the alacrity of which faith, and out of an earnest desire to be made an eyewitness thereof, you shall have (God willing) within these few weeks to attend you, your honour's ever most humbly, most readily to be command, THOMAS WENTWORTH."

* Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 16.

It is just possible that these hints might have been taken at last by the court party, but that Wentworth's proposed journey was retarded by a sudden return of illness. In the spring, Ratcliffe observes, "As I take it, he had a double tertian; and after his recovery, a relapse into a single tertian; and, a while after, a burning fever." On his recovery from these afflicting disorders, he came instantly up to London. Charles now sat upon the English throne, and Buckingham's influence reigned over the royal councils more absolutely than even in James's time. This, it is probable (for he had good reason to suspect a personal dislike on Buckingham's part), induced Wentworth to venture more openly among the popular party, and by that means convey to the king, inaccessible through his minister, the importance of his talents and services. I shall show very soon how extremely anxious he was to exhibit himself, as it were, personally to the king. We find him now, accordingly, in frequent communication with Denzil Hollis, and others of the popular men. He had, from the first, provided a convenient organ of communication with them in the person of his kinsman Wandesford, who subsequently proved so accommodating a patriot. Soon after this (one of the results of his visits to the house of Hollis's father, the Earl of Clare), he married the Lady Arabella Hollis, "younger daughter of the earl, a lady exceeding comely and beautiful, and yet much more lovely in the endowments of her mind."*

Wentworth now began to be talked of as an accession to the Liberal party, and the court grew somewhat alarmed. On the meeting of Parliament, his election for Yorkshire came into dispute, and, as I have shown in the memoir of Eliot, the ministerial men supported his claims. No doubt this arose from a desire, by some little sacrifice in a matter of no essential concern, to nip slightly the budding patriot. Eliot's opposition threw him out. What has been already suggested on this subject* is corroborated by some occasional allusions in the Strafford papers. Wentworth's friend, Sir Richard Beaumont, for instance, writes in answer his earnest request: "My occasions are, and have been such, as with no convenience I can come up to London; for which I am very sorry, that I shall not enjoy your good company this summer, and give what assistance I could to make good our York election, which I hold as clear as the noon sun; for if it be tolerated that men shall come six, seven, nay, ten apprentices out of a house, this is more like a rebellion than an election. The gentry are wronged, the freeholders are wronged."† Sir Richard Beaumont goes on to allude to the borough of Pontefract, observes that he is much beholden for the honour of having been elected there, but hints a private reason which will prevent his accepting, and suggests the name of another friend to be returned on a new writ. "I should have been willing to have kept your place for you, or for any friend of yours, and served in it, and yielded it up of an hour's warning to have done you service; but as it is," &c. It would appear from this that Wentworth had already, against the chance of defeat, secured a seat to fall back upon in the borough of Pontefract.‡

When the Parliament commenced proceedings, Wentworth partly showed gratitude to the court, and partly redeemed his new alliance. He spoke with extreme moderation, and advised a grant of subsidies, while, at the same time, he intimated opposition to Buckingham. The adjournment to Oxford then took place; but, on their reassembling, while Eliot and others were dooming the minister to impeachment, Wentworth continued silent. The cause of this will very soon appear.

He returned to Yorkshire. Necessity, in a few months, called together another Parliament. He set to work instantly to prepare for his election; but, in the midst of his arrangements, to the infinite surprise of himself no less than of his friends, an announcement reached him that his name was among those of the men disabled from serving by Buckingham's notable scheme of pricking them sheriffs of their respective counties. Wentworth was now sheriff of Yorkshire. Sir Arthur Ingram, a cautious friend, writing to him at this moment, gave him one consolation: "It was told me by two counsellors, that in the naming of you, the king said you were an honest gentleman, but not a tittle to any of the rest. This much advantage have you that way." He had previously said that every exertion to prevent the step had been used, but added, "I think, if all the council that was at court had joined together in request for you, it would not have prevailed; for it was set and resolved what should be done before the great duke's going over, and from that the king would not change a tittle."§

* Memoir of Eliot, p. 31, 32.

† Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 27.

‡ See Letter to the Mayor of Pontefract, vol. i., p. 26.

§ Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 29.

* Radcliffe's Essay.

Buckingham had gone by this time into Holland; and it would thus appear that Charles, though inclined favourably to Wentworth, did not dare to contravene the order of his minion.

Be that as it might, here was a great occasion. It was soon announced to Wentworth that the pricked men were resolved to make a struggle, to defeat the unusual tyranny that had sought to disable them from Parliament. "I met with Sir Francis Seymour here, at Reading," writes the cautious Ingram; "I find by him that he is very desirous to be of the House, notwithstanding he is chosen sheriff; he hath taken, as he telleth me, very good advice in it; and he hath been resolved that he may be returned, and serve for any town or city that is out of his own county. He would gladly that you would favour him so much as to get him chosen for some place in the north, and he will, if it stand with your good liking, have you chosen in the west. This he did desire me to write to you of, and that you would send him or me an answer so soon as you can. This, his desire, I have by these few lines made known unto you, leaving it to your own wisdom to do therein what you shall think good.

*For my own poor opinion, it is a thing that no doubt will displease the king exceeding much, and, therefore, to be well considered of. On the other side, I think the House would be exceeding glad of it, and would hold you in, in spite of any. That which induceth Sir Francis the rather in this is, that he knoweth that Sir Edward Coke and Sir Robert Philips will be both returned. But, good sir, out of the love I bear to you, I dare not give you any encouragement in it. Wentworth's conduct upon this was decisive of the character I am endeavouring to represent. With the ready and resolved purpose of a man who is already decided on the main course to be pursued, yet is not unwilling that it should receive corroboration or modification from his friends, he instantly consulted several of them. Observe how characteristically this is conveyed in a letter from his father-in-law, Lord Clare: "*You resolve, in my opinion of this particular, rightly; for we live under a prerogative government, where book-law submits unto lex loquens; then be these extraordinaries, that rely rather upon inference or interpretation than the letter, too weak staves for such subjects to lean upon. This is a novelty and a stranger, that a sheriff, who, according to the received rule of our forefathers, is tied to his county as a snail to his shell, may cause himself to be chosen a burgess, or servant for a borough, and so, in a sort, quit the greater and the king's service for a subject's and a less: therefore, as a novelty, it is rather to be followed than to begin it, and as a stranger to be admitted as a probationer, and to be embraced upon farther acquaintance. For my part, I shall be glad if Sir Edward Coke and Sir Robert Philips can make their undertaking good; and I could wish Sir Francis Seymour were a burgess, so you were not seen in it; and if any of them, without your knowledge and consent, shall confer any such place upon you, you are no way in fault thereby; and yet Cæsar's wife must be free from suspicion; so, as I may conclude, it is not good to stand within the distance of absolute power. But I* see the issue: the question will fall between the king and the Parliament; the House will demand her member, and the king denies his officer, and the king's election was prior, so as in conclusion some drops of displeasure may fall upon the borough, whose charter is always in the king's reach. But this is my chimera, and the lion may be less terrible than the picture. Howsoever, this well succeeding would put the courtier out of his trick, secure the Parliament better, and the subject in general, and make great ones more cautious in wrestling with that high court. Yet as you write, son, this business is of such a nature, as it is much better to be a spectator than an actor, and in this I give you no opinion; I only confirm yours."* His resolution now perfectly assured, Wentworth writes in playful confidence to his kinsman Wandesford, whose services he relied on to keep him as well as possible with the popular members. He begins by a pleasant piece of humour: "Returna brevium is the office of a sheriff indeed; but in this, that in this high calling (and now sworn too) I answer your long letter, is more than in justice, scarcely in favour, you could expect from me; and little less than incivility in you thus to abuse a simple gentleman in his place, and put me beyond the length of my tether, it being my part this year, laconicum agere, as becomes best, to say truth, a man of affairs—attendant upon justices, escheators, juries, bankrupts, thieves, and such kind of cattle. Well, then, still to pursue, as a good officer should do, the duties of my vocation, I will tell you, my purpose is to carry myself in such a temper, that for my expense it shall participate of moderation and sobriety, without the least tincture of wantonness or petulancy, which will both better express the sense wherewith I take it from above, and be more suiting with that just regard I owe the gentry of this country, to whom I have been so much beholden; of whom I should be too much forgetful, and of my own modesty too, if I did any ways intend (at least as far as my indiscretion could go) to bring the former licentious custom in again so much to their prejudice. Therefore, in a word, come king, come judge, I will keep myself within the articles made when Sir Guy Palmes was sheriff; and run dog, run cat, drink a red ryal by the place at least, by God's leave." He goes through many topics very amusingly, and then observes, "You will partly see by the enclosed how the pulse beats above," which I take to be an allusion to the letter (he afterward desires it to be enclosed back to him) of his friend Ingram, in which the king's feeling had been so favourably expressed. "For my own part," he continues, "I will commit others to their active heat, myself, according to the season of the year, sold myself up in a cold, silent forbearance, apply myself cheerfully to the duties of my place, and heartily pray to God to bless Sir Francis Seymour. For my rule, which I will not transgress, is, 'Never to contend with the prerogative out of a Parliament, nor yet to contest with a king but when I am constrained thereunto.'"†

Wentworth faithfully adhered to these intentions; and while "the great, warm, and ruffling Parliament" in London was infusing, by the

* Stafford Papers, vol. i., p. 31.

† Ibid., p. 32-34.

* Stafford Papers, vol. i., p. 30.

boldness of its acts and words, new spirit and strength into the country, he remained quiet in Yorkshire, discharging his duty, as his humorous classification had described it, among "justices, escheators, juries, bankrupts, thieves, and such like cattle." It is true he had found time to attend in London for certain purposes that are speedily to be explained, but he did not meddle with Parliament matters there, returning to Yorkshire again as quiet as before, and, indeed, a little more contented.*

Soon afterward, before the proceedings of the Parliament had closed, and while attending a county meeting in his office of high sheriff, a paper was handed to Wentworth. It was the king's warrant dismissing him from the office he had so ardently desired to hold of custos rotulorum! Giving way to momentary astonishment and indignation, he publicly told the meeting in what manner he had just been discharged, and that his successor was to be old Sir John Savile. "Yet I could wish," he added, "they who succeed me had forborne this time this service, a place in sooth ill chosen, a stage ill prepared, for venting such poor, vain, insulting humour. I leave it," he concluded, "not conscious of any fault in myself, nor yet guilty of the virtue in my successor that should occasion this removal."†

This was admirable for a public display. As soon as he had arrived at Wentworth Wood House, however, he despatched the following letters, one almost immediately after the other, to "the Right Honourable Sir Richard Weston, Knt., Chancellor of his Majesty's Exchequer!" They fully explain, it will be seen, the whole course of Wentworth's recent conduct. "I have been beholden unto you," he begins, "for many courtesies, which in your own particular I will undoubtedly ever thankfully acknowledge. Give me leave, then, to put you in remembrance of some things wherewith you formerly have been acquainted, as also to give you an account of some things which have happened since. At the dissolved Parliament in Oxford, you are privy how I was moved from, and in behalf of, the Duke of Buckingham, with promise of his good esteem and favour; you are privy that my answer was, I did honour the duke's person, that I would be ready to serve him in the quality of an honest man and a gentleman; you are privy that the duke took this in good part, sent me thanks; as for respects done him, you are privy how, during that sitting, I performed what I had professed. The consequence of all this was the making me sheriff the winter after. It is true, the duke, a little before Whitsuntide last, at Whitehall, in your presence, said, it was done without his grace's knowledge, that he was then in Holland. At Whitehall, Easter term last, you brought me to the duke, his grace did before you contract (as he pleased to term it) a friendship with me, all former mistakes laid asleep, forgotten. After, I went, at my coming out of town, to receive his commands, to kiss his grace's hands, where I had all the good words and good usage which could be expected, which bred in me a great deal of content, a full security. Now the consequence here again is, that even yesterday I received his majesty's writ for the discharging me of the poor place of custos ro- tulorum which I held here, whose good pleasure shall be cheerfully obeyed; yet I cannot but observe as ill luck of it, that the reward of my long, painful, and loyal service to his majesty in that place is to be thus cast off, without any fault laid to my charge that I hear of, and that his grace, too, was now in England. I have therefore troubled you with this unartificial relation, to show you the singleness of my heart, resting in all assurance justly confident you shall never find that I have, for my own part, in a little transgressed from what had passed betwixt us. All which I confess, indeed, to this bare intent and purpose, and no other, that I might preserve myself in your opinion a man of plainness and truth. Which obtained, I have fully my end, and so I rest in the constant condition of your truly affectionate friend to dispose of, THOMAS WENTWORTH." The courteous conclusions of Wentworth's letters have a significance at times. The next letter to Weston, following up the purpose of the last, runs thus: "Calling to mind the faithful service I had the honour to do his majesty now with God, how graciously he vouchsafed to accept and express it openly and sundry times, I enjoy within myself much comfort and contentment. On the other side, albeit therein still strongly dwell entire intentions (and by God's goodness shall, with me to my grave) towards his sacred majesty that now is, yet I may well apprehend the weight of his indignation, being put out of all commissions, wherein formerly I had served and been trusted. This makes me sensible of my misfortune, though not conscious of any inward guilt which might occasion it; resting infinitely ambitious, not of new employment, but much rather to live under the smile than the frown of my sovereign. In this strait, therefore, give me leave to recommend to you the protection of my innocence; and to beseech you, at some good opportunity, to represent unto his majesty my tender and unfeigned grief for his disservice, my fears also that I stand before his justice and goodness clad in the malevolent interpretations, and prejudiced by the subtle insinuations, of my adversaries; and, lastly, my only and humble suit, that his majesty will princely deign that either my insufficiency or fault may be shown me; to this only end, that, if insufficiency, I may know where and how to improve myself, and be better enabled to present hereafter more ripe and pleasing fruits of my labours in his service; if a fault, that I may either confess my error and beg his pardon, or else, which I am most confident I shall do, approve myself throughout an honest, well-affected, loyal subject, with full, plain, and upright satisfaction to all that can, by the greatest malice or disguised untruth, be objected against me. The contentment of others in my actions is but subordinate, and consequently neither my principal study nor care. Thus have I presumed upon you, farther than any particular interest of mine can warrant, out of a general belief in your wisdom and nobleness, the rather, too, because I conceive you can best witness the opinion, nay, I might say the esteem, his late majesty held of me. All which, nevertheless, as in good manners and discretion I ought, I submit wholly to your best pleasure, without importunately pressing farther herein than may stand with your convenience, your other respects, and, however, retain with me the lasting truth of your honour's most humbly, most readily to be commanded, THOMAS WENTWORTH.*

* Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 35.† Ibid., p. 36.

It did not suit with Weston's convenience to answer these letters at the time, but it is probable that no word of them was withheld from the king. Buckingham was still too powerful to be in anything gainsayed, and it was clear that he had formed a violent dislike to Wentworth. He sought now to mortify him as much as possible through the means of Savile. The son of the "old knight," or the "old cavalier," as one of Wentworth's correspondents† calls him, was promoted to a barony and an office in the household. It is not difficult, on mature consideration, to assign an intelligible reason for these proceedings by Buckingham, though at first they appear startlingly gratuitous. He had, in truth, an equal motive to be jealous of Wentworth, in the way of favour as in that of opposition. While it is possible that he did not very clearly understand the policy that had been shown by Wentworth in either case, it is more than probable that he feared to be undone by him in both. In favour, he might already have received occasion to suppose Wentworth likely to prove a formidable rival (not dreaming that a large capacity could never so impose upon Charles as a mean one); and in opposition, he may still have thought him too likely to be dangerous, for a perfect trust. Nor was he without reason for suspicion, at least, on the latter score. Wandesford, the most intimate friend and kinsman of the quiet sheriff, had been one of the most active managers of the impeachment in the last session. And there were other causes of dread. Wentworth had had some communication with the intriguing Archbishop Williams, and, worse than all, was known to have frequently visited the person whom the duke more deeply feared, the Archbishop Abbot. I quote from Abbot's narrative "concerning his disgrace at court," a passage elucidatory on this point. In describing the three of his acquaintances to whom exception had been taken by Buckingham ("I know from the court, by a friend," he interposes, "that my house for a good space of time hath been watched, and I marvel that they have not rather named sixty than three"), the archbishop observes, "The third was Sir Thomas Wentworth, who had good occasion to send unto me, and sometimes to see me, because we were joint executors to Sir George Savile,‡ who married his sister, and was my pupil at Oxford; to whose son also Sir Thomas Wentworth and I were guardians, as may appear in the Court of Wards, and many things passed between us in that behalf; yet, to my remembrance, I saw not this gentleman but once in these three quarters of a year last past, at which time he came to seek his brother-in-law, the Lord Clifford, who was then with me at dinner at Lambeth."*

The second Parliament dissolved, privy seals were now issuing. Savile, still hot against his old opponent, prevailed with the court to send Wentworth a privy seal. The latter received it while his recent overtures to Weston remained yet unaccepted. It had the appearance of a cold rejection of them.† Still he hesitated as to his course. "I have been here now some two or three months," writes Lord Baltimore to him, "a spectator upon this great scene of state, where I have no part to play; but you have, for which your friends are sorry. It is your enemies that bring you on the stage, where they have a hope to see you act your own notable harm; and therefore keep yourself off, I beseech you, et redimas te quam queas minimo."‡ A letter from Lord Haughton followed. "It was supposed," he informs Wentworth, "this humour of committing had been spent, till that your antagonist did revive it; who, I hear, brags he hath you in a toil or dilemma; if you refuse, you shall run the fortune of the other delinquents; if you come in at the last hour into the vineyard, he hopes it will lessen you in the country."§ Such was indeed the dilemma, the toil, in which Wentworth found himself; but he hesitated still! His friends now became extremely anxious, and letter upon letter was despatched to him. Their general cry was one of dissuasion, but in all events of immediate decision.¶ Lord Clifford wrote several times in anxious solicitude. "Your friends here do think you take the best course in writing to the commissioners and coming up instantly, if you are not yet resolved to lend: but that being the point we all wish you would grant us; for, without that, we can have no hope of your safety for your health or person. Then, the deferring of the answer will so lessen the gift, as the acceptance of it would be but faint and cold. Whereas, if you would now assent to slip the money into some commissioner's hand, you might wave the trouble to appear, either in the country or here. I must tell you, that I have met here with many that are persuaded that you struck a tally here yourself when you were at London, and my answer to such was ignorance. Another sort there are, who inquire much after your coming up, and these I conceive not out of any good affection, because some of them have relation to old Sir John." Lord Baltimore wrote more earnestly still. "If you resolve betimes to take this course, which I would to God you would, it may be yet interpreted obedience to your sovereign, and zeal to his service; and whatsoever slackness hath been in it hitherto may be excused by your friends here, either by indisposition of health, or some other reason, which your own judgment can better dictate unto you than my advice. I should say much more to you were you here, which is not fit for paper; but never put off the matter to your appearance here, for God's sake; but send

* Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 34, 35.

† Lord Mansfield, who appears to have remonstrated with the Duke of Buckingham himself, while Wentworth thus remonstrated, as it were, with the king, respecting the late proceedings. "I writ my mind," says Mansfield to Wentworth, "at full to my lord duke; and, I protest to God, no more sparing the old cavalier or his nature than I would speak of him to you, nor mincing my desires or my nature, which is not to do courtesies for injuries." It is most probable that this was done at Wentworth's desire. See Papers, vol. i., p. 43.

‡ Sir George, it may be remarked, was not a "Yorkshire Savile."

* Rushworth, vol. i., p. 451. Written about the year 1628-9.

† In the Life of Eliot I have sufficiently explained the court practices at this time. Privy seals were generally addressed to the "disaffected" only.

‡ Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 37.

§ See the Papers, vol. i., p. 37-40.

§ Ibid.

your money in to the collectors in the country without more ado. Your friends are much perplexed and in fear of you, and none more than I." Wentworth, thus driven, made up his mind, at last, to refuse to lend. He could no longer conceal from himself that a crisis had arrived, and he was not ignorant of a means (though he might have hitherto wished to avoid some incidents attached to it) that would possibly force from it a perfect triumph. He refused the loan, and was summoned to the council table at London. He did not omit an opportunity to his main purpose that seemed to offer itself here. Wandesford describes it in a letter written to him after his committal to the Marshalsea. "Now that you are reckoned with the afflicted, a man may pray safely for your deliverance; and, seeing it would be no better, I am glad you come in so fair, and so handsomely upon the point itself. Sir Arthur tells me the president reports well of your carriage at the table. I shall be glad to hear of you in your present confinement, lest that prison and this season give you a nightcap in earnest."*

He only remained six weeks in the Marshalsea. He was then removed to Dartford in Kent, where, Radcliffe observes, he "was not to go above two miles from that town." This was an easy imprisonment, and, easy as it was, was still more alleviated by the presence of the Lady Arabella.† She had already presented him with a boy, and, during his present restriction, gave birth to a girl. The letters of her brother, Denzil Hollis, written at this period to Wentworth, are very delightful in many respects,‡ and, in the disastrous news of the court schemes which they supplied, may have served to strengthen his present patriotic purposes. "I am most glad," he writes, "to hear my sister is in so fair a way of recovering strength, since she last made you the second time a father: I wish she may many times do it to both your comforts, and every time still with more comfort than the former; that yet in our private respects we may have some cause of joy, since the public affords us so little; for you see how that goes on de mal en pis, as the French say." He then gives a vivid account of the melancholy Isle of Rheé expedition, and, describing the numbers that had been lost, pleasantly concludes thus: "In the mean time we have lost many good men, yet let us make the best of it; and I hope it will make our wives, instead of bearing wenches, which of late you say they have been much given to, fall to bringing of boys, young soldiers for the reincrew of our army: and I know no reason but mine should begin; and she had as good do it at first, for if she do not, at her peril, I hope to make her go again for it; and when my sister Arabella shall see how mine is served, I hope she will take fair warning, and do as she should do; but I fear not her so much, for she has begun pretty well already. And now I will close my letter as you do yours (with thanks by the way for it, as also for the whole letter), heartily praying she may so continue, to make you a glad father of many goodly and godly boys—and some wenches among, lest the seventh work miracles, as old wives will tell us—and herself to be a joyful and good mother, as I know she is a good and loving wife, and long may she so be to your comfort and her own."

Wentworth and the other recusants released, they met, under the circumstances of extreme excitement which have been already described, in the famous third Parliament. It is scarcely necessary to remark here, that the under current of intrigue which had been set in motion by Wentworth was only known to his convenient friend Wandesford. It is not likely, from the tone of Hollis's letters, that he had ever been made acquainted with it. For the rest of the patriots, with the exception of the keen-sighted Eliot, they all held well with Wentworth, as a great and valuable supporter of the popular cause. He had long been known for his talents; their outburst in behalf of liberal principles had long, by a certain section of the leaders, been anxiously watched for; and now, disappointing none, even of those who had known them longest, and looked for them most impatiently, they burst forth amid the delighted cheers of the House, and with a startling effect upon the court.

On the discussion of the general question of grievances, Wentworth rose. "May this day's resolution," he solemnly began, "be as happy, as I conceive the proposition which now moves me to rise to be seasonable and necessary! For whether we shall look upon the king or his people, it did never more behove this great physician, the Parliament, to effect a true consent amongst the parties than now. This debate carries with it a double aspect, towards the sovereign, and towards the subject; though both be innocent, yet both are injured, both to be cured. In the representation of injuries I shall crave your attention; in the cure, I shall beseech your equal cares and better judgments. In the greatest humility I speak it, these illegal ways are punishments and marks of indignation. The raising of money by loans, strengthened by commission, with unheard-of instructions; the billeting of soldiers by the lieutenants, have been as if they could have persuaded Christian princes—nay, worlds, that the right of empire was to take away goods by strong hand; and they have endeavoured, as far as was possible for them, to do it. This hath not been done by the king (under the pleasing shade of whose crown I hope we shall ever gather the fruits of justice), but by projectors; these have extended the prerogative of the king beyond its just limits, so as to mar the sweet harmony of the whole."

Wentworth then burst suddenly, and with great dramatic effect (he studied this at all times), into the following rapid and passionate invective: "They have rent from us the light of our eyes! enforced companies of guests worse than the ordinances of France! vitiated our wives and daughters before our faces! brought the crown to greater want than ever it was, by anticipating the revenue; and can the shepherd be thus smitten, and the flock not be scattered? They have introduced a privy council, ravishing at once the spheres of all ancient government! imprisoning us without bail or bond! They have taken from us—what shall I say? Indeed, what have they left us? They have taken from us all means of supplying the king, and ingratiating ourselves with him, by tearing up the roots of all property; which, if they be not seasonably set again into the ground by his majesty's hand, we shall have, instead of beauty, baldness!"

* Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 39.

† [On the twenty-fourth of February, 1625, he united himself to Arabella, second daughter of John Hollis, first Earl of Clare.—C.]

‡ See Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 40-42.

For this, in the noblest language, the orator proposed his remedy. "By one and the same thing hath the king and people been hurt, and by the same must they be cured—to vindicate—what? New things? No! our ancient, lawful, and vital liberties! by reinforcing of the ancient laws made by our ancestors; by setting such a stamp upon them as no licentious spirit shall dare hereafter to enter upon them. And shall we think this a way to break a Parliament? No! our desires are modest and just. I speak truly, both for the interest of the king and people. If we enjoy not these, it will be impossible to relieve him; therefore let us never fear but they will be accepted by his goodness. Wherefore I shall descend to my motion, which consists of four parts, two of which have relation to the persons, and two to the property of our goods. 1st. For our persons, the freedom of them from imprisonment, and from employments abroad, against our own consents, contrary to the ancient customs of this kingdom. 2d. For our goods, that no levies may be made but by Parliament; and no billeting of soldiers. It is most necessary that these be resolved, and that the subjects may be secured in both. Then, for the manner, it will be fit to determine it by a grand committee."*

Wentworth sustained, through the short but important proceedings of the session, the reputation he had achieved by this speech in the House and the country. He spoke on all the great questions and emergencies that occurred. Only two of his speeches, however, remain in any completeness. The second was delivered on one of Secretary Cooke's pressing applications for the subsidies. "I cannot help lamenting," he said, "the unlawful courses and slights, for which the only excuse is necessity. We are required to give; but before we can resolve to give, it must be determined what we have to give. What heavy fogs have of late darkened our hemisphere, and yet hang over us, portending our ruin, none is so weak as to be ignorant of! What unsteady courses to dispel these mists have been pursued, and thereby raised near us great storms, I take no pleasure to remember; yet, in all bodies diseased, the knowledge precedes the cure. I will shortly tell the principals, next their remedies. I must reduce them into two heads: 1. Whereby our persons have been injured; 2d. Whereby our estates have suffered.

"Our persons have been injured," continued Wentworth, more earnestly, "both by imprisonment without law—nay, against law, boundless and without bank! and by being designed to some office, charge, and employment, foreign or domestic, as a brand of infamy and mark of disgrace. Oh! Mr. Speaker, when it may not be safe to deny payments upon unjust exactions, but we must go to prison for it, nor in this place to speak our consciences, but we must be stamped to unwilling and unfitting employments! Our estates have been racked two ways; one in the loan, wherein five subsidies were exacted, and that by commission of men of quality, and instructions to prosecute the same with an asperity which no times can parallel! And hence the other consideration, of the projectors and executioners of it. Nay, this was not all, but ministers in their pulpits have preached it as Gospel, and damned the refusers of it—so, then, we are already doomed to damnation!

"Let no man," he said, in conclusion, after proposing a committee for grievances, "judge this way a break-neck of Parliaments, but a way of honour to the king, nay, of profit; for besides the supply which we shall readily give him, suitable to his occasions, we give him our hearts. Our hearts, Mr. Speaker, a gift that God calls for, and fit for a king!"*

There may have been more passion than logic in these speeches, but they had their effect. The court now saw more thoroughly the man they had discarded, and Weston hastened to answer his last letter! He reasoned here not unjustly, that it could scarcely be too late at any time to answer a letter which in its terms so clearly proved the non-existence of any lasting obstacle, such as a firm point of principle. The present conduct of Wentworth, to Weston at least, could appear no other than a temporary resource. Even Buckingham's continued objections were therefore set aside, and, before the conclusion of the session, a negotiation with Wentworth had opened—nay, almost before the burning words which have just been transcribed had cooled from off the lips of the speaker, a transfer of his services to the court was decided on! We have indisputable evidence that on the 28th of May Finch was acting as a go-between.† On the 26th of June the Parliament was prorogued. On the 14th of July Sir Thomas Wentworth was created Baron Wentworth, and called to the privy council.‡ It is clear, however, that at the same time he had stipulated to be made a viscount, and lord-president of the North;§ but this apparently could not be done till the death of Buckingham had removed a still lingering obstacle.||

* Parl. Hist., vol. vii., p. 440.

† Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 46.

‡ [Shortly after his elevation to the peerage, he met his old friend Pym. "You see," said Strafford, "I have left you." "So I perceive," replied the patriot; "but we shall never leave you, as long as you have a head on your shoulders." Pym kept his word, and never lost sight of Strafford till he had brought him to the scaffold.—C.]

§ See Papers, vol. ii., p. 390.

|| A passage in Rushworth (vol. viii., p. 768) is corroborative of the view which I have presented of Wentworth's public conduct. The collector professes to give all those parliamentary speeches "in which my Lord of Strafford discovered his wit and temper, that the court took particular notice of him," and gives only the speeches that were delivered in this third Parliament. It is clear that he had not rendered himself at all formidable before. Rushworth, indeed, subsequently sets this at rest by adding, "Now he began to be more generally taken notice of by all men, and his fame to spread abroad, where public affairs, and the criticisms of the times, were discoursed by the most refined judgments; those who were infected with popularity flattering themselves that he was inclined to support their inclination, and would prove a champion on that account; but such discourse, as it endeared him to his country, so it

* From a MS. in the Harleian Library. See Parl. Hist., vol. vii., p. 369-371.

I have thus endeavoured to trace at greater length, and with greater exactness than has been attempted hitherto, the opening passages in the political history of this extraordinary man. The common and vulgar account given by Heylin* has been, it is believed, exploded, along with that of the no less vulgar Hacket.† All Wentworth's movements in the path which has been followed appear to me to be perfectly natural and intelligible, if his true character is kept in view. From the very intensity of the aristocratic principle within him arose his hesitation in espousing at once the interests of the court. This, justly and carefully considered, will be found the solution of his reluctant advances, and still more reluctant retreats. The intervention of a favourite was hardly supportable by one whose ambition, as he felt obliged to confess to himself even then, would be satisfied with nothing short of the dignity of becoming "the king's mistress, to be cherished and courted by none but himself." He was to be understood, and then invited, rather than forced to an explicit declaration, and then only accepted. The purpose of the alternating attraction and repulsion of his proceedings, such as I have described them, submissive and refractory, might have been obvious, indeed, to an obtuser perception than Buckingham's, but that mediocrity will always find its little account in crushing rather than winning over genius, and is rendered almost as uncomfortable by an uncongenial coadjutor as by a strenuous opponent. Wentworth's conduct, at the last, was forced upon him by circumstances; but his energetic support of the Petition of Rights was only the completion of a series of hints, all of which had been more or less intelligible; and even now, unwillingly understood as this was by the minister, it was yet more reluctantly acted upon, for by Buckingham's death alone, as we are informed, the "great bar" to Wentworth's advancement was removed.‡ It may be added, that, even in all these circumstances, when many steps were forced upon him which his proud spirit but poorly submitted to, and wronged itself in submitting to, it is yet possible to perceive a quality in his nature which was afterward more fully developed. He was possessed with a rooted aversion, from the first, to the court flies that buzzed around the monarch, and as little inclined to suffer their good offices as to deprecate their hostility. The receipt, shortly after this, of divers ill-spelled and solemn sillinesses from the king, seems to have occasioned a deep and enduring gratitude in him for the dispensing with a medium that had annoyed him. "I do with infinite sense," writes he, "consider your majesty's great goodness, not only most graciously approving of that address of mine immediately to yourself, but allowing it unto me hereafter, which I shall rest myself upon as my greatest support on earth, and make bold to practise, yet I trust without importunity or sauciness." The few attempts to ingratiate himself with the queen, which were ultimately forced on Wentworth by his declining fortunes, were attended with but faint success, and he appears to have impressed her, on the whole, with little beyond the prettiness of his hands, which she allowed to be "the finest in the world"*—to the prejudice of his head, which she was not so inclined to preserve.

In one word, what it is desired to impress upon the reader, before the delineation of Wentworth in his after years, is this, that he was consistent to himself throughout. I have always considered that much good wrath is thrown away upon what is usually called "apostasy." In the majority of cases, if the circumstances are thoroughly examined, it will be found that there has been "no such thing." The position on which the acute Roman thought fit to base his whole theory of Æsthetics,

"Humano capiti cervicem pictor equinam
Jungere si velit, et varias inducere plumas,
Undique collatis membris, ut turpiter atram
Desinat in piscem mulier formosa superne, is of far wider application than to the exigencies of an art of poetry; and those who carry their researches into the moral nature of mankind cannot do better than impress upon their minds at the outset, that in the regions they explore they are to expect no monsters—no essentially discordant termination to any "mulier formosa superne." Infinitely and distinctly various as appear the shifting hues of our common nature when subjected to the prism of CIRCUMSTANCE, each ray into which it is broken is no less in itself a primitive colour, susceptible, indeed, of vast modification, but incapable of farther division. Indolence, however, in its delight for broad classifications, finds its account in overlooking this; and among the results, none is more conspicuous than the long list of apostates with which history furnishes us. It is very true, it may be admitted, that when we are informed by an old chronicler that "at this time Ezzelin changed totally his disposition," or by a modern biographer that "at such a period Tiberius first became a wicked prince," we examine too curiously if we consider such information as in reality regarding other than the act done and the popular inference recorded, beyond which it was no part of the writer to inquire. But such historians as these value themselves materially on their dispensation of good or evil fame; and as the "complete change," so dramatically recounted, has commonly no mean influence on the nature of their award, the observations I have made may be of service to the just estimate of their more sweeping conclusions.
Spectatum admissi risum teneatis, amici?" &c.

Against all such conclusions I earnestly protest in the case of the remarkable personage whose ill-fated career we are now retracing. Let him be judged sternly, but in no unphilosophic spirit. In turning from the bright band of patriot brothers to the solitary Strafford—"a star which dwelt apart"—we have to contemplate no extinguished splendour, razed and blotted from the book of life. Lustrous, indeed, as was the gathering of the lights in the begot to him an interest in the bosom of his prince, who (having a discerning judgment of men) quickly made his observation of Wentworth's, that he was a person framed for great affairs, and fit to be near his royal person and councils."

* Life of Laud, p. 194.

† Scrinia Roserata.

‡ Biog. Britt., vol. vii., p. 4179.

* This is told us by Madame de Motteville, who repeats what Henrietta had said to her: "Il était laid, mais assez agréable de sa personne; et la reine, me contant toutes ces choses, s'arreta pour me dire qu'il avait les plus belles mains du monde."

political heaven of this great time, even that radiant cluster might have exulted in the accession of the "comet beautiful and fierce," which tarried a while within its limits ere it "dashed athwart with train of flame." But it was governed by other laws than were owned by its golden associates, and—impelled by a contrary, yet no less irresistible force than that which restrained them within their eternal orbits—it left them, never to "float into that azure heaven again."

Before attending Wentworth to his presidency in the North, we may stop to consider one of those grand features in his character on which many subordinate considerations depend, and a proper understanding of which ought to be brought, as a first requisite, to the just observation of his measures.

I cannot believe Wentworth to have been the vain man popular opinion has pronounced him, nor discover in him any of that overweening and unwarranted self-confidence which friends no less than foes have laid to his charge. An arrogance, based on the supposed possession of pre-eminent qualities which have no existence, is one thing, and the calm perception of an undoubted superiority is another. Wentworth, indeed, "stood like a tower," but that unshaken confidence did not "suddenly scale the light." Its stately proportions were slowly evolved; its eventual elevation unavoidable, and amply vindicated. We have met with no evidences of a refractory or self-sufficient disposition in the youth of Wentworth. His studies at Cambridge had a prosperous issue, and he ever remembered his college life with affection. "I am sorry to speak it, but truth will out," writes he to Laud concerning an episcopal delinquent, "this bishop is a St. John's man—of Oxford, I mean, not Cambridge; our Cambridge panniers never brought such a fairing to the market."* His deep esteem for his tutor, Greenwood, reflects honour on both parties. I have said that it was originated by good services performed, and so, perhaps, it is necessary to limit all Stafford's likings—all, except the fatal one which cost him life, his liking for the weak and unworthy king, which had its origin in that abstract veneration for power which (or rather, as he afterward too late discovered, the semblance of which) we have just seen him, by some practices beneath his nature, climbing up to, and in the exercise of which we are to view him hereafter. But his esteem for Greenwood, whatever its origin, was not to have been provoked by truckling sycophancy. Nothing of that sort would have succeeded in impressing its object with so profound a respect as dictates the following paragraph in an interesting letter to his nephew and ward, Sir W. Savile: "In these, and all things else, you shall do passing well to consult Mr. Greenwood, who hath seen much, is very well able to judge, and certainly most faithful to you. If you use him not most respectfully, you deal extreme ungrateful with him, and ill for yourself. He was the man your father loved and trusted above all men, and did as faithfully discharge the trust reposed in him as ever in my time I knew any man do for his dead friend, taking excessive pains in settling your estate with all possible cheerfulness, without charge to you at all. His advice will be always upright, and you may safely pour your secrets into him, which, by that time you have conversed a little more abroad in the world, you will find to be the greatest and noblest treasure this world can make any man owner of; and I protest to God, were I in your place, I would think him the greatest and best riches I did or could possess."† In the same letter Wentworth assures this youth, "You cannot consider yourself, and advise and debate your actions with your friends too much; and, till such time as experience hath ripened your judgment, it shall be great wisdom and advantage to distrust yourself, and to fortify your youth by the counsel of your more aged friends, before you undertake anything of consequence. It was the course that I governed myself by after my father's death, with great advantage to myself and affairs; and yet my breeding abroad had shown me more of the world than yours hath done, and I had natural reason like other men; only I confess I did in all things distrust myself, wherein you shall do, as I said, extremely well, if you do so too."‡ There is no self-sufficiency here!

Wentworth's method of study has been transmitted to us by Sir George Radcliffe, and I quote it in strong corroboration of the view which has been urged. "He writ," Radcliffe assures us, "as well as he spoke: this perfection he attained, first, by reading well-penned authors in French, English, and Latin, and observing their expressions; secondly, by hearing of eloquent men, which he did diligently in their sermons and public speeches; thirdly, by a very great care and industry, which he used when he was young, in penning his epistles and missives of what subject soever; but, above all, he had a natural quickness of wit and fancy, with great clearness of judgment, and much practice, without which his other helps, of reading and hearing, would not have brought him to that great perfection to which he attained. I learned one rule of him, which I think worthy to be remembered: when he met with a well-penned oration or tract upon any subject or question, he framed a speech upon the same argument, inventing and disposing what seemed fit to be said upon that subject before he read the book; then reading the book, compare his own with the author, and note his own defects, and the author's art and fullness, whereby he observed all that was in the author more strictly, and might better judge of his own wants to supply them."* Now this early habit of confronting, so to speak, the full-grown wits of other men—of satisfying himself of his own precise intellectual height by thoroughly scanning the acknowledged stature of the world's giants—is as much removed from a rash assumption as from the nervous apprehension of mediocrity.

* Stafford Papers, vol. i., p. 189. Laud makes merry upon this happy phrase of the lord-deputy's. The passages are characteristic of the correspondence, and therefore worth quoting. "And so your lordship," he writes, "is very sorry to tell the truth, but only that it will out. A St. John's man you say he is, and of Oxford—your Cambridge panniers never brought such a fairing to the market. Yes, my good lord, but it hath; for what say you of Dean Palmer? who, besides his other virtues, sold all the lead off from the church at Peterburgh; yet he was brought in your Cambridge panniers; and so was Bishop Howland too, who used that bishopric as well as he did the deanery. I must confess this man's baseness hath not many fellows, but his bribery may have store. And I pray, is that ever a whit the less fault, because it is gentleman-like for hundreds and thousands, whereas this man deals for twenty shillings and less? I hope you will not say so; and if you do not, then I pray examine your Cambridge panniers again, for some say such may be found there, but I, for my part, will not believe it, unless your lordship make me." Wentworth appears to have contested this point in Laud's own humour. The bishop retorts by asking him what his "Jonism" means. "Now you are merry again. God hold it. And what? Dr. Palmer acted like a king? Be it so. But he was another card in the pack. As for Bishop Howland, you never heard of him. What! nor of James his wife neither? Good Lord, how ignorant you can be when you list. Yea, but you have taken St. John's Ox. Plagiariste crimine, and I put you to your memory. Is it so? Come on, then: you know there is a cause in the Star Chamber; some were to answer, and they brought their answers ready written. If the Bishop of Lincoln sent them ready for his turn, hath he not an excellent forge? What if this appear? I hope you will not then say I put you to your memory. 'Tis now under examination, and is not this it, &c., flagrante crimine? Go brag now."

* Papers, vol. i., p. 170.

† Ibid., p. 169.

Wentworth's temper was passionate; and it is curious and instructive, in the present view of his character, to mark the steps he took in relation to this. I have already spoken of his extreme cautiousness; of the select council that canvassed his business, suggested his measures, and revised his correspondence; of his deference to advice, and, indeed, submission to reproof, from his assured friends. "He was naturally exceeding choleric," says Sir George Radcliffe, "an infirmity with which he had great wrestlings; and though he kept a watchfulness over himself concerning it, yet it could not be so prevented but sometimes upon sudden occasions it would break. He had sundry friends that often admonished him of it, and he had the great prudence to take in good part such admonitions: nay, I can say that I, one of his most intimate friends, never gained more upon his trust and affection than by this freedom with him in telling him of his weaknesses; for he was a man and not an angel, yet such a man as made a conscience of his ways, and did endeavour to grow in virtue and victory over himself, and made good progress accordingly." This "good progress" brought him eventually to a very efficient self-control. In cases where he would seem to have exceeded it, and to have been transported beyond decency and prudence, it would be hasty to assume, as Clarendon and other writers have done, that it was in mere satisfaction of his will. These writers, it will not be difficult to show, have not that excuse for the failure of their principles in Wentworth's person. The truth was, that, as in the case of Napoleon and other great masters of the despotic art, anger was one of the instruments of his policy. He came to know when to be in a passion, and flew into a passion accordingly. "You gave me a good lesson to be patient," he writes to old Secretary Cooke, "and indeed my years and natural inclinations give me heat more than enough, which, however, I trust more experience shall cool, and a watch over myself in time altogether overcome; in the mean space, in this at least it will set forth itself more pardonable, because my earnestness shall ever be for the honour, justice, and profit of my master; and it is not always anger, but the misapplying of it, that is the vice so blameable, and of disadvantage to those that let themselves loose thereunto."[†]

In the same despatch to the secretary from which I have taken the above, he had observed, immediately before, "Nor is it one of my least comforts that I shall have the means to resort to so wise and well-affected a friend to me as I esteem yourself, and to a servant that goes the same way to my master's ends that I do; and therefore let me adjure you, by all the interests that I may or would have in you, that as you will (I am sure) assist me when I am right, so, by your sensible and grave counsel, reduce me when I may happen to tread awry."* And thus, from the first, is Wentworth found soliciting the direction of others in all important conjunctures; not, indeed, with the vague distress of one unprovided with expedients of his own, and disposed to adopt the first course that shall be proposed, but with the calm purpose of one decided on the main course to be pursued, yet not unwilling that it receive the corroboration, or undergo the modification, of an experienced adviser. This has been occasionally illustrated in the business of his nomination by the king for the office of sheriff, where, having already chosen his party, he submits his determination to his father-in-law, the Earl of Clare, whose answer has been quoted. I have mentioned, also, his practice of transmitting duplicates of his despatches on all urgent occasions to Laud, Cooke, and Cottington.

No passage, indeed, in the career of Wentworth proves him to have been a vain man. His singular skill is never satisfied, without an unremitting application of means to any desired end, and the neglect of no circumstance, the most minute and apparently trivial, that may conduce to its success. Would he ensure his own return for a county, and smuggle in a ministerial candidate under the wing of his own popularity? He proceeds as though his personal merits could in no way influence the event, and all his hopes are founded on the activity of his friends, which he leaves no stone unturned to increase. In one and the same day, Sir Thomas Gower, high sheriff of York, is informed that, "Being, at the entreaty of some of my best friends, resolved to try the affections of my countrymen in the next election of knights for the shire, I could do no less than take hold of this fit occasion to write unto you these few lines, wherein I must first give you thanks for the good respect you have been pleased to show towards me; to some of my good friends who moved you for your just and equal favour at the time of the election; which, as I will be found ready to deserve and affectionately to requite, so must I here solicit you for the continuance of your good purposes towards me; and lastly desire to understand from you what day the county falls out upon (which is to be the next after the receipt of the writ), that so I may provide myself and friends to give our first voices for Mr. Secretary, and the second for myself." Sir Henry Bellasis assured that, "Presently upon my return from London, I find by Mr. Carre how much I am beholden unto you for your good affection." In truth, I do not desire it out of any ambition, but rather to satisfy some of my best friends, and such as have most power over me. Yet, if the country make choice of me, surely I will

* Papers, vol. ii., p. 435.

† Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 87.

* Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 87.

zealously perform the best service for them that my means or understanding shall enable me unto. And having thus far upon this occasion declared myself, must take it as a great testimony of affection in them that shall afford me their voices, and those of their friends for Mr. Secretary Calvert in the prime, and myself in the second place. Particularly am I hereby to give you therefore thanks, and will so settledly lodge this favour in my heart, that I will not fail to remember and deserve it. In my next letters I will likewise let Mr. Secretary know your good respect and kindness towards him, whereof I dare assure you he will not be unmindful. The election day will fall out very unhappily upon Christmas-day; but it is irremediable, and therefore must be yielded unto. If you will please to honour me with the company of yourself and friends upon that day at dinner, I shall take it as a second and especial favour; in retribution whereof you shall find me still conversant, as occasion shall be ministered, in the unfeigned and constant offices of your very assured and affectionate friend." Sir Henry Savile instructed that "I have received your two letters, and in them both find matter to thank you for your respect and kindness towards me. The later of them I received just the afternoon I came out of town, but I write effectually to Mr. Secretary for a burgess-ship for you at Richmond, in regard I knew my Lord of Cumberland was partly engaged; but I will amongst them work out one, or I will miss far of my aim. So soon as I hear from Mr. Secretary, I will give you farther certainty herein; in the mean time, methinks it were not amiss if you tried your ancient power with them of Aldborow, which I leave to your better consideration, and in the mean time not labour the less to make it sure for you elsewhere, if these clowns chance to fail you. The writ, as I hear, is this week gone to the sheriff; so the next county day, which must, without hope of alteration, be that of the election, falls to be Christmas-day, which were to be wished otherwise; but the discomfort of our friends more upon that day than another makes the favour the greater, our obligation the more, and therefore I hope they will the rather dispense with it. If the old knight should but endanger it, 'faith, we might be reputed men of small power and esteem in the country! but the truth is, I fear him not. If your health serve you, I shall wish your company at York, and that yourself and friends would eat a Christmas pie with me there: I tell you there would be a hearty welcome, and I would take it as an especial favour, so value it, and as such a one remember it." Sir Matthew Boynton reminded that "The ancient and near acquaintance that hath been betwixt us causeth me to rank you in the number of my friends; and being moved by my friends to stand second with Mr. Secretary Calvert for knight of the shire at this next Parliament, I assure myself I might confidently address myself unto you for the voices of yourself and friends in the election, which falls out unfortunately to be upon Christmas-day. But as the trouble of my friends thereby will be the greater, so doth it add to my obligation. I hope likewise to enjoy your company and friends that day at dinner. You shall be in no place better welcome." And Christopher Wandesford given notice that "the writ will be delivered by Mr. Radcliffe within these two days to the sheriff, to whom I have written, giving him thanks for his kindness, desiring the continuance thereof. And now, lest you should think me forgetful of that which concerns yourself, I hasten to let you know that I have got an absolute promise of my Lord Clifford, that if I be chosen knight, you shall have a burgess-ship (reserved for me) at Appleby, wherewith I must confess I am not a little pleased, in regard we shall sit there, judge, and laugh together."

The reader will remember that all these, with many other letters, are written and despatched on the same day. No apology is necessary for the length at which I quote them; since, in rescuing them from false and distorted arrangement, much misconception is prevented, and a very valuable means of judgment furnished on Wentworth's general conduct.

He goes on to let Sir Thomas Fairfax know that "I was at London much entreated, and, indeed, at last enjoined, to stand with Mr. Secretary Calvert for to be knight of this shire the next Parliament, both by my Lord Clifford and himself; which, after I had assented unto, and despatched my letters, I perceived that some of your friends had motioned the like to Mr. Secretary on your behalf, and were therein engaged, which was the cause I writ no sooner unto you. Yet, hearing by my cousin Middleton that, he moving you in my behalf for your voices, you were not only pleased to give over that intendment, but freely to promise us your best assistance, I must confess I cannot forbear any longer to write unto you how much this courtesy deserves of me; and that I cannot choose but take it most kindly from you, as suitable with the ancient affection which you have always borne me and my house. And presuming of the continuance of your good respect towards me, I must entreat the company of yourself and friends with me at dinner on Christmas-day, being the day of the election, where I shall be most glad of you, and there give you farther thanks for your kind respects." And thus reports progress to Mr. Secretary himself: "May it please you, sir, the Parliament writ is delivered to the sheriff, and he by his faithful promise deeply engaged for you. I find the gentlemen of these parts generally ready to do you service. Sir Thomas Fairfax stirs not; but Sir John Savile, by his instruments exceeding busy, intimating to the common sort under-hand, that yourself, being not resiant in the county, cannot by law be chosen, and, being his majesty's secretary and a stranger, one not safe to be trusted by the country; but all this according to his manner so closely and cunningly as if he had no part therein; neither doth he as yet farther declare himself than only that he will be at York the day of the election; and thus, finding he cannot work them from me, labours only to supplant you. I endeavour to meet with him as well as I may, and omit nothing that my poor understanding tells me may do you service. My lord-president hath writ to his freeholders on your behalf, and seeing he will be in town on the election day, it were, I think, very good he would be pleased to show himself for you in the Castle-yard, and that you writ unto him a few lines, taking notice you hear of some opposition, and therefore desire his presence might secure you of fair carriage in the choice. I have heard, that when Sir Francis Darcy opposed Sir Thomas Lake in a matter of like nature, the lords of the council writ to Sir Francis to desist. I know my lord-chancellor is very sensible of you in this business; a word to him, and such a letter, would make an end of all. Sir, pardon me, I beseech you, for I protest I am in travail till all be sure for you, which imboldens me to propound these things, which, notwithstanding, I most humbly submit to your judgment. When you have resolved, be pleased to despatch the bearer back again with your answer, which I shall take care of. There is not any that labours more heartily for you than my Lord Darcy. Sir, I wish a better occasion wherein to testify the dutiful and affectionate respects your favours and nobleness may justly require from me." Sir Arthur Ingram is then apprized, in a letter which is full of character, that, "As touching the election, we now grow to some heat; Sir John Savile's instruments closely and cunningly suggesting under-hand Mr. Secretary's non-residence, his being the king's servant, and out of these reasons by law cannot, and in good discretion ought not, be chosen of the country; whereas himself is their martyr, having suffered for them; the patron of the clothiers; of all others the fittest to be relied on; and that he intends to be at York the day of the election—craftily avoiding to declare himself absolutely. And thus he works, having spread this jealousy, that albeit I persuade myself generally they would give me their prime voice, yet in good faith I think it very improbable we shall ever get the first place for Mr. Secretary; nay, I protest we shall have need of our strength to obtain him a second election: so as the likeliest way, so far as I am able to judge, to secure both, will be for me to stand for the prime, and so cast all my second voices upon him, which, notwithstanding, we may help by putting him first in the indenture. I am exceeding sorry that the foulness and length of the way put me out of hope of your company, and therefore, I pray you, let us have your advice herein by the bearer. Your letter to your friends in Halifax admits some question, because you desire their voices for Mr. Secretary and myself the rather for that Sir John Savile stands not; so, say they, if he stand, we are left to our liberty. You will therefore please to clear that doubt by another letter, which, delivered to this messenger, I will get sent unto them. I fear greatly they will give their second voice with Sir John. Mr. Leech promised me he would procure his lord's letter to the freeholders within Hallomshire and the honour of Pontefract; that my cousin Lascells, my lord's principal agent in these parts, should himself labour Hallomshire; Mr. Banister, the learned steward of Pontefract, do the like there; and both of them be present at the election, the better to secure those parts. I hear not anything of them. I pray you, press Mr. Leech to the performance of his promise, letting him know Sir John Savile's friends labour for him, and he declares in a manner he will stand, and get him to send the letters by this my servant. I desire likewise he would entreat my cousin Lascells that he would take the pains to come over, and speak with me the Monday before Christmas-day here at my house. Sir, you see how bold I am to trouble you, and yet I must desire you would be pleased to afford me the commodity of your house for two nights, to entertain my friends. I shall, God willing, be most careful that nothing be impaired, and shall number this among many other your noble courtesies, which have inviolably knit me unto you." Sir Thomas Dawney is solicited to the same effect, and Sir Henry Slingsby informed that "The certainty I have of Sir John Savile's standing, and the various reports I hear of the country people's affection towards Mr. Secretary, makes me desirous to know how you find them inclined in your parts. For this wapentake, as also that of Osgodcross and Staincross, I certainly persuade myself will go wholly for us. In Skyrack I assure myself of a better part, and I will perform promise with Mr. Secretary, bringing a thousand voices of my own besides my friends. Some persuade me that the better way to secure both were for me to stand prime, cast all my second voices on Mr. Secretary, and put him first into the indenture. I pray you consider of it, and write me your opinion; I would not lose substance for such a toyish ceremony. There is danger both ways: for if Mr. Secretary stand first, it is much to be feared the country will not stand for him firm and entire against Sir John. If I be first chosen, which I make no question but I could, then is it to be doubted the people might fly over to the other side, which, notwithstanding, in my conceit, of the two is the more unlikely; for, after they be once settled and engaged for me, they will not be so apt to stir. And again, it may be so suddenly carried as they shall have no time to move. At a word, we shall need all our endeavours to make Mr. Secretary, and therefore, sir, I pray you gather up all you possibly can. I would gladly know how many you think we may expect from you. My Lord Clifford will be at Tadcaster upon Christmas-eve, about one of the clock: if that be your way, I am sure he would be glad yourself and friends would meet him there, that so we might go into York the next day, vote, and dine together, where you shall be most heartily welcome." Sir Thomas Fairfax is again moved very earnestly to make "All the strength of friends and number you can to give their voices for us at the next election, falling to be upon Christmas-day; the rather, because the old gallant of Hooley intends certainly to stand, whom, indeed, albeit I should lightly weigh, were the matter betwixt him and me, yet I doubt Mr. Secretary (if his friends stand not closely to him) being not well known in the country. Sir, you have therefore hereby an opportunity offered to do us all an especial favour, which shall bind us to a ready and cheerful requital, when you shall have occasion to use any of us. My Lord Clifford will be, God willing, at Tadcaster upon Christmas-eve, about one of the clock, where I assure myself he will much desire that yourself and friends will be pleased to meet him, that so we may go into York together; and myself earnestly entreat the company of yourself and them the next day at dinner, which I shall esteem as a double fa-

your." And his cousin Thomas Wentworth advertised that, "Being, as you know, engaged to stand with Mr. Secretary Calvert to be knights for this Parliament, and Sir John Savile our only opponent, I must make use of my friends, and entreat them to deal thoroughly for us, in regard the loss of it would much prejudice our estimations above. In which number I esteem yourself one of my best and fastest friends. The course my Lord Darcy and I hold is, to entreat the high constables to desire the petty constables to set down the names of all freeholders within their townships, and which of them have promised to be at York and bestow their voices with us, so as we may keep the note as a testimony of their good affections, and know whom we are beholden unto, desiring them farther to go along with us to York on Sunday, being Christmas-eve, or else meet us about two of the clock at Tadcaster. I desire you would please to deal effectually with your high constables, and hold the same course, that so we may be able to judge what number we may expect out of your wapentake. As I no ways doubt of your uttermost endeavours and pains in a matter of this nature, deeply touching my credit, so will I value it as a special testimony of your love towards me. I hope you will take the pains to go along with us, together with your friends, to York, that so we may come all in together, and take part of an ill dinner with me the next day, where yourself and friends shall be right heartily welcome."*

It is not necessary to recall attention to the political principle, or the party views, which are evidenced in these letters;† but how singular and complete is the illustration they afford, of Wentworth's practice of letting slip no method, however ordinary, of compassing his designs! Is he interested, either, in the success of a lawsuit! we find that "he spent eight years' time, besides his pains and money, in soliciting the business and suits of his nephews Sir George and Sir William Savile, going every term to London about that only, without missing one term in thirty, as I verily believe. And all this merely in memory of the kindness which had passed betwixt him and his brother-in-law Sir George Savile, then deceased."‡ And so with all things that interested him.

To this head, then, the reader is asked to refer many proceedings, which hitherto have been cited in proof of an excessive vanity. They were rather the suggestions of a mind well aware of the influence of seeming trifles on the accomplishment of important purposes. The pompous enumeration of his heraldic honours in the preamble to his patent of nobility, and the "extraordinary pomp" with which he was created viscount and president of the North, were no unnecessary precaution against the surprise and disdain of an insolent herd of courtiers, and were yet ineffectual wholly to restrain their sarcasms.§ The unexampld splendour of his after progress to the opening of the Irish Parliament was, no doubt, well calculated to "beget an awful admiration" in the minds of a body of men whose services he was then preparing to obtain by far more questionable means; and his fierce resentment of the slightest infringement of the etiquette he had succeeded in establishing, his minute arrangements with respect to the ceremony he conceived necessary to the powers he was intrusted with, have their censure on other grounds than any intrinsic absurdity they evince. It seems to me to be high time, in cases of this sort, to shift our censure to the grosser absurdity of the principles which require such means for their support. Ceremony in the abstract—the mere forms of etiquette, sinking through their own emptiness, sustaining no purpose, and unsustained by none—Wentworth regarded with a more supreme scorn than they were held in by any of his prudish opponents among his own party. "I confess," writes he on one occasion, "this matter of PLACE I have ever judged a womanly thing, and so love not to trouble myself therewith, more than needs must." He cares not, moreover, submitting cheerfully throughout to the king's unworthy arrangement, that himself should gather "golden opinions" by a liberal bestowment of honours in Ireland on the more troublesome of his suitors, while to his deputy was confided the ungracious task of interposing a veto on the royal benefaction, and receiving, in his own person, the curses of the disappointed.* Against the bitterness of their discontent Wentworth had his unfailing resource. "I shall not neglect," he writes, "to preserve myself in good opinion with this people, in regard I become thereby better able to do my master's service; longer than it works to that purpose, I am very indifferent what they shall think or can say concerning me." Not the less scruple had he in complaining of the king's arrangement, when it was tortured to purposes he had never contemplated, and he discovered that the character of his government was become that of an iron rule, wherein reward had no place, even for its zealous supporters.† For the foolish gravity of the luckless king had continued to

'Damny, if ever he comes to the King of England, I will turn rebel.'"—Epistola Howelliana, No. 34, edit. 1650.

* See Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 140.

† One instance, out of the many which strikingly illustrate Wentworth's character in this respect, may be subjoined. Lord Newburgh had procured from the king a promise of promotion for a young man in the Irish army, which the lord-deputy felt would be disadvantageous to the public service. Here are some passages of his remonstrance: "For if I be not favoured so far as that I may be able to make myself friends, and draw unto myself some dependence by the expectance men may have from me in these places, that so I may have assistance and cheerful countenance from some, as I have already purchased the sour and bent brow of some of them, I foresee I shall have little honour, comfort, or safety amongst them. For a man to enforce obedience by punishment only, and be deprived all means to reward some—to be always in vinegar, never to communicate of the sweet—is, in my estimation of it, the meanest, most ignoble condition any free spirit can be reduced unto. . . . The conclusion therefore is, I am confident his majesty will not dobar me of what (be it spoken under favour) belongs to my place, for all the solicitation of the pretty busy Lord Newburgh, who, if a man should move his majesty for anything in the gift of the chancellor of the duchy, would as pertly cackle, and put himself in the way of complaint, as if he had all the merit and ability in the world to serve his master."—Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 136-142.

* These various letters will be found in the Strafford Papers.

† The beginning of electioneering tactics is also curiously discernible in them. † Radcliffe's Essay.

§ The Duke of Buckingham himself flew not so high in so short a revolution of time. He was made a viscount with a great deal of high ceremony upon a Sunday, in the afternoon, at Whitehall. My Lord Powis, who affects him not much, being told that the heralds had fetched his pedigree from the blood royal, viz., from John of Gaunt, said, pen epistle upon epistle, disposing of the most subordinate posts in the army, as well as the higher dignities of the Church. The system, in the first instance, however, was one which a proud man, certainly, might submit to, but a vain man would hardly acquiesce in.

I resume the progress of Wentworth's fortunes. His elevation became an instant subject of general remark; and it is not difficult to discover that, in his native county, where he was best known, the surprise excited by so sudden a change, after such violent opposition, was balanced by a greater surprise, on the other hand, that the honour should have been delayed so long. "Give me leave to inform you," writes Sir Richard Hutton,* in a passage which is expressive of both these feelings, "that your late conferred honour is the subject of much discourse here in Yorkshire, which I conceive proceeds from the most, not out of any other cause than their known worth in you, which is thought merited it much sooner and greater; but this is only to entertain you a little longer; for I know that your actions are not justly liable to any censure, I am sure not to mine; for, being yours, it speaks them good to me, if not the best." The character of the important office intrusted to Wentworth included much that was especially grateful to him: enlarged by his desire, it presented power almost unlimited; freedom at the same time from the little annoyances of the court; and the opportunity of exhibiting his genius for despotic rule in his own county, where personal friends might witness its successes, and old adversaries, should the occasion offer, be made the objects of its triumph. To crown his cause of satisfaction, the Duke of Buckingham, who had still hung darkly over his approach to a perfect confidence and favour, was removed by the knife of Felton. Secret congratulations passed, within a few days after this event, between Wentworth and Weston. Everything seemed to favour his entrance into power, and a light rose upon the future. "You tell me," writes his friend Wandesford to him, "God hath blessed you much in these late proceedings. Truly I believe it, for by these circumstances we know, we may guess at them we know not."† This friend was not forgotten. Though so recently one of the active managers of the impeachment against Buckingham, he was at once received into favour, and Wentworth waited his opportunity to employ the services of others, equally dear and valuable, while he did not fail to improve his opportunities of intercourse among his new associates. Laud was the chief object of his concern in this respect, for he had observed Laud's rising influence with the king.

Wentworth wisely deferred his departure to the North until after the dissolution of Parliament. The powers that awaited him there, increased by his stipulations, I have described as nearly unlimited. The council of York, or of the North, whose jurisdiction extended over the counties of York, Northumberland, Cumberland, and Westmoreland, over the cities of York and Hull, the bishopric of Durham, and the town of Newcastle-upon-Tyne,‡ included within itself the powers of the courts of common law, of the Chancery, even of the Star Chamber. It had originated in the frequent northern rebellions which followed Henry VIII.'s suppression of the lesser monasteries. Before the scheme for the suppression of the greater monasteries was carried into effect, it was judged expedient, in consequence of such disturbances, to grant a commission to the Bishop of Llandaff and others, for the purpose of preserving the peace of these northern counties. This commission was, to all appearances, simply one of oyer and terminer; but a clause had been inserted in it, towards the conclusion, authorizing the commissioners to hear all causes, real and personal, when either or both of the parties laboured under poverty,* and to decide according to sound discretion. This latter license, however, was soon afterward declared by all the judges to be illegal; and the power of hearing real and personal causes at all was rarely acted upon up to the second year of Elizabeth's reign, when it also was declared to be illegal, since causes regarding property, whether real or personal, could only be decided by the laws of the land. It was reserved for James to issue, over these decisions, a new commission, "very differing," says Clarendon, "from all that went before." The commissioners were no longer ordered to inquire "per sacramentum bonorum et legalium hominum," or to be controlled by any forms of law, but were referred merely to secret instructions, which, for the first time, were sent down to the council. This at once reduced the whole of the North to an absolute subjection, and that so flagrant, that the judges of the court of Common Pleas had the decent courage to protest actively against it, by issuing prohibitions on demand to the president and council; and James himself was obliged to have the instructions enrolled, that the people might, in some measure, be able to ascertain by what rules their conduct was to be regulated.†

One of Wentworth's first announcements, in succeeding to this enormous power, the very acceptance of which was a violation of the vital principles and enactments of the petition of right, was to declare that he would lay any man by the heels who ventured to sue out a prohibition in the courts at Westminster.‡ His excuse for such a course of proceeding was afterward boldly avowed.§ "It was a chaste ambition, if rightly placed, to have as much power as may be, that there may be power to do the more good for the place where a man serves." Now Wentworth's notion of good went straight to the establishment of absolute government; and to this, his one grand object, from the very first moment of his public authority, he bent every energy of his soul. He devoted himself, night and day, to the public business. Lord Scroop's|| arrears were

* "Quando ambe partes, vel altera pars, gravata paupertate fuerit."—Rushworth, vol. ii., p. 162.

† An interesting account of the origin and practices of this council of York was given by Hyde (Lord Clarendon) in the Long Parliament. The speech is reported by Rushworth, vol. ii., p. 162-165. ‡ Rushworth, vol. ii., p. 159.

§ In his answers to the charges of his impeachment. See Rushworth, vol. ii., p. 161.

|| His predecessor in the government of York, afterward Earl of Sunderland. Wandesford speaks of him with great contempt, in a letter to Wentworth: "Your predecessor, like that candle hid under a bushel, while he lived in this place, darkened himself and all that were about him,

* Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 47.

† Ibid., p. 49.

‡ Rushworth, vol. i., p. 162.

speedily disposed of, an effective militia was imbedded and disciplined, and all possible means were resorted to for an increase of revenue. The fines on recusants, the compositions for knighthood, and the various exactions imposed by government, were rigorously enforced by him. At the same time, his hand, though heavy, was equal, and the reports of his government were, in consequence, found to be very various. The complainants contradicted each other. "Your proceeding with the recusants," writes Weston, "is here, where it is well understood, well taken, though there be different rumours; for it is said that you proceed with extreme rigour, valuing the goods and lands of the poorest at the highest rates, or rather above the value, without which you are not content to make any composition. This is not believed, especially by me, who know your wisdom and moderation; and your last, too, gave much satisfaction even to those who informed me, when they saw thereby that you had compounded with none but to their own contentment."* Cottington, the chancellor of the exchequer, had expressed more characteristically, some days before, the approbation of the court. "For the business of the recusants, my lord-treasurer sent immediately your letter to the king (who is in his progress), from whom he received a notable approbation both of your intentions and proceedings, as he himself will tell your lordship in his own letters; for you are his mistress, and must be cherished and courted by none but himself." So early did the king deem it expedient to exhibit that peculiar sense of his minister's service. When the minister had bound himself up inextricably with the royal cause, it was thought to be less expedient!

In such a course as this which Wentworth had now entered on, it is quite clear that to have permitted the slightest disregard of the authority assumed must have proved fatal. I cannot see anything unnatural, therefore, in his conduct to Henry Bellasis, and in several other personal questions which at present come under notice. Nothing is apparent in it at variance with the system to be worked out, nothing outrageous or imprudent, as his party have been at some pains to allege. These matters are not to be discussed in the abstract. Despotism is the gist of the question; and if the phrase "unnatural" is to be used, let it fall upon that. The means employed to enforce it are obliged, as a matter of necessity, to partake of its own nature, or it would not for an instant be borne. One of Wentworth's first measures had been to claim for himself, as the representative of absolute royalty, the most absolute reverence and respect. On the occasion of a "solemn meeting," however, this young man Bellasis, the son of the Lord Faulconberg, manifested a somewhat impertinent disregard of these orders, entered the room without "showing any particular reverence" to the lord-president, remained there with his hat on, and as Wentworth himself passed out of the meeting "with his hat off, the king's mace-bearer before him, and all the rest of the company uncovered, Mr. Bellasis stood with his hat on his head, looking full upon his lordship without stirring his hat, or using any other reverence or civility." In a man of rank, this was the less to be overlooked. Bellasis was ordered before the council board, where he pleaded that his negligence had arisen from accident, that his look was turned the other way, that he was not aware of the lord-president's approach till he had passed, and, finally, that he meant no disrespect to the lord-president's dignity. He was required to express, in addition, his sorrow for having given offence to "Lord Wentworth." He refused to do this; but at last, after a month's imprisonment in the Gate House, was obliged to submit.* Other cases of the same description occurred. A barrister at law, something disaffected to the lord-president's jurisdiction, expiated his offence in a lowly submission on his knees;† and a punishment fell on Sir David Foulis, heavier and more terrible, in proportion to Wentworth's sense of the conduct that had provoked it.

Sir David Foulis was a deputy lieutenant, a justice of the peace, and a member of the council of York. Holding this position in the county, he had, on various occasions, made very disrespectful mention of the council of York; had thrown out several invidious insinuations against its president; and had shown much activity and zeal in instigating persons not to pay the composition for knighthood, which he considered an illegal and oppressive exaction.‡ Wentworth immediately resolved to make him a signal example; and the extraordinary perseverance, and unscrupulous measures, by dint of which he at last secured this, are too singularly illustrative of his character to be passed over in silence. An information was immediately ordered to be exhibited in the Star Chamber against Sir David Foulis; against his son, who had shared in his offence, and against Sir Thomas Layton, the high sheriff of the county, who had sanctioned and assisted the disaffection. Some necessary delays put off the hearing of the cause till after Wentworth's departure to Dublin. But one of the last things with which he busied himself previous to his departure was the making sure of the issue. He wrote from Westminster to the lord-treasurer (one of the judges that were to try it!), who was then in Scotland, "I have perused all the examinations betwixt me and Foulis, and find all the material parts of the bill fully proved, so as I have him soundly upon the hip; but I desire it may not be spoken of, for albeit I may by order of the court see them, yet he and dieth towards us (excuse me for the phrase) like a snuff unmannerly left in a corner."—Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 49.

* See the proceedings before the council board, Rushworth, vol. ii., p. 88. † See Rushworth, vol. ii., p. 160.

‡ Foulis had, in less important matters, equally sought to baffle the authority of the lord-president. I find the following passage in a letter to Wentworth, from Sir William Pennyman, one of his watchful retainers: "There was a constable under Sir David Foulis (who, by reason of some just excuse, as was pretended, appeared not) that refused to pay twelve pence to Captain Philips, and it was thus discovered. I bid one of the townsmen lay down twelve pence, and the constable should pay him again. He answered, That the constable told him, that Sir David Foulis had commanded him, that if any were demanded he should pay none; and of this I thought it but my part to acquaint your lordship; not that I would aggravate anything against Sir David Foulis, for it might only be some misprision in the constable, but that your lordship might know of the least passage which may have relation or reflection upon yourself."

* Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 52.

may not, till the end of the next term."* Weston did not receive this hint at first very cordially; but Cottington, another of the judges, wrote to him a week or two after he had quitted London. "We say here that your lordship's cause against Foulis shall come to hearing this term, and I inquire much after it." Wentworth, though then much distracted by sickness and affairs, acted eagerly on this intimation, and sent over a special messenger to Cottington, with a short brief of the strong points of the case, written out by himself, and an extremely characteristic letter. He says boldly, "I must wholly recommend myself to your care of me in this, which I take to concern me as much, and to have therein as much the better, as I ever had in any other cause all the days of my life; so I trust a little help will serve the turn." It is clear, in point of fact, that Wentworth felt that much of his authority, in so far as personal claims sustained it—or, in other words, that much of his probable success or non-success in the new and desperate assumptions by which alone his schemes of government could be carried on—was concerned in the extent of punishment awarded in the present case, and the corresponding impression likely to be created. He omits no consideration in his letter, therefore, that is in any way likely to influence Cottington. He points out particularly how much the "king's service" is concerned, and that the arrow was "shot at him" in reality. "The sentencing of this man," he continues, "settles the right of knighting business bravely for the crown, for in your sentence you will certainly declare the undoubted right and prerogative the king hath therein by common law, statute law, and the undeniable practice of all times; and therefore I am a suitor by you to his majesty, that he would be graciously pleased to recommend the cause to the lords, as well in his own right as in the right of his absent poor servant, and to wish them all to be there. You are like to beget the sentence, and I will be bold to tell you my opinion thereon. You have been pleased sometimes, as I sat by you, to ask me my conceit upon the cause then before us; admit me now to do it upon my own cause, for, by my troth, I will do it as clearly as if it concerned me not." An aggravation of every point in the case against Foulis and his son follows, with a curious citation of a number of precedents for a heavy punishment, and a strong personal appeal in behalf of his own character. "Much more I could say, if I were in the Star Chamber to speak in such a cause for my Lord Cottington; but I will conclude with this, that I protest to God, if it were in the person of another, I should in a cause so foul, the proof so clear, fine the father and the son, Sir David and Henry Foulis, in £2000 apiece to his majesty, and in £2000 apiece damages to myself for their scandal; and they both to be sent down to York, and there publicly, at York assizes next, to acknowledge, in the face of the whole country, the right his majesty hath to that duty of knightings, as also the wrong he hath done me; humbly craving pardon of his majesty, and expressing his sorrow so to have misrepresented his majesty's most gracious proceedings, even in that course of compounding where the law would have given him much more, as also for so falsely slandering and belying me without a cause. For Sir Thomas Layton, he is a fool, led on by the nose by the two former, nor was I willing to do him any hurt; and so let him go for a coxcomb as he is; and when he comes home, tell his neighbours it was well for him he had less wit than his fellows."* As the hearing approached more nearly, Wentworth, regardless of the equivocal reception Weston had formerly given him, wrote again to the lord-treasurer. "My lord, I have to be heard this term a cause between Sir David Foulis and me in the Star Chamber, and a very good one, if I flatter not myself exceedingly: I do most earnestly beseech your lordship's presence, and that I may taste of the ordinary effects of your justice and favour towards me your faithful servant, albeit here removed in another kingdom."† Scarcely a member of that considerate court did he fail to solicit as earnestly.

How could the honest judges fail to perform all that had been so asked of them? Foulis was degraded from his various offices; fined £5000 to the king, £3000 to Wentworth; condemned to make a public acknowledgment of the most abject submissiveness "to his majesty and the Lord-viscount Wentworth, not only in this court, but in the court of York, and likewise at the open assizes in the same county;" and finally committed to the Fleet during his majesty's pleasure. His son was also imprisoned and heavily fined. Layton, the "fool," was presented with his acquittal. Wentworth's gratitude at this result overflowed in the most fervent expressions to his serviceable friends. Cottington was warmly thanked. "Such are your continued favours towards me," he wrote to Laud, "which you were pleased to manifest so far in the Star Chamber in that cause betwixt Sir David Foulis and me, not only by your justice, but by your affection too, as indeed, my lord, the best and greatest return I can make is to pray I may be able to deserve," &c. A long despatch to Cooke included an expression of the "obligation put upon me by the care you expressed for me in a suit this last term, which came to a hearing in the Star Chamber, betwixt Sir D. Foulis and me, and of the testimony your affection there gave me, much above my merit. Sir, I humbly thank you," &c., &c. A still more important and weighty despatch to Weston closed with, "I do most humbly thank your lordship for your noble presence and justice in the Star Chamber, being the business indeed, in my own estimation, which more concerned me than any that ever befel me hitherto in my whole life." And to his cousin the Earl of Cleveland he thus expressed himself: "I understand my cause in the Star Chamber hath had a fair evening, for which I am ever to acknowledge and reverence the justice of that great court to an absent man. Your lordship hath still been pleased to honour me with your presence when anything concerned me there; and believe me, if ever I be absent from the place where I may serve you, it shall be most extremely against my will. I see it must still be my fortune to work it out in a storm, and I find not myself yet so faint as to give over for that, or to abandon a good cause, be the wind never so loud or sour." One characteristic circumstance remains to be added. All the various letters and despatches in which the passages I have quoted are to be found, together with others to various noble lords, bear the same date.* No one of those who had served Wentworth was left to speak of thanks that he only had received.†

* Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 145, 146. A more remarkable opportunity was reserved for him, on the occasion of his own impeachment, to express his contempt of this Sir Thomas Layton. See Rushworth, vol. viii., p. 151.

† Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 143.

* Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 91.

In relief from this painful exhibition of a false public principle tyrannizing over private morals and affections, I turn to present the somewhat redeeming aspect of those uncontrolled regards which Wentworth could yet suffer himself to indulge. In consequence of incessant application to the duties of his office, he was now able to pass little of his time at the family seat; but he seems to have been anxious that his children, William and the little Lady Anne, should, for health's sake, continue to reside there. He had intrusted them, accordingly, to the charge of Sir William Pennyman, a person bound to his service by various strong obligations.‡ The Lady Arabella, then on the eve of confinement, remained with Wentworth. Pennyman appears to have had careful instructions to write constant accounts of the children, and it is interesting to observe the sort of details that were thought likely to prove most welcome to their father. "Now," he says, "to write that news that I have, which I presume will be most acceptable, your lordship's children are all very well, and your lordship need not fear the going forward of your building, when you have so careful a steward as Mrs. Anne. She complained to me very much of two rainy days, which, as she said, hindered her from coming down, and the building from going up, because she was enforced to keep her chamber, and could not overlook the workmen."* This important little maiden, then between three and four years old, had certainly inherited the spirit of the Wentworths. "Mr. William and Mrs. Anne," Pennyman writes on another occasion, "are very well. They were not a little glad to receive their tokens, and yet they said they would be more glad to receive your lordship and their worthy mother. We all, with one vote, agreed in their opinion, and wished that your lordship's occasions might be as swift and speedy in their despatch as our thoughts and desires are in wishing them."† At the commencement of 1631, Wentworth's second son was born. This child, Thomas Wentworth, after eight months of uncertain health, died. At about this time the services of the lord-president seem to have been urgently required in London, and Weston wrote to him entreating his immediate presence.‡ The health of the Lady Arabella, however, who was again near the period of confinement, was now an object of deep anxiety to Wentworth, and he remained with her in Yorkshire. In October, a second daughter, the young Arabella, was born to him, and within the same month, on a Tuesday morning, says Radcliffe, "his dear wife, the Lady Arabella, died.§ I took this earl out of bed, and carried him to receive his last blessing from her."|| Wentworth deeply felt her loss, and never, at any time, through his after life, recalled her beauty, her accomplishments, or her virtue, without the most tender enthusiasm.¶

Some days after this sad event, Wentworth received intelligence from his friend and relation, Sir Edward Stanhope, of certain intrigues which, during his absence, had been moving against him in the court at London. "I received your letter," he writes back, "by which I perceive you have me in memory, albeit God hath taken from me your noblest cousin, the incomparable woman and wife my eyes shall ever behold. I must confess this kindness works with me much." After some allusions to Stanhope's intelligence, he proceeds: "Yet truly I cannot believe so ill of the propounders,

* See the Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 189, 194, 202, 204, &c., &c.

† I may conclude the mention of this Foulis affair by quoting a characteristic note from one of Wentworth's voluminous private despatches to the Rev. Mr. Greenwood. After instructions of various sorts respecting his personal affairs in Yorkshire, which occupy eight closely-printed folio pages, the lord-deputy subjoins: "One word more I must of necessity mention, that is, the business betwixt me and Sir David Foulis. How this stands I know not; but I pray you inform yourself what lands I have received the rents of by virtue of the extent, and what money Richard Marris has received towards my £3000 damages and costs of suit; and that you will cause a perfect and half year's account to be kept of all the disbursements and receipts concerning this matter in a book precisely by itself. I beseech you set this business in a clear and certain course, for you may be sure, if any advantage or doubt can be raised, I shall be sure to hear of it."—Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 488. Letter from Dublin, dated Nov. 1635.

‡ His friends were constantly, but vainly, warning him of the dangers he incurred by this. "I long," writes his friend Mainwaring to him, "to hear of my lady's safe delivery, and of your lordship's coming up. . . Your lordship must give me leave to put you in mind of your health, for I hear you take no recreation at all."—Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 54.

§ This person afterward played his part at the impeachment. It may be worth while to quote a passage from one of his letters, written at the period referred to in the text, in illustration of the means which Wentworth employed to engage, as deeply as possible, the devotion of men who promised to be useful to him. "For my own part," writes Pennyman to the lord-president, "I hope shortly to pay my composition, and I wish I could as easily satisfy your debt, and compound with your lordship, as I can with the king. But it is a thing impossible. My best way, I think, is to do like the painter, who, when, after a great deal of pains, he could not describe the infinite sorrow of a weeping father, presented him on a table with his face covered, that the spectators might imagine that sorrow which he was not able to express. My debt, like his sorrow, is not to be described, much less my thanks and acknowledgments. Yet give me leave to tell your lordship that there is not one alive that more honours you than your lordship's most faithful and indebted servant."—Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 56.

* Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 55.

† Ibid., p. 57.

‡ "I hope," writes the lord-treasurer, "this bearer will find you well, well disposed, and the better, enduring so prudently as I hear you do, the loss of your younger son. We are glad here to hear you are in so good a temper, and that you receive it as a seasoning of human felicity, which God often sends where he loves best; but you need none of my philosophy; and therefore this is only to remember you of being here in the beginning of the term, according to your promise, and I entreat you to think it necessary to make haste. We want you now for your counsel and help in many things."—Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 58.

§ Essay. Mr. Mac Diarmid and other writers have fallen into the error of supposing that she died after the birth of the last boy.

|| Radcliffe here alludes, "by this earl," to the boy William, who was Earl of Strafford when his essay was written. Mr. Brodie whimsically turns it into Sir George Ratcliffe carrying Wentworth himself out of bed to receive his wife's last blessing.—Brit. Emp., vol. iii., p. 129.

¶ [She left him with three children—William, who in 1665 was restored to his father's titles; Anne, married to Edward Watson, Earl of Rockingham; and Arabella, married to John McCarthy, Viscount Mountcashel, in Ireland.—C.]

both because in my own nature I am the man least suspicious alive, and that my heart tells me I never deserved but well of them—indeed, passing well. It is impossible it should be plotted for my ruin; sure at least impossible I can think so; and if there can be such mischief in the world, then is this confidence given me as a snare by God to punish me for my sins yet farther, and to draw me yet more immediately and singly to look up to him, without leaving me anything below to trust or look to. The worst, sure, that can be is, with honour, profit, and contentment, to set me a little farther off from treading upon anything themselves desire; which granted, I am at the height of my ambitions, brought home to enjoy myself and friends, to leave my estate free and plentiful to your little cousin, and which is more than all this, quietly and in secret to serve my Maker, to commune with him more frequently, more profitably, I trust, for my soul than formerly.”*

Of short duration was this composed attitude of mind! The ink was scarcely dry upon his letter when he reappeared in his court at York, pursued with startling energy some of his most resolute measures, and reassured his master in London of the invaluable nature of his services by sundry swellings of the royal revenue. Money, the main nerve that was to uphold the projected system, was still the grand object of Wentworth's care, and money he sent to Charles. The revenue, which, on his succeeding to the presidency of York, he had found no more in amount than £2000 a year, he had already raised to an annual return of £9500.†

Still, however, intriguers were busy against him, and a rumour was conveyed by them to Weston's ear that he had resolved to use his notoriously growing influence with the king to endeavour to win for himself the staff of the lord-treasurer. The trusty Wandesford discovered this, and despatched the intelligence to Wentworth. The next courier from Yorkshire brought a packet to Weston. “Let shame and confusion then cover me,” ran the characteristic letter it enclosed, “if I do not abhor the intolerable anxiety I well understand to wait inseparably upon that staff, if I should not take a serpent as soon into my bosom, and—if I once find so mean a thought of me can enter into your heart, as that to compass whatever I could take most delight in, I should go about beguilefully to supplant any ordinary man (how much more, then, impotently to catch at such a staff, and from my lord-treasurer!)—if I leave not the court instantly, betake myself to my private fortune, reposedly seek my contentment and quiet within my own doors, and follow the dictamen of my own reason and conscience, more according to nature and liberty than in those gyves which now pinch and hang upon me. Thus you see how easily you may be rid of me when you list, and, in good faith, with a thousand thanks: yet be pleased not to judge this proceeds out of any wayward weary humour in me neither, for my endeavours are as vigorous and as cheerful to serve the crown and you as ever they were, nor shall you ever find them to faint or flasquer. I am none of those soft-tempered spirits; but I cannot endure to be mistaken, or suffer my purer and more entire affections to be soiled, or in the least degree prejudiced, with the loathsome and odious attributes of covetousness and ambitious falsehood. Do me but right in this. Judge my watches to issue (as in faith they do) from clearer cisterns. I lay my hand under your foot, I despise danger, I laugh at labour. Command me in all difficulties, in all confidence, in all readiness. No, no, my lord,” continued Wentworth, lapsing into the philosophic tone he could assume so well, “No, no, my lord! they are those sovereign and great duties I owe his majesty and your lordship, which thus provoke me beyond my own nature rather to leave those cooler shades, wherein I took choicest pleasure, and thus put myself with you into the heat of the day, than poorly and meanly to start aside from my obligations, convinced in myself of the most wretched ingratitude in the whole world. God knows how little delight I take in the outwards of this life, how infinitely ill satisfied I am with myself, to find daily those calm and quiet retirements, wherein to contemplate some things more divine and sacred than this world can afford us, at every moment interrupted through the importunity of the affairs I have already. To heaven and earth I protest it, it grieves my very soul!”* Weston's suspicions, which, had he known Wentworth better, would never for a moment have been entertained, could not but sink before such language as this; and the lord-president's speedy arrival in London exploded every hostile attempt that still lingered about the court against him.

Charles was now remodelling his counsels. The extraordinary success of Wentworth's northern presidency had inspired him with new hopes; his coffers had been filled without the hated help of the House of Commons; and that prospect of independent authority which he earnestly entertained, no longer seemed distant or hopeless. A conclusion of peace with France and Spain favoured the attempt. He offered Lord Wentworth the government of Ireland. His favourite scheme was to deliver up the three divisions of the kingdom to the superintendence of three favourite ministers, reserving to himself a general and not inactive control over all. Laud was the minister for England, and the affairs of Scotland were in the hands of the Marquess of Hamilton. Ireland, accepted by Wentworth, completed the proposed plan.

The condition of Ireland, at this moment, was in the highest degree difficult and dangerous. From the conquest of Henry the Second up to the government of Essex and Montjoy, her history had been a series of barbarous disasters. The English settlers, in a succession of ferocious conflicts, had depraved themselves below the level of the uncivilized Irish; for, instead of diffusing improvement and civilization, they had obstructed both. The system of government was, in consequence, become the mere occasional and discretionary calling of a Parliament by the lord-deputy for the time, composed entirely of delegates from within the English pale, whose duty began and closed in the sanctioning some new act of oppression, or the screening some new offender from punishment. One glimpse of a more beneficial purpose broke upon Ireland in the reign of Henry the Seventh, during the government of Sir Edward Poynings, who procured a decree from the Parliament, that all the laws theretofore enacted in England should have equal force in Ireland. With the determination of destroying, at the same time, the discretionary power that had been used, of summoning and dismissing Parliaments at pleasure, and of passing sudden laws for the purpose of occasional oppressions, Sir Edward Poynings procured the enactment of his famous bill, that a Parliament should not be summoned above once a year in Ireland, nor even then, till the propositions on which it was to decide had been seen and approved by the privy council of England. But the native Irish chiefs had been too fiercely hardened in their savage distrust of the English to reap any advantage from these measures. They retreated to their fastnesses, and only left them to cover the frontier with outrage and bloodshed.

* Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 61. † Ibid., p. 89, 90.

* Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 79, 80.

Lord Montjoy at last subdued them, released the peasantry from their control, and framed a plan of impartial government. In the course of the ensuing reign new settlements of English were accordingly formed, the rude Irish customs were discontinued, the laws of England everywhere enforced, courts of judicature established after the English model, and representatives from every part of the kingdom summoned to the Parliament. When England herself, however, began to groan under oppressions, Ireland felt them still more heavily, and was flung back with a greater shock. The arbitrary decrees of Charles's privy council, military exactions, and martial law, were strangling the liberties of Ireland in their very birth. Bitter, too, in its aggravation of other grievances, was Irish theological discord. The large majority of Papists, the sturdy old Protestants of the Pale, the new settlers of James, Presbyterians, and Puritans, all were in nearly open warfare, and the penalties enforced against recusants were equally hateful to all. The rigour of the Church courts, and the exaction of tithes, kept up these discontents by constant exasperation.

Such was the state of affairs when Charles sent Lord Falkland to Dublin. His lordship soon found that his government was little more than the name of one. The army had gradually sunk to 1350 foot and 200 horse; which mean force, divided into companies, was commanded by privy counsellors, who, managing to secure their own pay out of the receipts of the exchequer, compounded with the privates for a third or fourth part of the government allowance! Insignificant in numbers, such management had rendered the soldiers ten times more inefficient, and, utterly wanting in spirit or conduct, often, indeed, the mere menial servants of the officers, they excited only contempt. Over and over again Lord Falkland detailed this state of things to Charles, and prayed for assistance; but the difficulties in England, and the deficiencies in the Irish revenue, united to withhold it. At last, however, warned by imminent dangers that threatened, the king announced his resolution to augment the Irish forces to 5000 foot and 500 horse, and, unable to supply the necessary charge from an empty treasury, he commanded the new levies to be quartered on the different towns and counties, each of which was to receive a certain portion of the troops, for three months in turn, and to supply them with the required necessaries. Alarmed by this project—and justly considering a great present sacrifice, with some chance of profit, better than to be burdened with a tax of horrible uncertainty, which yet gave them no reasonable reliance for the future—the Irish people instantly offered the king a liberal voluntary contribution, on condition of the redress of certain grievances. Catholics and Protestants concurred in this, and delegates from both parties laid the proposal before the king himself, in London. The money they offered first, in the shape of a voluntary contribution of £100,000, the largest sum ever yet returned by Ireland, and to be paid by instalments of £10,000 a quarter. Their list of grievances they produced next, desiring relief from the exactions of courts of justice, from military depredations, from trade monopolies, from the religious penal statutes, from retrospective inquiries into defective titles beyond a period of sixty years,* and finally praying that the concessions should be confirmed by an Irish Parliament. Some of these conditions were intolerable to Charles. A Parliament was at all times hateful to him, and scarcely less convenient than the absence of Parliaments, to a prince who desired to be absolute; was the privilege of increasing the royal revenue, and obliging the minions of royalty, by discovering old flaws in titles. Glorious had been the opportunity of escheating large possessions to the crown, or of passing them over to new proprietors! Yet here was a present offer of money—an advantage not to be foreborne; whereas, so convenient was Charles's moral code, an assent to obnoxious matters was a thing to be withdrawn at the first convenient opportunity, and evaded at any time. The "graces," as the concessions were called, were accordingly promised to be acceded to; instalments of the money were paid; and writs were issued by Lord Falkland for a Parliament.

The joyful anticipations raised in consequence soon received a check. The writs were declared void by the English council, in consequence of the provisions of Poynings's law† not having been attended to by Lord Falkland, who was proved to have issued the writs on his own authority, without having previously transmitted to England a certificate of the laws to be brought forward in the proposed Parliament, with reasons for enacting them, and then, as he ought to have done, waited for his majesty's license of permission under the great seal. Still the people thought this a casual error, and they waited in confidence of its remedy. The Roman Catholic party, meanwhile, encouraged by the favourable reception of their delegates at court, and elated by a confidence of protection from the queen, proceeded to act at once in open de-

* It had been usual to dispossess proprietors of estates for defects in their tenures as old as the original conquest of Ireland! No man was secure at his own hearth-stone. See Leland, vol. ii., p. 466-468.

† These provisions had received additional ratification by subsequent statutes, the 3d and 4th of Philip and Mary.

nance of the penal statutes. They seized churches for their own worship, thronged the streets of Dublin with their processions, erected an academy for the religious instruction of their youth, and re-enforced their clergy by supplies of young priests from the colleges of France and Spain. The extreme alarm of the Protestants at these manifestations induced Lord Falkland at last to issue a proclamation, prohibiting the Roman Catholic clergy from exercising any control over the people, and from celebrating their worship in public. The Roman Catholics, incensed at this step, now clamoured for the promised graces and Parliament; the Protestants had too many reasons to join them in the demand; and both parties united in declaring that payment of the contribution, under present circumstances, was an intolerable burden. In vain Lord Falkland offered to accept the payment in instalments of £5000 instead of £10,000 a year; the discontents daily increased, and, in the end, drove the lord-deputy from power. Lord Falkland, the object of censure that should have fallen elsewhere, returned to England.

A temporary administration, consisting of two lords-justices—the one, Lord-chancellor Viscount Ely, and the other, Lord-high-treasurer the Earl of Cork—was formed. Both these noblemen were zealously opposed to the Roman Catholics, and instantly, without waiting the king's orders, commenced a rigorous execution of the penal statutes against recusants. An intimation from England of the royal displeasure threw some shadow over these proceedings, but not till the opposition they had strengthened had succeeded in suppressing the academy and religious houses which had been erected by the Roman Catholics in Dublin. To complete the difficulties of the present state of affairs, the termination of the voluntary contribution now fast approached, and the temper of all parties left any hope of its renewal more than desperate.

Imminent, then, was the danger which now beset the government of Ireland. Without the advantage of internal strength, it had no prospect of external aid. The treasury in England could not afford a farthing to increase the army; the money designed for that purpose had been swallowed up in more immediate necessities, and the army sank daily into the most miserable inefficiency. Voluntary supply was out of the question, and compulsory exactions, without the help of soldiers, still more ridiculously vain. In the genius of the lord-president of the North, Charles had one hope remaining.*

Wentworth received his commission in the early months of 1632. He resolved to defer his departure, however, till he had informed himself fully of the state of his government, and fortified himself with all the authorities that should be needful. The energy, the prudence, the various powers of resource with which he laboured to this end, are only to be appreciated by an examination of the original documents, which still remain in evidence of all.* They were most extraordinary. The first thing he did was to procure an order from the king in restriction of the authority of the government of lords-justices during his own absence from Dublin.† In answer, then, to various elaborate congratulations from the officers of the Irish government, he sent back cold, but peremptory requests for information of their various departments. The treasury necessities, and means of supply, were his primary care. The lords-justices declared that the only possible resource, in that respect, was to levy rigorously the penalties imposed by statute on the Roman Catholics for absence from public worship. The cabinet in London, powerless of expedient, saw no chance of avoiding this, when Lord Cottington received from York one of Wentworth's vigorous despatches.

"Now, my lord," reasoned the new lord-deputy, "I am not ignorant that what hath been may happen out again, and how much every good Englishman ought, as well in reason of state as conscience, to desire that kingdom were well reduced to conformity of religion with us here—as, indeed, shutting up the postern gate, hitherto open to many a dangerous inconvenience and mischief, which have over-lately laid too near us, exhausted our treasures, consumed our men, busied the perplexed minds of her late majesty and all her ministers. Yet, my lord, it is a great business, hath many a root lying deep, and far within ground, which would be first thoroughly opened before we judge what height it may shoot up unto, when it shall feel itself once struck at, to be loosened and pulled up; nor, at this distance, can I advise it should be at all attempted, until the payment for the king's army be elsewhere and surer settled than either upon the voluntary gift of the subjects, or upon the casual income of the twelvemonth a Sunday. Before this fruit grows ripe for gathering, the army must not live præcario, fetching in every morsel of bread upon their swords' point. Nor will I so far ground myself with an implicit faith upon the all-foreseeing providence of the Earl of Cork as to receive the contrary opinion from him in verbo magistri, when I am sure that if such a rush as this should set that kingdom in pieces again, I must be the man that am like to bear the heat of the day, and to be also accountable for the success, not he. Blame me not, then, where it concerns me so nearly, both in honour and safety, if I much rather desire to hold it in suspense, and to be at liberty upon the place to make my own election, than thus be closed up by the choice and admission of strangers, whom I know not how they stand affected either to me or the king's service. Therefore let me beseech you to consult this business seriously with his majesty and with my lord-treasurer. Admit me here, with all submission, to express myself upon this point ; and finally, be pleased to draw it to some present resolution, which, the shortness of time considered, must instantly be put in action. I do conceive, then, what difficulties—nay, what impossibility soever the council of Ireland hath pretended, that it is a very easy work to continue the contribution upon the country for a year longer, which will be of infinite advantage to his majesty's affairs ; for, we look very ill about us if in that time we find not the means either to establish that revenue in the crown, or raise some other equivalent thereunto. And this we gain, too, without hazarding the public peace of the subject by any new apprehensions, which commonly accompany such fresh undertakings, especially being so general as is the twelvemonth upon the absentees.* The despatch then went on to suggest that the very representations of the lords-justices might be used for the purpose of dispensing with their propositions, and to draw out, for the instruction of the council, a succinct plan of effecting this.*

* See the Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 61-97.

† Ibid., p. 63. After intimating to the lords-justices Wentworth's appointment, the royal order proceeds: "We have, therefore, in the mean time, thought fit hereby to require you not to pass any pardons, offices, lands, or church livings by grant under our great seal of that our kingdom, nor to confer the honour of knighthood upon any, or to dispose of any company of horse or foot there; only you are required in this interim to look to the ordinary administration of civil justice, and to the good government of our subjects and army there."

* Ample authorities for this rapid summary of Irish affairs will be found in Leland's History, vol. ii., p. 107, to the end, and vol. iii., p. 1-10, edition of 1733. I have also availed myself of Mr. MacDiarmid's account, Lives of British Statesmen, vol. ii., p. 125-135.

Distrustful, notwithstanding, of the energy of Cottington and his associates, Wentworth followed his despatch in person, arrived in London,† prevailed with the council to enter into his design, and had a letter immediately sent off to the lords-justices, bitterly complaining of all the evils they had set forth, of the impossibility of raising voluntary supplies, and the consequent necessity of exacting the penalties. "Seeing," added the king, by Wentworth's dictation, "seeing you conceive there is so much difficulty in the settlement of the payments, and considering the small hopes you mention in your letters of farther improvement there, we must be constrained, if they be not freely and thankfully continued, to strengthen our former graces vouchsafed during those contributions, and make use more strictly of our legal rights and profits to be employed for so good and necessary a work." Leaving this letter, with other secret instructions, to work their effects, Wentworth next despatched a private and confidential agent to Ireland, himself a Roman Catholic, to represent to his brethren personally and in secret the lord-deputy's regard for them, his willingness to act as a mediator, and his hope that a moderate voluntary contribution might be accepted in release of their heavy fines ; in one word, he sent this person "a little to feel their pulse under-hand."‡ "The instrument I employed," Wentworth afterward wrote to Cottington, "was himself a Papist, and knows no other than that the resolution of the state here is set upon that course [of exacting the recusant fines], and that I do this privately, in favour and well-wishing, to divert the present storm, which else would fall heavy upon them all, being a thing framed and prosecuted by the Earl of Cork, which makes the man labour it in good earnest, taking it to be a cause pro aris et focis." The first thing this agent discovered and communicated to his employer was that his temporary representatives, the lords-justices, were seeking to counteract his purpose, and had utterly neglected the instructions of the last letter that had been despatched to them from the king. With characteristic energy, Wentworth seized this incident for a double purpose of advantage.

There would be little hazard in supposing that their lordships of Ely and Cork were indebted to the extraordinary letter, from which I shall quote the opening passages, for the strongest sensation their official lives had known. "Your lordships," wrote Wentworth, "heretofore received a letter from his majesty, directed to yourselves alone, of the 14th April last ; a letter of exceeding much weight and consequence ; a letter most weightily and maturely consulted, and ordered by his majesty himself ; a letter that your lordships were expressly appointed you should presently cause to be entered in the council book, and also in the signet office ; to the end there might be public and uniform notice taken of his majesty's pleasure so signified by all his ministers, and others there, whom it might concern. How is it, then, that I understand this letter hath, by your lordships' order, lain ever since (and still doth, for anything I know) sealed up in silence at the council table ! Not once published or entered, as was precisely directed, and expected from your lordships ! copies denied to all men ! and yet not so much as the least reason or colour certified over hither for your neglect, or (to term it more mildly) forbearance to comply with his majesty's directions in that behalf ! Believe me, my lords, I fear this will not be well taken if it come to be known on this side, and in itself lies open enough to very hard and ill construction, reflecting and trenching deeper than at first may be apprehended. And pardon me, my lords, if in the discharge of my own duty I be transported beyond my natural modesty and moderation, and the respects I personally bear your lordships, plainly to let you know I shall not connive at such a presumption in you thus to evacuate my master's directions, nor contain myself in silence, seeing them before my face so slighted, or at least laid aside, it seems, very little regarded. Therefore I must, in a just contemplation of his majesty's honour and wisdom, crave leave to advise you forthwith to mend your error by entering and publishing that letter as is commanded you, or I must, for my own safety, acquaint his majesty with all ; and I pray God the keeping it close all this while be not, in the sequel, imputed unto you as a mighty disservice to his majesty, and which you may be highly answerable for."* The next communication from his popish agent informed Wentworth that the omissions complained of had been repaired, and, farther, that all parties had agreed to "continue on the contribution as now it is," till his coming. The deputy was thus left to complete, without embarrassment, his already meditated financial projects ; and the lords-justices, with their friends, had leisure to consider, and amene themselves to, the new and most peremptory lord who was shortly to appear among them !

Ireland was hereafter to be the scene of an absolute government—the government of a

* See Stafford papers, vol. i., p. 75-77.

† This is evident from a subsequent despatch to Cottington, in which he reminds him that the resolution I am about to describe was taken finally "in presence of the treasurer, your lordship, the Secretary Cooke, and myself."—Vol. i., p. 74.

‡ See Stafford Papers, vol. i., p. 73, 74.

* Stafford Papers, vol. i., p. 77

comprehensive mind, but directed to a narrow and mistaken purpose. The first grand object of Wentworth's exertions was to be accomplished in rendering the king's power uncontrollable. Beyond this, other schemes arose. The natural advantages of Ireland, worked to the purpose of her own revenue, might be farther pressed to the aid of the English treasury; and a scheme of absolute power successfully established in Ireland, promised still greater service to the Royalist side in the English struggle.

The union of singular capacity with the most determined vigour which characterized every present movement of Wentworth, while it already, in itself, seemed a forecast of vast though indefinite success, left the king no objection to urge against any of the powers he demanded. The following stipulations were at once assented to. They are all characteristic of Wentworth, of his sagacity no less than his ambition. They open with the evident assumption that the debts of the Irish establishment will soon be settled, and with consequent cautious exceptions against the rapacity of those numerous courtiers, who waited, as Wentworth well knew, to pounce upon the first vacant office, or even the first vacant shilling. The lord-deputy demanded, "That his majesty may declare his express pleasure, that no Irish suit, by way of reward, be moved for by any of his servants, or others, before the ordinary revenue there become able to sustain the necessary charge of that crown, and the debts thereof be fully cleared. That there be an express caveat entered with the secretaries, signet, privy seal, and great seal here; that no grant, of what nature soever, concerning Ireland, be suffered to pass till the deputy be made acquainted, and it hath first passed the great seal of that kingdom, according to the usual manner. That his majesty signify his pleasure that especial care be taken hereafter that sufficient and credible persons be chosen to supply such bishoprics as shall fall void, to be admitted of his privy council, to sit as judges, and serve of his learned council there; that he will vouchsafe to hear the advice of his deputy before he resolve of any in these cases; and that the deputy be commanded to inform his majesty truly and impartially of every man's particular diligence and care in his service there, to the end his majesty may timely and graciously reward the well deserving, by calling them home to better preferences here. That no particular complaint of injustice or oppression be admitted here against any, unless it appear the party made his first address to the deputy. That no confirmation of any reversion of offices within that kingdom be had, or any new grant of a reversion hereafter to pass. That no new office be erected within that kingdom before such time as the deputy be therewith acquainted, his opinion first required, and certified back accordingly. That the places in the deputy's gift, as well of the civil as the martial list, be left freely to his dispose; and that his majesty will be graciously pleased not to pass them to any upon suit made unto him here."*

* I have already alluded to the limitation under which this proposition was acceded to by the king. Charles was

Lord Wentworth farther required and obtained, in the shape of supplementary private propositions, the following:

"That all propositions moving from the deputy touching matters of revenue may be directed to the lord-treasurer of England, without acquainting the rest of the committee for Irish affairs.* That the address of all other despatches for that kingdom be, by special direction of his majesty, applied to one of the secretaries singly.† That the Lord-viscount Falkland be required to deliver in writing in what condition he conceives his majesty's revenue and the government of that kingdom now stand, together with a particular of such designs for advancing his majesty's service as were either unbegun or unperfected by him when he left the place, as also his advice how they may be best pursued and effected."

Not even content with these vast and extraordinary powers and precautions, Lord Wentworth engaged for another condition—the most potent and remarkable of all—that he was to consider them changeable on the spot whenever the advancement of his majesty's affairs required. "Your lordship may rest assured," writes Secretary Cooke, "that no mediation shall prevail with his majesty to exempt the Lord Balfour from the rest of the opposers of the contributions, but that he will be left with the rest to the censure of your justice. And I am persuaded, that in this and all the rest of your proceedings for his service, his princely resolution will support you, if the rest of your friends here do their duties in their true representation thereof unto him. As your speedy passage for Ireland is most necessary for that government, so your safety concerneth his majesty's honour no less than your own. It is therefore found reasonable that you expect Captain Plumleigh, who, with this fair weather, will come about in a short time, (so as it may be hoped) he will prevent your coming to that port, where you appoint to come aboard. Your instructions (as you know), as well as the establishment, are changeable upon occasions for advancement of the affairs. And as you will be careful not to change without cause, so, when you find it necessary, his majesty will conform them by his wisdom to that he findeth fit upon your advice. For my service in anything that may tend to farther your noble ends, besides the duty of my place and trust, the confidence you repose in me, and the testimony you give thereof, are so obligatory, that I must forget myself much if you find not my professions made good. For the Yorkshire business, in the castigation of those mad men and fools‡ to make the grants conditionally to the applicants, and Wentworth was to concede or refuse them, as the good of the service required. "Yet so too," stipulated the king, "as I may have thanks howsoever; that if there be anything to be denied, you may do it, not I."—Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 140.

* Reasons are subjoined to each proposition. As a specimen, I quote from the few lines appended to the above: "Thus shall his majesty's profits go more stilly and speedily to their ends without being unseasonably vented as they pass along; and the deputy not only preserved, but encouraged to deliver his opinion freely and plainly upon all occasions, when he is assured to have it kept secret, and in few and safe hands."

† "This I will have done by Secretary Cooke," so written by the king himself upon the original paper.

‡ These "mad men and fools" were "Sir John Bouchier which are so apt to fall upon you, that course which yourself, the Lord Cottington, and Mr. Attorney resolve upon, is here also taken, that prosecution may be made in both courts. I find your vice-president a young man of good understanding and counsellable, and very forward to promote his majesty's service.* The secretary is also a discreet, well-tempered man."†

Wentworth, notwithstanding his new dignities, had resolved not to resign the presidency of Yorkshire. And here we see, in the midst of his extraordinary preparations for his Irish government, he had yet found time to prosecute every necessary measure that had a view to the security of his old powers in the North. We gather from this letter of the secretary their general character. He celebrated his departure by some acts of vigorous power, and he wrung from the council of London such amplifications even of his large and unusual presidential commission as might compensate for the failure of personal influence and energy consequent on his own departure.‡ He and his complices," who soon received their most unjust judgment. This passage will serve to prove the value of Wentworth's answer to this matter, also urged against him afterward on his impeachment. "For the sentence against Sir John Bouchier, the defendant was not at all acquainted with it, being then in Ireland"—See Rushworth, vol. ii., p. 161. It is to be observed, at the same time, that the Commons had not the advantage of the present evidence.

* Edward Osborne had been finally chosen by Wentworth. A passage in the following extract from a letter of Sir William Pennyman's shows that the latter had been previously thought of for the office: "My servant can best satisfy your lordship of the good health of Mr. William and Mrs. Anne, for he saw them both before his journey; they have been very well, and I trust will continue so. I am most willing—I wish I could say able too—to be your lordship's vice-president, but the defect of this must be supplied with the surplusage of the other."

† Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 93. The allusion to Lord Balfour, with which the above despatch opens, requires explanation. Wentworth, who had already possessed himself of the most intimate knowledge of the state of parties and disputes in his new government, had written thus some days before to Cooke: "I have sent here likewise unto you a letter from the lords-justices, together with all the examinations taken of the Lord Balfour, and the rest which refused the contribution in the county of Fermanagh, by all which you will find plainly how busy the sheriff and Sir William Cole have been in mutinying the country against the king's service; and I beseech you acquaint his majesty therewithal, and for the rest leave it to me when I come on the other side, and believe me, I will teach both them and others better grounds of duty and obedience to his majesty than they have shown in this wanton and saucy boldness of theirs. And so much the more careful must we be to correct this peccant humour in the first beginnings, in regard this is a great revenue, which his majesty's affairs cannot subsist without; so that we must either continue that to the crown, or get something from that people of as much value another way; wherein I conceive it most necessary to proceed most severely in the punishment of this offence, which will still all men else for a many years after; and, therefore, if the king or yourself conceive otherwise, help me in time, or else I shall be sure to lay it on them soundly. My Lord Balfour excuseth his fault, and will certainly make means to his majesty for favour, wherein under correction, if his majesty intend to prosecute the rest, I conceive it is clearly best for the service to leave him entirely to run a common fortune, as he is in a common case with the rest of those delinquents."—Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 87.

‡ The obtaining of such a commission formed one of the articles of his after impeachment, and his answer was, that he had never sat as president after the articles were framed. But he did not deny that the power they vested was exercised by his vice-president, on the lord-president's behalf, and consequently with the full responsibility of the latter. His instrumentality in obtaining these instructions, indeed, was not directly proved; but it was proved that on one occasion "the president fell upon his knees and desired his majesty to enlarge his powers, or that he might pressed more especially for the settlement of a dispute with Lord Faulconberg by a peremptory punishment of the latter: "for this you know," he wrote to the secretary, "is a public business, and myself being to leave this government for a while, desirous to settle and establish this council in their just powers and credits, which is fit for the king's service, would fain see ourselves righted upon this arrogant lord, and so discipline all the rest upon his shoulders, as I might well hope they should exercise their jurisdiction in peace during the time of my absence."* Lord Wentworth's fiercest prosecution of apparent personal resentments was, in all cases, the simple carrying out of that despotic principle in its length and breadth, and with reference to its ulterior aims, which had become the very law of his being. In this point of view only can they be justly or intelligibly considered. The cruelties associated with the name now about to be introduced have their exaggeration or their excuse, according as the feelings of the reader may determine—but, at all events, have their rational and philosophical solution—in this point of view alone.

The Lord Mountnorris held at this time the office of vice-treasurer, which in effect was that of treasurer of Ireland. Clarendon observes of him, "He was a man of great industry, activity, and experience in the affairs of Ireland, having raised himself from a very private mean condition (having been an inferior servant to have leave to go home and lay his bones in his own cottage."—Rushworth, vol. ii., p. 161. The commission was granted immediately after. Its most terrible article was that which in every case, in distinct terms, wrested from the subject the privilege of protection in Westminster Hall, and cut him off from any share in the rights, poor and confined as they were, of the rest of his fellow-subjects. During Wentworth's absence in Ireland, one judge of the Exchequer, Vernon, dared to move in defiance of these monstrous restrictions. The lord-deputy instantly wrote to Cottington, described Vernon's conduct, and thus proceeded: "If this were not a goodly example in the face of a country living under the government of the president and council, for the respect and obedience due to the authority set over them by his majesty, of that awful reverence and duty which we all owe to his majesty's declared good-will and pleasure under the great seal, I am much mistaken. I do, therefore, most humbly beseech this judge may be convened at the council board, and charged with these two great misdemeanors; which if he deny, I pray you say openly in council I am the person will undertake to prove them against him, and withal affirm that by these strange extravagant courses he distracts his majesty's government and affairs more than ever he will be of use unto them, and that, therefore, I am a most earnest suitor to his majesty and their lordships that he be not admitted to go that circuit hereafter; and, indeed, I do most earnestly beseech his majesty by you, that we may be troubled no more with such a peevish, indiscreet piece of flesh. I confess, I disdain to see the gentlemen in this sort hang their noses over the flowers of the crown, blow and snuffe upon them till they take both scent and beauty off them, or to have them put such a prejudice upon all other sorts of men as if none were able or worthy to be intrusted with honour and administration of justice but themselves." This is surely a characteristic betrayal of Wentworth's interest in the powers of the new commission! Some difficulties appear to have been encountered in the way of the course he proposed against this judge, for we find him at a subsequent date writing thus to the lord-treasurer: "If Mr. Justice Vernon be either removed or amended in his circuit, I am very well content, being by me only considered as he is in relation to his majesty's service in those parts—the gentleman otherwise unknown to me by injury or benefit."—See Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 129, 295.

* A note subjoined to this is too characteristic to be omitted: "There is like to be a good fine gotten of him [Lord Faulconberg] for the king, which, considering the manner of his life, were wonderful ill lost; and lost it will be, if I be not here: therefore I pray you let me have my directions with all possible speed."

Lord Chichester) to the degree of a viscount and a privy counsellor, and to a very ample revenue in lands and offices; and had always, by servile flattery and sordid application, wrought himself into trust and nearness with all deputies at their first entrance upon their charge, informing them of the defects and oversights of their predecessors; and after the determination of their commands and return into England, informing the state here, and those enemies they usually contracted in that time, of whatsoever they had done or suffered to be done amiss, whereby they either suffered disgrace or damage as soon as they were recalled from those honours. In this manner he began with his own master, the Lord Chichester, and continued the same arts upon the Lord Grandison and the Lord Falkland, who succeeded; and, upon that score, procured admission and trust with the Earl of Strafford, upon his first admission to that government.* This is quoted here for the purpose of introducing a letter of Wentworth's, which was written about this time, and which appears to me not only to corroborate Clarendon's account, but (in opposition to those who have urged, as Mr. Brodie,† that Wentworth began his official connexion with Mountnorris by "courting" the latter) to give, at the same time, the noble vice-treasurer and informer-general fair warning of the character and intentions of the lord-deputy he had thereafter to deal with. Mountnorris had previously allied himself with Wentworth by marriage with a near relation of his deceased wife, the Lady Arabella. "I was not a little troubled," runs Wentworth's letter, "when my servant, returning from Dublin, brought back with him the enclosed, together with the certainty of your lordship's yet abode at Westchester. I have hereupon instantly despatched this footman expressly to find you out, and to solicit you most earnestly to pass yourself over on the other side; for besides that the moneys which I expect from you (which I confess you might some other ways provide for), the customs there, you know how loose they lie; our only confidence here being in you." Several other details are pressed with great earnestness. "Therefore," he continues, "for the love of God, linger no longer, but leaving your lady with my Lady Cholmondeley, in case her present estate will not admit her to pass along with you—I will, God willing, not fail to wait on her ladyship over myself, and deliver her safe to you at Dublin; the rather for that, to tell your lordship plainly, which I beseech you keep very private to yourself, it will be impossible for me to despatch the king's business, and my own, and get hence before the end of November at the soonest. My Lord Ranelagh will be here, I believe, within this day or two; and, in regard of his and my Lord Dungarvan's being here before, I hold it fit to communicate with your lordship the occasion, which is this, that there being a proposition made to me for a marriage with my Lord of Cork's daughter,‡

I, that had no thought such a way, did nevertheless move a match between the young lord and my Lord Clifford's daughter, which was by them accepted; and so he comes now, I believe, to treat farther of this matter with my Lord Clifford. But this I must entreat you to keep private; with this, that albeit the house of Cumberland is to me, as all the world knows that knows me, in next esteem to my own family, yet be you well assured this alliance shall not decline me from those more sovereign duties I owe my master, or those other faiths I owe my other friends." Some other expressions of courtesy are then followed by this remarkable passage. "It is enough said amongst honest men; and you may easily believe me; but look you, be secret and true to me, and that no suspicion possess you; which else in time may turn to both our disadvantages. For God's sake, my lord, let me again press your departure for Ireland. And let me have £2000 of my entertainment sent me over with all possible speed, for I have entered fondly enough on a purchase here of £14,000, and the want of that would very foully disappoint me." It is clear to me in this that Wentworth had resolved, from the first, to watch Mountnorris narrowly, and, on the earliest intimation of any possible renewal of his old treacheries, to crush him and them for ever.

Lady Mountnorris would possibly be startled in hearing from her lord that the sorrowing widower of the Lady Arabella was already speaking of the negotiation of another marriage. The entire truth would have startled her still more. Lord Wentworth had at this very time, though a year had not passed since the death of his last wife, whom he appears to have loved with fervent and continuing affection, "married Elizabeth, the daughter of Sir Godfrey Rhodes,* privately." Such is the statement of Sir George Radcliffe.

Since Radcliffe wrote, however, some curious letters relating to this marriage have been discovered in the Thoresby museum. Sir George says that the marriage took place in October. I am now about to quote a letter which bears the date of October in the same year (the 30th), and which goes to prove that, supposing the statement in question correct, Wentworth must have sent the lady off to a distance from himself immediately after the ceremony. Nor is this the only singular cir-

the Earl of Carlile: "Young Mr. Goring is gone to travel, having run himself out of £8000, which he purposeth to redeem by his frugality abroad, unless my Lord of Cork can be induced to put to his helping hand, which I have undertaken to solicit for him the best I can, and shall do it with all the power and care my credit and wit shall anywise suggest unto me. In the mean time, his lady is gone to the bath to put herself in state to be got with child, and when all things are prepared, she is like to want the principal guest. Was ever willing creature so disappointed? In truth, it is something ominous, if you mark it, yet all may do well enough, if her father will be persuaded, and then, if she be not as well done to as any of her kin, Mr. Goring loseth a friend of me forever. You may say now, if you will, I put a shrewd task upon a young man, there being no better stuff to work upon; but it is the more charity in us that wish it, and the most of all in him that shall perform it et bon et gentil cavalier." Such, I may remark, is the (to him unusual) tone of levity which he seldom failed to employ in writing to this Earl of Carlisle, whose wife, the famous countess, had secretly become his mistress. This earl died in 1636. The countess will be spoken of shortly. See, also, Strafford Papers, vol. ii., p. 119.

* [Of Great Houghton, in Yorkshire.—C.]

† Hist. of Rebellion, vol. i., p. 175.

‡ Hist. of Brit. Empire, vol. iii., p. 70.

§ This lady, whom Wentworth, for excellent reasons, declined marrying, afterward married George Goring, son of the Earl of Norwich. This was the lord-deputy's management. Some eight or nine months after, he writes to cumstance suggested by this letter. Even Sir George Radcliffe, probably, did not know all.

"Madam," Wentworth writes, "I have, in little, much to say to you, and in short terms to profess that which I must appear all my life long, or else one of us must be much to blame. But, in truth, I have that confidence in you, and that assurance in myself, as to rest secure the fault will never be made on either side. Well, then, this little and this much, this short and this long, which I aim at, is no more than to give you this first written testimony that I am your husband; and that husband of yours, that will ever discharge those duties of love and respect towards you which good women may expect, and are justly due from good men to discharge them, with a halloved care and continued perseverance in them; and this is not only much, but all which belongs me; and wherein I shall tread out the remainder of life which is left me. More I cannot say, nor perform much more for the present; the rest must dwell in hope until I have made it up in the balance, but I am and must be no other than your loving husband." A postscript* closes the letter, referring to some paste for the teeth, which proves that the lady was in London. Wentworth himself was at York, and, it is evident from his letters, had not quitted the country during the whole of that month. The lady's answer to this letter would seem to have been humbly affectionate, and to have conveyed to Wentworth a lowly but fervent expression of thankfulness—for that her new husband had promised not to cast her off as a deserted mistress! His reply (dated about a fortnight after his first letter) is in excellent spirit, and highly characteristic: "Dear Besse," he begins, with the encouragement of tender words, "your first lines were wellcum unto me, and I will keep them, in regard I take them to be full, as of kindness, so of truth. It is no presumption for you to write unto me; the fellowship of marriage ought to carry with it more of love and equality than any other apprehension. Soe I desire it may ever be betwixt us, nor shall it break of my parte. Virtue is the highest value we can set upon ourselves in this world, and the chiefe which others are to esteem us by. That preserved, we become capable of the noblest impressions which can be imparted unto us. You succeed in this family two of the rarest ladies of their time. Equal them in those excellent dispositions of your mind, and you become every ways equally worthy of anything that they had, or that the rest of the world can give. And be you ever assured to be by me cherished and assisted the best I can, throw the whole course of my life, wherein I shall be no other to you than I was to them, to wit, your loving husband, Wentworth." Still, however, Wentworth did not acknowledge her publicly; still he kept her, for some time, at a distance, and finally sent her over to Ireland, in the charge of Sir George Radcliffe, some time before he himself quitted England. She arrived in Dublin with Radcliffe in January, 1633,* and was not joined by Wentworth till the July of that year, when his lordship at last ventured to acknowledge her.† Laud, upon this, seems to have put some questions to the lord-deputy, whose answer may be supposed, from the following passage in the archbishop's rejoinder, to have been made up of explanations and apologies, and a concluding hint of advice: "And now, my lord, I heartily wish you and your lady all mutual content that may be; and I did never doubt that you undertook that course but upon mature consideration, and you have been pleased to express to me a very good one, in which God bless you and your posterity, though I did not write anything to you as an examiner. For myself, I must needs confess to your lordship my weakness; that having been married to a very troublesome and unquiet wife before, I should be so ill advised as now, being about sixty, to go marry another of a more wayward and troublesome generation."‡ There will not be any further occasion to remark upon the early circumstances of this marriage, which in its subsequent results presented nothing of a striking or unusual description, but I shall here add, for the guidance of the reader in his judgment of these particulars of Wentworth's conduct, some few considerations, which in justice ought not to be omitted.

Lord Wentworth was a man of intrigue, and the mention of this is not to be avoided in such a view of the bearings of his conduct and character as it has been here attempted, for the first time, to convey. It is at all times a delicate matter to touch upon this portion of men's histories, partly from the nature of the subject, and partly from a kind of soreness which the community feel upon it, owing to the inconsistencies between their opinions and practices, and to certain strange perplexities at the heart of those inconsistencies, which it remains for some bolder and more philosophical generation even to discuss. Meantime it is pretty generally understood, that fidelity to the marriage bed is not apt to be most prevalent where leisure and luxury most abound; and, for the same reason, there is a tendency in the richer classes to look upon the licenses they take, and to talk of them with one another, and so, by a thousand means, to increase and perpetuate the tendency, of which the rest of society have little conception, unless it be, indeed, among the extremely poor; for similar effects result from being either above or below a dependance upon other people's opinions. When it was public-

* Radcliffe's Essay.

† His friends were instant in their congratulation, and, in a profusion of compliments, sought to intimate to his lordship, that in this marriage of one so far beneath him in rank and consideration, he had only furnished another proof of his own real and independent greatness. There is something pleasant in the Earl of Leicester's note, who simply regrets that he "had not the good fortune to be one of the throng that crowded to tell you how glad they were that you had passed your journey and landed safely in your government, or (which I conceive a greater occasion of rejoicing with you) that you were happily and healthfully arrived in the arms of a fair and beloved wife."—Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 157.

‡ Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 125.

* "If you will speak to my cousin Radcliffe for the paste I told you on for your teeth, and desire him to speak to Dr. Moore, in my name, for two pots of it, and that the doctor will see it be good, for this last indeed was not so, you may bring me one down, and keep the other yourself." On the back of this letter the following words are written, in a delicate female hand: "Tom was born the 17th of September, being Wednesday, in the morning, betwixt two and three o'clock, and was christened of the 7th of October, 1634." There is another letter of Wentworth's to Lady Wentworth, dated from Sligo, in 1635, in the same museum, wherein he sends his blessing to "little Tom." This child died, but Elizabeth Rhodes afterward bore Lord Strafford a girl, who was yet an infant at her father's death.

ly brought out, therefore, that Wentworth, as well as gayer men of the court, had had his "levities," as the grave Lord-chancellor Clarendon calls them, it naturally told against him with the more serious part of the nation; not, however, without some recoil, in the opinions of candid observers, against the ingenuousness of those who told it, because the latter, as men moving in the same ranks themselves, or on the borders of them, must have known the license secretly prevailing, and probably partook of it far more than was supposed. Lady Carlisle, one of the favourites of Wentworth, subsequently became the mistress of Pym himself. Lord Clarendon, backed with the more avowed toleration, or, rather, impudent unfeelingness which took place in the subsequent reign, not only makes use of the term just quoted in speaking of intrigue, but ventures, with a sort of pick-thank chuckle of old good-humour, to confess that, in his youth, he conducted himself in these matters much as others did, though with a wariness proportionate to his understanding. "Cauté," says he, in the quotation popular at the time, and used by Wentworth himself, "si non caste."

We are also to take into consideration, that if the court of Charles the First had more sentiment and reserve than that of his heartless son, it was far from being so superior to courts in general in this respect, as the solemn shadow which attends his image with posterity naturally enough leads people to conclude. The better taste of the poetry-and-picture-loving monarch did but refine, and throw a veil over, the grosser habits of the court of his father James. Pleasure was a Silenus in the court of James. In that of Charles the Second, it was a vulgar satyr. Under Charles the First, it was still of the breed, but it was a god Pan, and the muses piped among his nymphs.

Far from wondering, therefore, that Wentworth, notwithstanding the gravity of his bearing and the solemn violence of his ambition, allowed himself to indulge in the fashionable license of the times, it was to be expected that he would do so, not only from the self-indulgence natural to his will in all things, but from the love of power itself, and that he might be in no respect behindhand with any grounds which he could furnish himself with for having the highest possible opinion of his faculties for ascendancy. As nine tenths of common gallantry is pure vanity, so a like proportion of the graver offence of deliberate seduction is owing to pure will and the love of power—the love of obtaining a strong and sovereign sense of an existence not very sensitive, at any price to the existence of another. And thus, without supposing him guilty to that extent, might the common gallantries of the recherché and dominant Strafford be owing greatly to the pure pride of his will, and to that same love of conquest and superiority which actuated him in his public life.

A greater cause for wonder might be found in the tenderness with which he treated the wives to whom he was unfaithful, and especially the one, this Elizabeth Rhodes, who was comparatively lowly in birth. But so mixed a thing is human nature, as at present constituted, that the vices as well as virtues of the man might come into play in this very tenderness, and help to corroborate it; for, in addition to the noble and kindly thoughts which never ceased to be mixed up with his more violent ones, he would think that the wife of a Wentworth was of necessity a personage to be greatly and tenderly considered on all occasions; and even his marriage into an obscure family would be reconciled to his pride by the instinct which leads men of that complexion to think it equally difficult for themselves to be lowered by anything they choose to do, and for the object of their attention not to be elevated by the same process of self-reference.

Nor—to quit this delicate subject, which I could not but touch on, to assist the reader, with what has gone before, to a proper judgment of facts that are yet to be mentioned, and which, in truth, contains matter for the profoundest reflection of those who might choose to consider it by itself—will it be thought extraordinary by such as have at all looked into the nature of their fellow-creatures, that a man like Wentworth should have treated his wives tenderly at the very times at which he was most unfaithful to them; for, whether influenced by love or by awe, they do not appear to have offended him at any time by their complaints, or even to have taken notice of his conduct; and they were, in truth, excellent women, worthy of his best and most real love; so as to render it probable that his infidelities were but heats of will and appetite, never, perhaps, occasioning even a diminution of the better affections, or, if they did, ending in the additional tenderness occasioned by remorse. It is a vulgar spirit only that can despise a woman for making no remonstrances, and a brutal one that can ill treat her for it. A heart with any nobleness left in it keeps its sacredst and dearest corner for a kindness so angelical; and Wentworth's pride had enough sentiment to help his virtues to a due appreciation of the generosity, if it existed, or to give it the benefit of supposing that it would have done so, in favour of such a man as he, beloved by wives of so sweet a nature.

The Lord Wentworth was of a tall and graceful person, though much sickness had early bent an originally sensitive frame, which continued to sink more rapidly in after life under the weight of greater cares. Habitual pain had increased the dark hue and deep contractions of a brow, formed and used to "threaten and command," and no less effective in enforcing obedience than the loud and impressive voice that required it. He alludes to this sportively in a letter to the Earl of Exeter, wherein he writes, "This bent and ill-favoured brow of mine was never prosperous in the favour of ladies; yet did they know how perfectly I do honour, and how much I value, that excellent and gracious sex, I am persuaded I should become a favourite amongst them—tush, my lord, tush, there are few of them know how gentle a garçon I am."* Happy,

* Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 178, 180. His letters to Lord Exeter and his wife are all very pleasant, and, in their deep sense of personal attentions during illness, touching. "Be not so venturesome on my occasion," he writes, dissuading Exeter from a winter journey to discharge such offices of friendship, "be not so venturesome on my occasion, till this churlish season of the year be past, and the spring well come on. There is old age in years as well as

as it is evident, is the opposite consciousness, out of which such pleasant complaining flows! Whereupon Lord Exeter rejoins with justice, in a passage which may serve to redeem his lordship amply from the stupidity that is wont to be charged to him, "My lord, I could be angry with you, were you not so far off, for wronging of your bent brow, as you term it in your letter: for, you had been cursed with a meek brow and an arch of white hair upon it, never to have governed Ireland nor Yorkshire so well as you do, where your lawful commands have gotten you an exact obedience. Content yourself with that brave, commanding part of your face, which sheweth gravity without dulness, severity without cruelty, clemency without easiness, and love without extravagancy." An ungallant consolation under female displeasure follows: "And if it should be any impeachment unto your favour with that sex you so much honour, you should be no loser; for they that have known them so long as I have done, have found them nothing less than diabulos blancos;" which Lady Exeter judges fit to dispense with in a postscript: "I cannot consent to the opinion of the lord that spake last, neither do I believe that it was his own, but rather vented as a chastisement to my particular. To your lordship all our sex in general are obliged, myself infinitely, who can return you nothing but my perpetual well wishes, with admiration of your virtues, and my heartiest desire that all your employments and fortunes may be answerable."* Wentworth, indeed, had not needed this assurance, under a remark which May's happy quotation,

"Non formosus erat, sed erat facundus Ulysses, Et tamen equoreas torisit amore Deas," has long since shown to be uncalled for. The intense passion of a Mirabeau or a Strafford will hardly make shipwreck for the want of a "smooth dispose."

Wentworth had much wronged his "bent brow," and he knew that he had wronged it. It was sufficiently notorious about the court, that whenever it relaxed in favour of any of the court dames, its owner was seldom left to hope in vain. The Lady Carlile,† the Lady in bodies; January and February are the hoar hairs of the year, and the more quietly, the more within doors we keep them, we with the year grow the sooner young again in the spring." "To neither of you," he concludes, "with this new year I can wish anything of new, but that you may tread still round the ancient and beaten paths of that happiness you mutually communicate the one with the other."

* Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 241.

† This extraordinary woman, whom Dryden called the "Helen of her country," and from whom Waller borrowed a compliment for Venus ("the bright Carlile of the court of heaven"), played a conspicuous part in the public affairs of the time. "She was thought to be as deeply concerned in the counsels of the court, and afterward of the Parliament, as any in England." After the death of Strafford she had become the mistress of Pym. Yet her passions were not extreme! Sir Toby Matthews lets us into her character: "She is of too high a mind and dignity not only to seek, but almost to wish, the friendship of any creature: they whom she is pleased to chuse are such as are of the most eminent condition, both for power and employments; not with any design towards her own particular, either of advantage or curiosity; but her nature values fortunate persons as virtuous." The writer of Waller's life (the countess was aunt to the poet's Sacharissa), in the Biographia Britannica, says that several letters of hers are printed in the "Strafford Papers." This is a mistake; but we find frequent allusions to her throughout the correspondence. If any one wished to know of Wentworth's health, they applied to Lady Carlile. "I hope you are now recovered of your gout, which my Lady of Carlile told me you had" (ii.,

Carnarvon, the young Lady Loftus, were not, if written letters and general rumours deserve trust, the only evidences of this.

Sad indeed were the consequences of Wentworth's casual appearances in the queen's withdrawing-room! "Now if I were a good poet," writes the Lord Conway to the lord-deputy himself, "I should, with Chaucer, call upon Melpomene

"To help me to indite Verses that weepen as I write."

"My Lady of Carnarvon, being well in the favour and belief of her father and husband, came with her husband to the court, and it was determined she should have been all this year at London, her lodgings in the Cockpit; but my Lord Wentworth had been at court, and in the queen's withdrawing-room was a constant looker upon my lady, as if that only were his business, for which cause, as it is thought, my Lord of Carnarvon went home, and my lord-chamberlain preached often of honour and truth. One of the sermons I and my Lady Killegrew, or my Lady Stafford, which you please, were at; it lasted from the beginning to the end of supper; the text was, that . . . When supper was ended, and we were where we durst speak, my Lady Killegrew swore by G—d that my lord-chamberlain meant not anybody but her and my Lord of Dorset. But my Lady Carnarvon is sent down to her husband, and the night before she went was with her father in his chamber till past twelve, he chiding and she weeping, and when she will return no man knows; if it be not till her face do secure their jealousy, she had as good stay for ever. Some think that my Lord Wentworth did this rather to do a despatch to her father and husband than for any great love to her."*

Sir George Radcliffe, indeed, in his Essay, observes on this head: "He was defamed for incontinence, wherein I have reason to believe that he was exceedingly much wronged. I had occasion of some speech with him about the state of his soul several times, but twice espe-

124). If any one wanted favour at court, they wrote to Wentworth to bespeak the interest of Lady Carlile. We find even Laud, for a particular purpose, condescending to this: "I will write to my Lady of Carlile." Wentworth writes back, "as your grace appoints me. In good sadness I judge her ladyship very considerable; for she is often in place, and is extremely well skilled how to speak with advantage and spirit for those friends she professeth unto, which will not be many. There is this farther in her disposition, she will not seem to be the person she is not, an ingenuity I have always observed and honoured her for." (Papers, vol. ii., p. 120.) And again, out of many I could put before the reader: "I have writ fully to my Lady of Carlile, and am very confident, if it be in her ladyship's power, she will express the esteem she hath your lordship in to a very great height." (Vol. ii., p. 138.)

* Strafford Papers, vol. ii., p. 47. Lord Conway's letters to Wentworth are extremely amusing. They record with particular care the unlucky courtships of Vandyke: "It was thought," he writes on one occasion to the lord-deputy, "that the Lord Cottington should have married my Lady Stanhope; I believe there were intentions in him, but the lady is, as they say, in love with Carey Raleigh. You were so often with Sir Anthony Vandike, that you could not but know his gallantries for the love of that lady; but he is come off with a cogloneria, for he disputed with her about the price of her picture, and sent her word that if she would not give the price he demanded, he would sell it to another that would give more. This week every one will be at London; the queen is very weary of Hampton Court, and will be brought to bed at St. James's; then my Lady of Carlile will be a constant courtier; her dog hath lately written a sonnet in her praise, which Harry Percy burned, or you had now had it."

cially, when I verily believe he did lay open unto me the very bottom of his heart. Once was, when he was in a very great affliction upon the death of his second wife, and then for some days and nights I was very few minutes out of his company; the other time was at Dublin, on a Good Friday (his birthday), when he was preparing himself to receive the blessed sacrament on Easter-day following. At both these times I received such satisfaction as left no scruple with me at all, but much assurance of his chastity. I knew his ways long and intimately, and though I cannot clear him of all frailties (for who can justify the most innocent man?), yet I must give him the testimony of conscientiousness in his ways, that he kept himself from gross sins, and endeavoured to approve himself rather unto God than unto man, to be religious inwardly and in truth, rather than outwardly and in show." What has been quoted from Lord Conway's letter, however—and, were it necessary to my purpose, many letters more, and of stronger meaning, are to be produced—does not come within Radcliffe's rebuke of the "defamation" employed against Strafford. The only tendency of what Sir George says, therefore, is to confirm the charge in its warrantable view (with which alone I have dwelt upon it) of illustrating duly private conduct and character. Far different was Pym's great object when, instancing in the House of Commons, as Clarendon informs us, "some high and imperious actions done by Strafford in England and Ireland, some proud and over-confident expressions in discourse, and some passionate advices he had given in the most secret councils and debates of the affairs of state, he added some lighter passages of his vanity and amours, that they who were not inflamed with anger and detestation against him for the former, might have less esteem and reverence for his prudence and discretion."*

These words may recall me to the actual progress of Strafford's life and thoughts. Prudence and discretion—whatever his great associate of the third Parliament might afterward think right, or just, or necessary to his fatal purposes, to urge—still, so far as they may be associated in a grand project of despotism, eminently characterized every movement of Lord Wentworth. The king had now become extremely anxious for his departure, which the winding up of certain private affairs alone delayed.† On the completion of these he arrived in London, for the purpose of setting sail immediately. Here, however, he was unexpectedly delayed by the necessity of waiting the arrival of a man of war; for so dangerously was the Irish Channel at that time infested with pirates, that the lord-deputy could not venture to pass over without convoy. "The winds fall out so contrary," he writes in answer to the secretaries, who, with the king and court, were engaged in a progress, "that the king's ship cannot be gotten as yet forth of Rochester River; but so soon as we can speed it away, and I have notice from Captain Plunleigh that he is ready for my transportation, I will not stay an hour, desiring extremely now to be upon the place where I owe his majesty so great an account, as one that am against all non-residents, as well lay as ecclesiastical." Wentworth took care, at the same time, to avail himself of some opportunities offered him by this delay. He completed some pending arrangements; secured finally the close counsel and assistance of Laud;* established a private and direct correspondence with the king himself for the sanction of his more delicate measures; instructed a gossiping person, a hired retainer of his own, the Rev. Mr. Garrard, to furnish him, in monthly packets of news, with all the private scandal, and rumours, and secret affairs of the court, and of London generally; and obtained the appointment of his friends Wandesford and Radcliffe to official situations, and to seats in the privy council, reserving them as a sort of select cabinet of his own, with whom everything might be secretly discussed.† These things settled, sought after; it being no advantage either to the tenant or landlord to suffer arrears to run longer.

* A few months after his departure, Laud was created Archbishop of Canterbury. Wentworth had foreseen this. "One advantage your lordship will have," writes Lord Falkland, in a somewhat pettish letter, "that I wanted in the time of my government, an Archbishop of Canterbury to friend; who is, withal, a person of especial power to assist you in that part which shall concern the Church government, the third and principal member of the kingdom; for the translation of the late archbishop into heaven, and of the late Bishop of London unto the see of Canterbury, makes that no riddle, being so plain." The sort of stipulations for mutual service which passed between the lord-deputy and Laud may be gathered from two out of twenty requests of the latter which reached Dublin Castle before Wentworth himself had arrived there. They are equally characteristic of the sincerity and atrocity of the bigotry of Laud. "I humbly pray your lordship to remember what you have promised me concerning the church at Dublin, which hath for divers years been used for a stable by your predecessors, and to vindicate it to God's service, as you shall there examine and find the merits of the cause." And again: "There is one Christopher Sands, who, as I am informed, dwells now in Londonderry, and teaches an English school there, and I do much fear he doth many things there to the dishonour of God, and the endangering of many poor souls. For the party is a Jew, and denies both Christ and his Gospel, as I shall be able to prove, if I had him here. I humbly pray your lordship that he may be seized on by authority, and sent over in safe custody, and delivered either to myself or Mr. Mottershed, the register of the high commission, that he may not live there to infect his majesty's subjects."—Vol. i., p. 81, 82.

† He found great advantage in this; and a few months after his arrival in Dublin wrote to the lord-treasurer some strenuous advice, suggested by his experience, "that too many be not taken into counsel on that side, and that your resolutions, whatever they be, be kept secret: for, believe me, there can be nothing more prejudicial to the good success of those affairs than their being understood beforehand by them here. So prejudicial I hold it, indeed, that on my faith there is not a minister on this side that knows anything I either write or intend, excepting the Master of the Rolls and Sir George Radcliffe, for whose assistance in this government, and comfort to myself amidst this generation,

* Clarendon, Hist. of Rebellion, vol. i., p. 137.

† A note from Radcliffe's Essay will show that the energetic method and despatch which made the difficulties of the public business sink before him were no less serviceable in the conduct of his private affairs. "In the managing of his estate and domestical affairs, he used the advice of two friends, Ch. Gr. and G. R., and two servants, Richard Maris his steward, and Peter Man his solicitor. Before every term they met, and Peter Man brought a note of all things to be considered of; which being taken into consideration one by one, and every one's opinion heard, resolution was had and set down in writing, whereof his lordship kept one copy and Peter Man another: at the next meeting, an account was taken of all that was done in pursuance of the former orders, and a new note made of all that rested to be done, with an addition of such things as did arise since the last meeting, and were requisite to be consulted of. His whole accounts were ordered to be made up twice every year, one half ending the 20th of September, the other the 20th of March; for by that time the former half year's rents were commonly received, or else the arrears were fit to be he now himself became anxious for his departure, which, with some farther delay, and not without some personal loss,* he at last accomplished.

Lord Wentworth arrived in Dublin in July, 1633. His very arrival, it is justly said, formed a new era in the government of Ireland. He ordered the ceremonial of the British court to be observed within the castle; a guard, an institution theretofore unknown, was established; and the proudest of the Irish lords were at once taught to feel the "immense distance" which separated them from the representative of their sovereign.†

An extract from the lord-deputy's first despatch, written about a week after his arrival, and duplicates of which he forwarded at the same time, with his customary zeal, to Cooke and Cottington, is too characteristic to be omitted. "I find them in this place," he writes, "a company of men the most intent upon their own ends that I ever met with, and so as those speed, they consider other things at a very great distance. I take the crown to have been very ill served, and altogether impossible for me to remedy, unless I be entirely trusted, and lively assisted and countenanced by his majesty, which I am bold to write unto your lord-

I am not able sufficiently to pour forth my humble acknowledgments to his majesty. Sure I were the most solitary man without them that ever served a king in such a place."—Vol. i., p. 193, 194, &c. Wandesford's office was that of Master of the Rolls.

* "They write me lamentable news forth of Ireland," he informs the secretary, in one of his last letters before his departure, "what spoil is done there by the pirates. There is one lyes upon the Welch coast, which it seems is the greatest vessel, commanded by Norman; another in a vessel of some sixty tuns, called the Pickpocket of Dover, lyes in sight of Dublin; and another lyes near Youghall—who do so infest every quarter, as the farmers have already lost in their customs a thousand pounds at least, all trade being at this means at a stand. The pirate that lyes before Dublin took, on the 20th of the last month, a bark of Liverpool, with goods worth £4000, and amongst them as much linen as cost me £500; and, in good faith, I fear I have lost my apparel too; which if it be so, will be as much loss more unto me, besides the inconvenience which lights upon me by being disappointed of my provisions upon the place. By my faith, this is but a cold welcome they bring me withal to that coast, and yet I am glad at least that they escaped my plate; but the fear I had to be thought to linger here unprofitably forced me to make this venture, where now I wish I had had little more care of my goods, as well as of my person."—Vol. i., p. 90.

† See Strafford's Papers, vol. i., p. 200, 201. In the various orders he procured, he invariably distinguished between the demands of his place and the courtesies due to his person. In this despatch to Cooke, a number of minute instructions are prayed for, which were instantly granted. Among others, he demanded "instructions to call upon the nobility and others to attend the deputy upon all solemn processions to church, and such like." This is not so well observed as it ought, and they grow generally more negligent than is fit they were, not truly, I trust, in any distaste to me, for to my person they give as much respect as I desire from them; but I know not how, in point of greatness, some of them think it too much perchance to be tied to anything of duty, rather desirous it might be taken as a courtesy. It would do, therefore, very well, his majesty were graciously pleased by letter to signify what the attendance is he requires at their hands." These he specifies accordingly, with a vast quantity of laborious and ceremonious regulations, adding, "I confess I might, without more, do these things; but where I may seem to take anything to myself, I am naturally modest, and should be extreme unwilling to be held supercilious or imperious amongst them; so as I cannot do therein as I both could and would, where I were commanded. Therefore, if these be held duties fit to be paid to his majesty's greatness, which is alike operative, and to be revered through every part of his dominions, I crave such a direction in these as in the other, that so they may know it to be his pleasure; otherwise I shall be well content they may be spared, having, in truth, no such vanity in myself as to be delighted with any of these observances." ship once for all, not for any end of my own; but singly for his majesty's service. Besides, what is to be done must be speedily executed, it being the genius of this country to obey a deputy better upon his entrance than upon his departure from them; and therefore I promise your lordship I will take my time; for while they take me to be a person of much more power with the king, and of stronger abilities in myself, than indeed I have reason either in fact or right to judge myself to be, I shall, it may be, do the king some service; but if my weakness therein once happen to be discovered among them in this kingdom, for the love of God, my lord, let me be taken home; for I shall but lose the king's affairs, and my own time afterward; and my unprofitableness in the former, I confess, will grieve me much more than any prejudice which may happen to my own particular by the expense of the latter. The army I conceive to be extremely out of frame; an army rather in name than in deed, whether you consider their numbers, their weapons, or their discipline. And so, in truth, not to flatter myself, must I look to find all things else, so as it doth almost affright me at first sight, yet you shall see I will not meanly desert the duties I owe my master and myself; howbeit, without the arm of his majesty's counsel and support, it is impossible for me to go through with this work, and therein I must crave leave to use your lordship only as my mediator, so often as I shall have occasion. I send your lordship the original herein enclosed, of the offer for this next year's contribution, and to the secretary but the copy, judging it might be thought fitter for your lordship to present it to his majesty than the other. You will be pleased to send it me safely back, there being many particulars contained therein of which I shall be able to make very good use hereafter, if I do not much mistake myself."*

Wentworth, in fact, extraordinary as were the powers with which he had been invested, had still reason for distrust in the weakness and insincerity of the king, and thus sought to impress upon his council, as the first and grand consideration of all, that, unless unlimited authority was secured to him, he could and would do nothing. One thing, he saw at once, stood in the way of his scheme of government. In the old time, while Ireland continued to be governed only as a conquered country, the lord-deputy and council had used their discretion in superseding the common law courts, and assuming the decision of private civil causes. During the weaker governments which succeeded, however, this privilege was surrendered; and Lord Falkland himself had confirmed the surrender by an express prohibition. The common law and its authority had, in consequence, gained some little strength at the period of Wentworth's arrival. He had not

* Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 96, 97. In the lord-treasurer's copy of this despatch is the following characteristic note on a money transaction in which Weston thought he had been somewhat sharply dealt with: "Your lordship is pleased to term my last letter you received in Scotland an angry one; but, by my troth, your lordship, under favour, was mistaken; for I neither was, nor conceived I had cause to be, angry; only I was desirous you might truly understand the state of my accounts, without any other thought at all." Secure of Laud's influence, Wentworth had become careless of Weston.

rested many days in his state chair before this prohibition was suspended, and the old privilege restored.* At all risks, even the most fatal, Wentworth silenced the objectors in both countries. He had visions before him which they dared not to contemplate! Their notion of government was one of sordid scheming: not the less was the subject to be wronged, but the more should the instruments of wrong avoid the responsibility of it; they saw nothing but their own good, and sought to prevent nothing save their own harm. Wentworth was a despot, but of a different metal. He shrunk from no avowal in shrinking from no wrong; and, confident of the plans he proposed to execute, felt that the individual injury he inflicted at present would be redeemed and forgotten in the general prosperity of the future. "These lawyers," he writes to the lord-marshal, "would monopolize to themselves all judicature, as if no honour or justice could be rightly administered but under one of their bencher's gowns. I am sure they little understand the unsettled state of this kingdom, that could advise the king to lessen the power of his deputy, indeed his own, until it were brought into that stayed temper of obedience and conformity with that of England, or at least till the benches here were better provided with judges, than God knows as yet they are. Therefore, if your lordship's judgment approve of my reasons, I beseech you assist me therein, or, rather, the king's service, and I shall be answerable with my head."† Equal in all his exactions, he had suspected also from the first that the great complainants against his government would be men of rank; and now, in farther organization of his powers, procured an order from the king, that none of the nobility, none of the principal officers, "none of those that hath either office or estate here," should presume to quit the kingdom without the license of the lord-deputy.‡ When his use of this power was afterward spoken against, he silenced the objectors by a stern and sarcastical reference to one of the graces they had themselves solicited, which seemed indeed to warrant the authority, but had been proposed with a far different purpose, that of preventing men of large fortunes from deserting their estates, and wasting their revenues abroad!

Wentworth called his first privy council. The members of this body had hitherto borne great sway in the government of the island—

* "I find that my Lord Falkland was restrained by proclamation not to meddle in any cause betwixt party and party, which certainly did lessen his power extremely; I know very well the common lawyers will be passionately against it, who are wont to put such a prejudice upon all other professions, as if none were to be trusted, or capable to administer justice, but themselves; yet how well this suits with monarchy, when they monopolize all to be governed by their year-books, you in England have a costly experience; and I am sure his majesty's absolute power is not weaker in this kingdom, where hitherto the deputy and council-board have had a stroke with them." Such is an extract from a remarkable despatch to Cooke, which fills nearly ten closely-printed folio pages, written soon after the lord-deputy's arrival, and filled with reasoning of the most profound and subtle character, in reference to his contemplated schemes and purposes. See vol. i., p. 194.

† Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 223.

‡ Ibid., p. 362, and see p. 248.

The lord-justices were the chief leaders of this body. Wentworth, in one of his despatches, had written thus: "On Thursday seven-night last, in the morning, I visited both the justices at their own houses, which albeit not for-greater, indeed, than the lords-deputies themselves—and they were now, for the first time, to see their authority broken, and their rank and influence set at scorn. Only a select number of them were summoned, a practice usual in England,* but in Ireland quite unheard of. But the mortifications reserved for those that had been honoured by a summons were almost greater than were felt by the absent counselors! Having assembled at the minute appointed, they were obliged to wait several hours upon the leisure of the deputy, and, when he arrived at last, were treated with no particle of the consideration which deliberative duties claim.

Wentworth laid before them a provision for the immediate necessities of government, and more especially for the maintenance of the army. The views of the lord-deputy, somewhat more reaching than their own, startled them not a little. Sir Adam Loftus, the son of the lord-chancellor, broke a sullen silence by proposing that the voluntary contribution should be continued for another year, and that a Parliament should meantime be prayed for. "After this followed again a long silence," when the lord-deputy called on Sir William Parsons, the master of the wards, to deliver his opinion. It was unfavourable. "I was then put to my last refuge," says Wentworth, "which was plainly to declare that there was no necessity which induced me to take them to counsel in this business, for rather than fail in so necessary a duty to my master, I would undertake, upon the peril of my head, to make the king's army able to subsist, and to provide for itself amongst them without their help. Howbeit, forth of my respect to themselves I had been persuaded to put this fair occasion into their hands, not only to express their ready affections and duties to his majesty, and so to have in their own particular a share in the honour and thanks of so noble a work, but also that the proposition of this next contribution might move from the Protestants, as it did this year from the Papists, and so these no more in show than substance to go before those in their cheerfulness and readiness to serve his majesty; . . . so as my advice should be unto them, to make an offer under their hands to his majesty of this next year's contribution, with the desire of a Parliament, in such sort as is contained in their offer, which herewith I send you enclosed. They are so horribly afraid that the contribution money should be set as an annual charge upon their inheritances, as they would redeem it at any rate, so as upon the name of a Parliament thus proposed, it was something strange to see how instantly they gave consent to this proposition, with all the cheerfulness possible, and agreed to have the letter drawn, merely done by other deputies, yet I conceived it was a duty I owed them, being as then but a private person, as also to show an example to others what would always become them to the supreme governor, whom it should please his majesty to set over them." This was a subtle distinction, which their lordships did not afterward find they had much profited by.

* "I desire," Wentworth had demanded of Cooke, "that the orders set down for the privy council of England might be sent unto us, with this addition, that no man speak covered save the deputy, and that their speech may not be directed one to another, but only to the deputy; as also, taking notice of their negligent meetings upon committees, which, indeed, is passing ill, to command me straitly to cause them to attend those services as in duty they ought."

which you have here signed with all their hands.*

A "Parliament!" This word, Wentworth knew, would sound harshly in the ear of Charles, who had, by this time, prohibited its very mention in England. But he saw, from what had occurred in the council, in what consideration the mere name was held there; and he saw, moreover, abroad among the nation, a feeling in favour of it, which might, by a bold movement, be even wrested to the purpose of tyranny, but could never, with any safety to that cause, be altogether avoided.

Nor was this aspect of affairs forced upon Wentworth by necessity alone. He had certainly entered Ireland with one paramount object, that of making his master "the most absolute prince in Christendom," in so far as regarded that "conquered country." Wealthier he meant her to become, even in the midst of his exactions; but a slave he had resolved to make her, in so far as the popular control was to be admitted over her government. Yet it has been shown that Wentworth was not a vain man; that he was ever ready to receive the suggestions of the occasion and the time; and it is clear that he entered Ireland by no means assured of being able to carry his purposes into effect by the simple and straightforward machinery of an absolute despotism. The king might see in Parliaments nothing but an unnecessary obstruction to the free exercise of his royal will, and might have directed Wentworth to "put them off handsomely," or otherwise. But Wentworth had impressions of his own which were not to be so got rid of. These Parliaments—which had been only hurriedly glanced at by the averted eye of Charles, on some occasion when he had been forced to "come at the year's end with his hat in his hand," and to whom the notion they had conveyed was simply the strengthening his conviction that "such assemblies were of the nature of cats, they ever grew cursed with age"—these Parliaments were known thoroughly, and were remembered profoundly by Wentworth. He had been conversant with the measures, and connected with the men. He had been the associate of Pym; and had spoken and voted in the same ranks with Eliot. Such an experience might be abhorred, but could not be made light of; and that mighty power, of which he had been the sometime portion, never deserted the mind of Wentworth. He boldly suffered its image to confront him, that he might the better resist its spirit and divert its tendency.

* Stafford Papers, vol. i., p. 98, 99. With characteristic purpose Wentworth subjoins to this despatch a private note to Conke: "I should humbly advise that in some part of your next letter you would be pleased to give a touch with your pen concerning Sir Adam Loftus, such as I might show him, for he deserves it; and it will encourage the well-affected, and affright the other, when they shall see their actions are rightly understood by his majesty; and also some good words for the lord-chancellor, the Lord Cork, the Lord of Ormond, and the Lord Mountnorris; and chiefly to express in your despatch that his majesty will think of their desire for a Parliament, and betwixt this and Christmas give them a fair and gracious answer, for the very hope of it will give them great contentment, and make them go on very willingly with their payments." Had none of these men afterward thwarted him in his great despotic projects, Wentworth would have sought every means of covering them with rewards, to which he recognised no stint or measure, when called for by his notion of public service.

When he arrived in Ireland, therefore, he was quite prepared for the mention of Parliament—even for the obligation of granting it. He had not watched human nature superficially, though, unfortunately, he missed of the final knowledge. He would have retained that engine whose wondrous effects he had witnessed, and had even assisted in producing. He would have compelled it to be as efficient in the service of its new master, as of late in withstanding his pleasure. And Wentworth could not but feel, probably, that the foundation for so vast a scheme as his, which was to embody so many far-stretching assumptions, might be not unsafely propped at the first with a little reverence of authority.* He would set up a Parliament, for instance, which should make itself "eminent to posterity as the very basis and foundation of the greatest happiness and prosperity that ever befell this nation"—by the extraordinary and notable process of being forced to confirm the king's claim to unlimited prerogative! That "way of Parliaments," it is evident from many passages in his despatches, he could not but covet, even while he spoke of leaving "such forms," and betaking himself to "his majesty's undoubted privilege." Power, indeed, was the great law of Wentworth's being; but from all this it may be fairly supposed, that even over the days of his highest and most palmy state lingered the uneasy fear that he might, after all, have mistaken the nature of power, and be doomed as a sacrifice at last to its truer, and grander, and more lasting issues. The fatal danger he frequently challenged—the "at peril of my head," which so often occurs in his despatches—must have unpleasantly betrayed this to his confederates in London.

A Parliament, then, he acknowledged to himself, must ultimately be summoned in Ireland. But he was cautious in communicating this to the English council. "My opinion as touching a Parliament," he writes to Cooke, "I am still gathering for, but shall be very cautious and cunctative in a business of so great weight, naturally distrusting my judgment, and more here, where I am in a sort yet a stranger, than in places where I had been bred, versed, and acquainted in the affairs and with the conditions of men; so as I shall hardly be ready so soon to deliver myself therein as formerly I writ; but, God willing, I shall transmit that and my judgment upon many other the chief services of his majesty betwixt this and Christmas. I protest unto you it is never a day I do not beat my brains about them some hours, well foreseeing that the chief success of all my labours will consist much in providently and discreetly choosing and saddening my first ground; for if that chance to be mislaid or left loose, the higher I go, the greater and more sudden will be the downcome."* Some short time, however, after the date of this letter, he forwarded an elaborate despatch to the secretary for the consideration of the king. In this despatch he insisted very strongly on the wide distinction between English and Irish Parliaments which had been planted by the act of Poynings,† he dwelt on the exigencies of the state, and alleged various powerful reasons in that regard. He claimed also the permission to issue the writs instantly; for if they were deferred till the voluntary contribution should again be about to terminate, they would appear, he ar-

* On one occasion, it may be remarked, when the attorney-general in England much wished, as he fancied, to strengthen the famous Poyning's act by an abolition of certain incidents attached to it, Wentworth opposed him in an elaborate argument. I quote a remarkable passage from the despatch: "Truly I am of opinion, that in these matters of form it is the best not to be wiser than those that went before us, but 'stare super vias antiquas.' For better it is to follow the old track in this particular, than question the validity of all the statutes enacted since Poyning's act; for if this which is done in conformity therunto be not sufficient to warrant the summons of this present Parliament, then were all those Parliaments upon the same grounds unlawfully assembled, and consequently all their acts void; which is a point far better to sleep in peace, than unnecessarily or farther to be awakened."—Vol. i., p. 269.

* Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 134. More genuine and characteristic still was a letter he enclosed by the same messenger to Lord Carliile: "I am yet ingathering with all possible circumspection my observations, where, upon what, and when to advise a reformation, and to set myself into the way of it, under God's good blessing, and the conduct of his majesty's wisdom. I shall, before it be long, be ripe to return the fruit of my labours to be examined and considered on that side, and then rightly disposed to set them on work and pursue them here with effect, taking along with me those two great household gods, which ought always to be revered in the courts, and sway in the actions of princes—honour and justice. These councils, I confess, are secret ones, it being one of my chiefest cares to conceal my intentions from them all here, as they, with the same industry, pry into me, and sift every corner for them; and this I do, to the end I might, if it be possible, win from them ingenious and clear advice, which I am sure never to have if they once discover how I stand affected; for then it is the genius of this place to soothe the deputy, be he in the right or wrong, till they have insinuated themselves into the fruition of their own ends, and then at after to accuse him, even of those things wherein themselves had a principal share, as well in the counsel as in the execution. God deliver me from this ill sort of men, and give me grace so far to see into them beforehand, as that neither my master's service or myself suffer by them. My lord, I ever weary you when I begin, and judge how I should have troubled you if the wind had stood offener for England." The Earl of Strafford had melancholy and disastrous proof of the truth of that account by Wentworth "of the genius of that place." Some of the men who hunted him most fiercely to the scaffold were men that had been willing instruments of his worst power in Ireland.

† The origin of this act has been already adverted to. The popular leaders in England declaimed strongly against Wentworth's interpretation of it. If measures were produced, they maintained, of sufficient weight to satisfy the king and council, the intention of the law was fulfilled; for, they argued, it was never designed to preclude the members of Parliament, when once assembled, from introducing such other topics as they might deem expedient for the general welfare. Wentworth, on the other hand, strenuously contended that the express letter of the law was not to be thus evaded; that the previous approbation of the king and council was distinctly required to each proposition; and that no other measures could ever be made the subject of discussion. Surely, however, looking at the origin of the measure, the popular is the just construction. The act was designed, with a beneficial purpose, to lodge the initiative power of Parliament in the English council, as a protection against the tyranny of lords and deputies. But once establish this power, and the restraint was designed to terminate. Great was the opportunity, however, for Wentworth, and he made the most of it. Poynings' act was his shield. "I am of opinion," he writes to Cooke, "there cannot be anything invaded, which in reason of state ought to be by his majesty's deputy preserved with a more hallowed care, than Poynings' act, and which I shall never willingly suffer to be touched or blemished, more than my right eye."—Vol. i., p. 279. Again, when the English attorney proposed something which the lord-deputy feared might work against the stability of the Poynings' bill, Wentworth described it, "A mighty power gotten by the wisdom of former times; and it would be imputed to this age, I fear, as a mighty latchet by those that shall still succeed, should we now be so improvident as to lose it; and, for my own part, so zealous am I for the prerogatives of my master, so infinitely in love with this in especial, that my hand shall never be had as an instrument of so fatal a disservice to the crown as I judge the remittal or weakening this power would be."

gued, to issue from necessity, the Parliament would be imboldened to clog their grants with conditions, "and conditions are not to be admitted with any subjects, much less with this people, where your majesty's absolute sovereignty goes much higher than it is taken (perhaps) to be in England." A detailed plan succeeded his many and most emphatic reasons, which unquestionably "clinched" them. The Parliament that was to be summoned, Wentworth pledged himself should be divided into two sessions, the first of which should be exclusively devoted to the subject of supplies, while the second, which might be held six months afterward, should be occupied with the confirmation of the "graces," and other national measures, which his majesty so fearfully apprehended. Now the Parliament, Wentworth reasoned, would, in its first session, in all probability, grant a sufficient supply for the expenditure of three years, and this once secured, the "graces" might be flung over, if necessary. Farther, the lord-deputy pledged himself that he would procure the return of a nearly equal number of Protestants and Catholics to the House of Commons, in order that both parties, being nearly balanced against each other, might be more easily managed. He proposed, moreover, to obtain qualifications for a sufficient number of military officers, whose situations would render them dependant on propitiating the pleasure of the lord-deputy. Then, he urged, with the parties nearly equal, they might easily be kept in an equal condition of restraint and harmlessness, since the Catholics might be privately warned, that if no other provision was made for the maintenance of the army, it would be necessary to levy on them the legal fines; while all that was necessary to keep the Protestants in check would be to hint to them that, until a regular revenue was established, the king could not let go the voluntary contributions, or irritate the recusants by the enforcement of the penal statutes. "In the higher house," Wentworth concluded, "your majesty will have, I trust, the bishops wholly for you; the titular lords, rather than come over themselves, will put their proxies into such safe hands as may be thought of on this side; and in the rest, your majesty hath such interest, what out of duty to the crown, and obnoxiousness in themselves, as I do not apprehend much, indeed any, difficulty amongst them."

The whole of this extraordinary document is given in an appendix, and the reader is requested to turn to it there.

Let him turn afterward to the dying words of its author, and sympathize, if he can, with the declaration they conveyed, that "he was so far from being against Parliaments, that he did always think Parliaments in England to be the happy constitution of the kingdom and nation, and the best means, under God, to make the king and his people happy." In what sense these words were intended, under what dark veil their real object was concealed, the reader may now judge. It is uplifted before him. Those five sections by which Charles is "fully persuaded to condescend to the present calling of a Parliament"—the notice of the villainous juggle of the "two sessions," with which the wretched people are to be gulled—the chuckling mention of the advantage to be taken of “the frightful apprehension which at this time makes their hearts beat”—the complacent provision made for the alternative of their “starting aside”—the king who is to be able, and the minister who is to be ready, “to chastise such forgetfulness,” and “justly to punish so great a forfeit as this must needs be judged to be in them”—all these things have long ago been expiated by Wentworth and his master; but their damning record remains against those who would proclaim that expiation to have been unjustly demanded.

Overwhelmed by his minister's project, Charles at last yielded.* Still, even while, reluctantly, he consented, he could not see altogether clearly the necessity for “these things being done these ways,” and all the assurances of the lord-deputy could not prevent Charles bidding him, “as for that hydra, take good heed; for you know that here I have found it as well cunning as malicious. It is true that your grounds are well laid, and I assure you that I have a great trust in your care and judgment; yet my opinion is, that it will not be the worse for my service, though their obstinacy make you to break them, for I fear that they have some ground to demand more than it is fit for me to give. This I would not say if I had not confidence in your courage and dexterity; that, in that case, you would set me down there an example what to do here.”

Wentworth now issued his writs for a Parliament to be instantly held in Dublin, and great joy prevailed among the people. The privy council were summoned, in conformity with the provisions of the law of Poynings, to deliberate on the propositions to be transmitted to England as subjects for discussion in the session. “To gain this first entrance into the work,” Wentworth observes, “I thought it fit to intrust it in this manner with a committee, not only to expedite the thing itself the more, but also better to discover how their pulses beat, wherein I conceived they would deliver themselves more freely than if I had been present amongst them myself.” Soon, however, while the lord-deputy waited without, he was rejoined by his trusty counsellors Wandesford and Radcliffe, with the news that their associates were restive; that they were proposing all sorts of popular laws as necessary to conciliate the houses; and that, as to subsidies, they quite objected to transmitting a bill with blanks to be filled up at discretion, and were of opinion that the amount should be specified, and confined within the strictest limits of necessity. “I not knowing what this might grow to,” writes Wentworth, “went instantly unto them, where they were in council, and told them plainly I feared they began at the wrong end, thus consulting what might please the people in a Parliament, when it would better become a privy council to consider what might please the king, and induce him to call one.” The imperious deputy next addressed them in a very long and able speech, pressed upon them the necessities of the nation, and the only modes of arresting them. “The king therefore desires,” he continued, “this great work may be set on his right foot, settled by Parliament as the more beaten path he covets to walk in. yet not more legal than if done by his prerogative royal, where the ordinary way fails him. If this people, then, can be so unwise as to cast off his gracious proposals and their own safety, it must be done without them; and for myself, as their true friend, I must let them know that I cannot doubt but they will altogether save me the trouble, hasten in their advice, and afford their best means for the fulfilling these his so good intentions. That, as a faithful servant to my master, I shall counsel his majesty to attempt it first by the ordinary means; disappointed there, where he may with so much right expect it, I could not, in a cause so just and necessary, deny to appear for him in the head of that army, and there either persuade them fully his majesty had reason on his side, or else think it a great honour to die in the pursuit of that wherein both justice and piety had so far convinced my judgment as not left me wherewithal to make one argument for denying myself unto commands so justly called for and laid upon me. In conclusion, Wentworth gave them a still more characteristic warning: “Again I did beseech them to look well about, and be wise by others’ harms. They were not ignorant of the misfortunes these meetings had run in England of late years; that therefore they were not to strike their foot upon the same stone of distrust which had so often broken them; for I could tell them as one that had, it may be, held my eyes as open upon those proceedings as another man, that what other accident this mischief might be ascribed unto, there was nothing else that brought it upon us but the king’s standing justly to have the honour of trust from his people, and an ill-grounded, narrow suspicion of theirs, which would not be ever entreated, albeit it stood with all the reason and wisdom in the world. This was that spirit of the air that walked in darkness betwixt them, abusing both, whereon if once one beam of light and truth had happily reflected, it had vanished like smoke before it!”

The council could not hold to one of their purposes in the presence of such overawing energy, “whereupon they did, with all cheerfulness, assent unto the council; professed they would entirely conform themselves unto it; acknowledged it was most reasonable this

* See Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 236-241, for the despatch, in which these things are all most happily described. Laud, in a subsequent letter, gives Wentworth some account of the way in which the despatch had been received. I extract one amusing passage: “The next day, at Greenwich, your despatch to Secretary Cooke was read to the committee, the king present, order given for us to meet, and for speed of our answer to you. If speed be not made to your mind, I am not in fault, and I hope you will have all things in time. Everybody liked your carriage and discourse to the council, but thought it too long, and that too much strength was put upon it; but you may see what it is to be an able speaker. Your old friend says he had rather see you talk something into the exchequer, but he pleases himself extremely to see how able Brutus is in the senate-house! And wot you what? When we came to this passage in your despatch, ‘Again I did beseech them to look well about, and to be wise by others’ harms; they were not ignorant of the misfortunes these meetings had run in England of late years,’ &c. Here a good friend of yours interposed, ‘quorum pars magna fui.’ I hope you will charge this home upon my Lord Cottington; he hath so many Spanish tricks, that I cannot tell how to trust him for anything but making of legs to fair ladies.”—Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 235, 236.

kingdom should defray itself; that they would not offer the pardon, or any other act that might bear the interpretation of a condition; that they would send over no other laws but such as I should like; nay, if I pleased, they would send over the bill of subsidy alone.”*

Another obstruction remained, which was as fiercely and immediately disposed of. The council had ventured to suggest to the lord-deputy the existence of an ancient custom, whereby the Lords of the Pale claimed the right of being consulted respecting the projected measures, but which Wentworth had at once silenced by “a direct and round answer.” Four days after this, however, the Earl of Fingal, on behalf of his brother peers, obtained an interview, and, as the deputy described, “very gravely, and in a kind of elaborate way, told me,” &c., &c. It is simply necessary to add, that so peremptory and supremely contemptuous was Wentworth’s reception of these traditional claims, that the Lord Fingal was fain to escape from his presence with a submissive apology.†

Nothing remained now but the elections. Some difficulty attended them at the first, but one or two resolute measures quelled it.‡ In July, 1634, an admirably balanced party of Catholics and Protestants assembled in the Irish House of Commons.

With extraordinary pomp and ceremony§ the lord-deputy proceeded to meet them. His speech, however, was more startling than his splendour. He began by telling them that two sessions should be held; and that the first, “according to the natural order,” should be devoted to the sovereign, and the second to the subject. “In demanding supplies,” he continued, “I only require you to provide for your own safety; I expect, therefore, your contributions will be both liberal and permanent: that is, there must be a standing revenue (mark it well) provided by you to supply and settle the constant payments of the army; for it is far below my great master to come at every year’s end, with his hat in his hand, to entreat that you would be pleased to preserve yourselves.” Moreover, he told them that, if they expected constant protection without contributing towards it, they looked for more than had ever been the portion of a “conquered kingdom.” A bitter warning succeeded this of the fate of English Parliaments. “Take heed,” he said, in a lesson from his own patriotic experiences, “take heed of private meetings and consultations in your chambers, by design and privy aforehand to contrive how to discourse and carry the public affairs when you come into the houses; for, besides that they are in themselves unlawful, and punishable in a grievous measure, I never knew them in all my experience to do any good to the public or to any particular man. I have often known them do much harm to both.” With these were mingled some just entreatments. “Divide not nationally betwixt English and Irish. The king makes no distinction betwixt you, but reputes you all without prejudice, and that upon safe and true grounds, I assure myself, his good and faithful subjects. And madness it were in you, then, to raise that wall of separation amongst yourselves. If you should, you know who the old proverb deems likeliest to go to the wall; and, believe me, England will not prove the weakest. But, above all, divide not between the interests of the king and his people, as if there were one being of the king, and another being of his people.” He concluded with a distinct statement, that their conduct during the session should be attended, according to its results, with punishment or reward.*

Not in words only, but equally in the manner of its delivery, did this speech proclaim the despotic genius of Lord Wentworth. Here he resorted to all those arts which, as I have before remarked, are essentially necessary to the success of the despot; and illustrated, by conduct which to such superficial statesmen as my Lord Cottington seemed vain and unnecessary, his profound knowledge of character. “Well,” he writes to his more relying friend the Archbishop of Canterbury, “well, spoken it is since, good or bad I cannot tell whether; but sure I am not able yet to help myself to a copy of it. But as it was, I spake it not betwixt my teeth, but so loud and heartily that I protest unto you I was faint withal at the present, and the worse for it two or three days after. It makes no matter, for this way I was assured they should have sound at least, with how little weight soever it should be attended. And the success was answerable; for had it been low and mildly delivered, I might perchance have gotten from them, it was pretty well; whereas this way, filling one of their senses with noise, and amusing the rest with earnestness and vehemence, they swear (yet forgive them, they know not what they say!) it was the best spoken they ever heard in their lives. Let Cottington crack me that nut now.”†

Secure of his measures, Wentworth demanded at once the enormous grant of six subsi-

* Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 255. To this Wentworth shrewdly subjoins, “But I, not thinking it fit it should come so singly from the king without some expression of care for the good government of his people, have caused it to be accompanied, as you will receive it, by this express.”

† See the deputy’s own account, Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 246, 247.

‡ “The priests and Jesuits here,” writes Wentworth, in a very able despatch to Cooke, “are very busy in the election of knights and burgesses for this Parliament, call the people to their masses, and there charge them, on pain of excommunication, to give their voice with no Protestant. I purpose hereafter to question some of them, being, indeed, a very insufferable thing for them thus to interpose, in causes which are purely civil, and of passing ill consequence to warm and inflame the subjects one against another; and, in the last resort, to bring it to a direct party of Protestant and Papist, which surely is to be avoided as much as may be, unless our numbers were the greater. A sheriff that, being set on by these fellows, carried himself mutiniously in the election of burgesses for this town, we brought into the Castle Chamber upon an ore tenus, where, upon what he had set under his hand, we fined him £200, and £500 more for his contempt in refusing to set his hand to another part of his examination, both at the council board and in open court, disabling him for ever bearing that office hereafter in this city; which wrought so good an effect, as giving order presently for choosing of a new sheriff, and going on the next day with the election again, the voices were all orderly taken; and the conformable proving the greater number, Catelin, the king’s sergeant and recorder of this town, and Alderman Barry, a Protestant, were chosen; the former whereof I intend to make the speaker, being a very able man for that purpose, and one I assure myself will in all things apply himself to his majesty’s service.”—Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 260.

§ “It was the greatest civility and splendour,” writes Wentworth, “Ireland ever saw. A very gallant nobility and gentry appeared, far above that I expected.”—Vol. i., p. 276. See a programme in the Biog. Brit., vol. vii., p. 4184, 4185.

* Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 287-290.

† Ibid., p. 273.

dies.* With the view, at the same time, of preventing the possibility of the parties communicating in any way with each other, and so cutting from beneath them every ground of mutual reliance, he introduced the proposition to the House on the second day of their meeting. Ignorant of each other's sentiments—incapable of anything like a plan of opposition—nothing was left for Protestants and Catholics but to seek to rival each other, as it were, in the devotion of loyalty. The subsidies were voted unconditionally,† and one voice of profound respect for the lord-deputy rose from all.‡ Not less successful was his management of the convocation of Irish clergy, which had been summoned with Parliament, and from whom eight subsidies were ultimately procured. Fortified with his money bills, and just as the session was on the eve of closing, Wentworth turned with contempt to the proceedings of the House of Lords.§ Here had been opposition

* He had great difficulty in inducing the privy council to accede to this. At last he prevailed: "Sir Adam Loftus," as he writes to Cooke, "first beginning the dance, which is now the second time he hath done the king passing good service in this kind."—Vol. i., p. 259. Not a single service did Lord Wentworth ever receive without acknowledging it strongly to the king, accompanied by the special naming of those who had so served him.

† These were the first "settled subsidies" that had ever been paid in Ireland. See Papers, vol. i., p. 307.

‡ See Stafford Papers, vol. i., p. 277-279. One restive member there was, and one only. This was Sir Robert Talbot; who, having mentioned Wentworth without a sufficiently awful respect, was instantly expelled, and committed to custody till, on his knees, he begged pardon of the deputy. Commons' Journ., vol. i., p. 116. Leland, vol. iii., p. 18. One case may be added to this of a very different character, in proof that, when Wentworth saw the means of advancing the public service, even at the cost of some personal consideration, he did not care to waive the latter. Among the proclamations he had issued to regulate the Parliamentary sitting, he expressly forbade the entrance of any member of either house with his sword, and all obeyed this except the young Earl of Ormond, who told the usher of the black rod that he should have no sword of his except through his body. Equally resolute was his answer to the fiery questioning of the lord-deputy himself, quietly producing his majesty's writ, which had called him to Parliament "cinctum cum gladio," or "per cincturum gladii." The doubt then occurred to the deputy of the superior value of young Ormond's service to his enmity; and, after consultation with "his two friends, Sir George Radcliffe and Mr. Wandesford," the youth was taken into favour. I am obliged to Mr. Crofton Croker for the favour of this note, which I find in a manuscript translation he has been good enough to lend me, of the Irish portion of the travels of a gasconading coxcomb of a Frenchman, Sieur de la Boullaye-le-Gouz, who honoured the island with his company in 1644, and obliged the world with a most amusing account of his visit. This very Ormond was then viceroy, and the part he had himself played to Lord Wentworth was curiously enough rivalled on this occasion by the illustrious Le Gouz. "I followed the train," observes our traveller, in Mr. Croker's happy translation, "in order to enter more freely into the castle, but at the door they ordered me to lay down my sword, which I would not do, saying that, being born of a condition to carry it before the king, I would rather not see the castle than part with my arms. A gentleman in the suite of the viceroy, seeing from my gallant bearing that I was a Frenchman, took me by the hand, saying, 'Strangers shall on this occasion be more favoured than residents,' and he brought me in. I replied to him that his civility equalled—that of the French towards his nation, when they met them in France!"

§ It was one of the strokes of the lord-deputy's policy to aggravate every difference between the two houses. He describes, with singular sarcasm, in one of his despatches, a difference of this sort. "The Commons would not confer with the Lords unless they might sit and be covered as well as their lordships, which the other would by no means admit. For my part I did not lay it very near my heart to agree them, as having heretofore seen the effects which follow when they are in strict understanding, or at difference amongst themselves. I saw plainly that keeping them at distance I did avoid their joining in a petition for the graces."—Stafford Papers, vol. i., p. 279.

—the positive enactment of various salutary regulations—the consideration of grievances! "I let them alone," says one of his despatches, "till the last day that I came into the House to conclude the session; but then, being very jealous lest in my time anything might creep in, and grow upon the king's prerogative in this tender and important particular,* I clearly declared they had therein proceeded farther than they had warrant for . . . and did beseech their lordships to be better advised for the future, and not to exceed that power which was left them by that law, to wit, a liberty only to offer by petition to the deputy and council such considerations as they might conceive to be good for the Commonwealth, by them to be transmitted for laws, or staid, as to them should seem best; whereunto they condescended without any opposition."

The English ministers were rapt in delight and astonishment! As the time approached, however, for the second session—the session of "graces"—a shadow fell over their congratulations. Buckled with his law of Poynings, the lord-deputy bravely reassured them. "For my own part," he wrote to Cooke, in the apt simile of an amusement which he was then, in the intervals of his bodily infirmities, ardently given to, "for my own part, I see not any hazard in it, considering that we have this lyme bound in our power, still to take off when we please; which is not so easy with your Parliaments of England, where sometimes they hunt loose, forth of command, choose and give over their own game as they list themselves."† Farther, however, to quiet the apprehensions of Charles, and induce him to suffer the continuance of Parliament, Wentworth wrote to the king, telling him that the lord-deputy and his council meant to take on themselves the whole responsibility and blame of refusing the obnoxious graces, while the whole merit of granting such as might be granted safely should be given to his majesty.‡

Wentworth redeemed his pledge. It is unnecessary to describe the proceedings of that session at any length. Suffice it to say, that the arts and energy of the first session were redoubled to a greater success in the second. None of the obnoxious graces were accorded. He openly told the Parliament that he had refused even to transmit them to England, and asserted his right to do this under the law of Poynings.§ For a time, the overbearing ener-

* The law of Poynings.

† Stafford Papers, vol. i., p. 305. Wentworth preserved through life, notwithstanding his frightful illnesses, the most passionate fondness for hunting and hawking. It is curious to observe, in his accounts of these amusements, an occasional letting out of another object he may have had in them, besides that of personal enjoyment. They gave him an opportunity of display. "Your defeat of your hawking sport in Wiltshire," he writes at about this time to Cottington, "is nothing like to mine; for (as the man you wot of said by the pigeons) here hath not been a partridge in the memory of man, so as having a passing high-flying tarsell I am even setting him down, and to-morrow purpose, with a cast or two of spar-hawks, to betake myself to fly at black-birds, ever and anon taking them on the pate with a trunk. It is excellent sport, there being sometimes 200 horse on the field looking upon us, where the Lord of Fonsail drops out of doors with a poor falconer or two; and if Sir Robert Wind and Gabriel Epsley be gotten along, it is a regale."—Stafford Papers, vol. i., p. 163.

‡ See Stafford Papers, vol. i., p. 328. And see the despatch to Cooke, vol. i., p. 338.

§ See Stafford Papers, vol. i., p. 345, et seq.

gy of his measures forced the members to the silence of fear; but this was broken by the Catholic party, who, having suffered the most grievous wrong in the deception, at last made a feeble show of resistance. Wentworth instantly flung all his influence for the first time among the Protestants, and precipitated the Catholics into a trial of their strength, unadvised with each other, and utterly unprepared. They were at once defeated. The Protestants then claimed their reward, and with an earnestness which was only finally subdued by the lord-deputy's threats of worse terrors than those which their wrongs included.* He had nothing left now but to write one of his most pleasing despatches to his royal master, containing "at once a clear and full relation of the issue of this second session, which was, through the wayward frowardness of the Popish party, so troublesome upon the first access, but is now recovered and determined by the good assistance of the Protestants, with great advantage to your majesty, by those excellent and beneficial laws which, with much tugging, are gotten from them; and all the graces prejudicial to the crown laid also so sound asleep as I am confident they are never to be awakened more."† In the next despatch he had the satisfaction of assuring his majesty that the privilege of impeachment had been wrested both from Lords and Commons;‡ in the next, that certain troubles of the convocation had been most emphatically silenced;§ and in the next, that his majesty was now, in the person of his humble deputy, the uncontrolled disposer of the destinies of Ireland! "So now I can say," wrote Wentworth at the close of a long despatch, which by the same messenger he had forwarded to Laud, and which contains a remarkable summary of the many important services he had rendered to the crown, "so now I can say the king is as absolute here as any prince in the whole world can be, and may be still, if it be not spoiled on that side; for so long as his majesty shall have here a deputy of faith and understanding, and that he be preserved in credit, and independent upon any but the king himself, let it be laid as a ground, it is the deputy's fault if the king be denied any reasonable desire."

This was grateful news to Laud. Of all the suggesters of the infamous counsels of Charles, Laud and Wentworth were the most sincere: Laud, from the intense faith with which he looked forward to the possible supremacy of the ecclesiastical power, and to which he was bent upon going "thorough," through every obstacle; Wentworth, from that strong sense with which birth and education had perverted his genius, of the superior excellence of despotical rule. Their friendship, in consequence, notwithstanding Wentworth's immense superiority in point of intellect,* continued tolerably firm and steady—most firm, indeed, considering the nature of their public connexion.† The letters which passed between them partook of a more intimate character, in respect of the avowal of ulterior designs, than either of them, probably, chose to avow elsewhere; and though many of their secrets have been effectually concealed from us by their frequent use of ciphers, sufficient remain to shadow forth the extremest purposes of both.

Laud had to regret his position in England, contrasted with that of the Irish deputy. "My lord," he writes to Wentworth, speaking of the general affairs of Church and State, "to speak freely, you may easily promise more in either kind than I can perform; for as for the Church, it is so bound up in the forms of the common law, that it is not possible for me, or for any man, to do that good which he would, or is bound to do. For your lordship sees, no man clearer, that they which have gotten so much power in and over the Church will not let go their hold; they have, indeed, fangs with a witness, whatsoever I was once said in a passion to have. And for the State, indeed, my lord, I am for thorough; but I see that both thick and thin stays somebody, where I conceive it should not; and it is impossible for me to go thorough alone. Besides, private ends are such blocks in the public way, and lie so thick, that you may promise what you will, and I must perform what I can,

* "I roundly and earnestly told them I was very indifferent what resolution the House should fall upon, serving too just and gracious a master ever to fear to be answerable for the success of affairs in contingency, so long as I did sincerely and faithfully endeavour that which I conceived to be for the best. That there were two ends I had my eye on, and the one I would infallibly attain unto—either a submission of the people to his majesty's just demands, or a just occasion of breach, and either would content the king. The first was undeniably and evidently best for them; but could my master in his goodness consider himself apart from his subjects, or these become so ingrate, I spoke it confidently upon the peril of my head, a breach should be better for him than any supply they could give him in Parliament. And therefore I did desire that no man should deceive himself: my master was not to seek in his counsels, nor was he a prince that either could or would be denied just things." For the various incidents of this session, see Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 320, 321, 325, 339, 341, 343, 344, 345, 349, 353.

† In the same despatch (which see in Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 341), Wentworth urges upon the king the necessity of his surrendering matters of patronage and so forth more immediately into his lord-deputy's hands: "The fewer sharers in the service, the fewer there will be to press for rewards, to the lessening of your majesty's profit, and the more entire will the benefit be preserved for your own crown; which must, in all these affairs, and shall, be my principal, nay, indeed, MY SOLE END."

‡ See the case of Sir Vincent Gookin, Papers, vol. i., p. 349 and 393. Wentworth established by this case, that, under Poyning's law, acts of judicature no less than of legislation were prohibited, save by consent of the deputy and his council.

§ See Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 342-345. "I am not ignorant," subjoined Wentworth to this despatch, with a sort of involuntary forecast of an after reckoning, which he threw off in a self-deceiving jest, "I am not ignorant that my stirring herein will be strangely reported, and censured on that side; and how I shall be able to sustain myself against your Prynnes, Pims, and Bens, with the rest of that generation of odd names and natures, the Lord knows."

* It is amusing, at times, to observe the commissions to which Wentworth descended for the gratification of Laud, laughing at them secretly while he gravely discharged them. The archbishop himself, however, had an occasional suspicion of this, and is to be seen at times insinuating, from beneath velvet words, a cat-like claw: "I perceive you mean to build," he writes to the lord-deputy on one occasion, "but as yet your materials are not come in; but if that work do come to me before Christmas, as you promise it shall, I will rifle every corner in it: and you know, my good lord, after all your bragging, how I served you at York, and your church work there: especially, I pray, provide a good riding house, if there be ever a decayed body of a church to make it in, and then you shall be well fitted, for you know one is made your stable already, if you have not reformed it, of which I did look for an account according to my remembrances before this time."—Vol. i., p. 156. Wentworth had forgotten one of his friend's first commissions, which the reader will recollect to have been quoted.

† A curious and instructive essay might be gleaned from the Strafford Papers on the subject of the friendships of statesmen, or, rather say, of a king's advisers, for the majority of these men did not deserve the name of statesmen.

and no more."* To this Wentworth answers in a letter which is not preserved. Its import, however, may be gathered from this remarkable passage in Laud's rejoinder: "I am very glad to read your lordship so resolute, and more to hear you affirm that the footing of them which go thorough for our master's service is not now upon fee, as it hath been. But you are withal upon so many ifs, that by their help you may preserve any man upon ice, be it never so slippery. As, first, if the common lawyers may be contained within their ancient and sober bounds; if the word thorough be not left out (as I am certain it is); if we grow not faint; if we ourselves be not in fault; if it come not to peccatum ex te Israel; if others will do their parts as thoroughly as you promise for yourself, and justly conceive of me. Now, I pray, with so many and such ifs as these, what may not be done, and in a brave and noble way! But can you tell when these ifs will meet, or be brought together?"† Satisfactory is the lord-deputy's returning assurance: "For the ifs your lordship is pleased to impute unto me, you shall hereafter have more positive doctrine. I know no reason, then, but you may as well rule the common lawyers in England, as I, poor beagle, do here; and yet that I do, and will do, in all that concerns my master's service, upon the peril of my head. I am confident that the king, being pleased to set himself in the business, is able, by his wisdom and ministers, to carry any just and honourable action thorough all imaginary opposition, for real there can be none; that to start aside for such panic fears, fantastic apparitions, as a Prynne or an Eliot shall set up, were the meanest folly in the whole world; that the debts of the crown taken off, you may govern as you please; and most resolute I am that work may be done, without borrowing any help forth of the king's lodgings, and that is as downright a peccatum ex te Israel as ever was, if all this be not effected with speed and ease."‡

Resolutely did the lord-deputy, as I have shown, realize these principles, and every new act of despotism which struck terror into Ireland shot comfort to the heart of Laud. "As for my marginal note," exclaims the archbishop, "I see you deciphered it well, and I see you make use of it too; do so still—thorow and thorow. Oh that I were where I might go so too! but I am shackled between delays and uncertainties. You have a great deal of honour here for your proceedings. Go on a God's name!"§ And on Wentworth went, stopping at no gratuitous quarrel that had the slightest chance of pleasing the archbishop, even to the demolishing the family tomb of the Earl of Cork, since his grace, among his select ecclesiastical researches, had discovered that the spot occupied by my Lord of Cork's family monuments was precisely that spot upon which the communion-table, to answer the purposes of heaven, ought to stand!|| To minister to their mutual purposes, Wentworth also introduced into Ireland the Court of High Commission, and wrested it to various notable purposes, political as well as religious.

The distinction between him and his confederate during all these proceedings is, nevertheless, to be discerned as widely as the difference of their respective intellects. Wentworth was a despot, but his despotism included many noble, though misguided purposes. Even with this High Commission Court, unjustifiable as were the means, he unquestionably effected an increase to the respectability and usefulness of the clergy, and reformed the ecclesiastical courts, while, at the same time, he never lost sight of the great present object of his government, that it should, "in the way to all these, raise, perhaps, a good revenue to the crown."* So, while Laud, in England, was, by a series of horrible persecutions, torturing and mutilating the Puritans,† the deputy of Ireland could boast with perfect truth that, "since I had the honour to be employed in this place, no hair of any man's head hath been touched for the free exercise of his conscience."‡

It is also due to Wentworth to observe, that while, at this time, with a view to the furtherance of his general scheme of government, he conceived the vast and unattainable project of reducing all the people of Ireland to a conformity in religion, the measures by which he sought to accomplish that project were, many of them, conceived in the profoundest spirit of a large and wide-reaching policy. Theological strife he knew the useless horrors of; and he soon discovered, by his "experience of both houses," that "the root of all disorders in this kingdom is the universal dependance of the popish faction upon Jesuits and friars."§ He speedily declared his determination to the king himself. "I judge it, without all question, far the greatest service that can be done unto your crowns illustrating, in a remarkable degree, the general features of his character. I may refer the reader respecting this affair of the Earl of Cork to the Stafford Papers, vol. i., p. 156, 200, 216, 222, 257, 298, 379, 459, and to vol. ii., p. 270 and p. 338. Lord Cork hit upon an ingenious plan of thwarting the lord-deputy, though it failed in consequence of the superior influence of the latter. He wrote to the Lord-treasurer Weston, then notoriously jealous of Wentworth, and opposed to him and Laud, "entreating his favour, for that under this monument the bones of a Weston were entombed."* Stafford Papers, vol. i., p. 187.

† "Mr. Prynne, prisoner in the Tower, who hath got his ears sewed on that they grow again as before to his head, is relapsed into new errors."—Letter of his newsmonger, Gerrard, to Wentworth, Stafford Papers, vol. i., p. 266. Again Prynne's ears expiated those "new errors." Laud's own notice in his diary (Nov., 1630) of the punishment of Leighton, a Scotch divine, the father of Bishop Leighton, is more horrible: "Friday, Nov. 16, part of his sentence was executed upon him in this manner, in the new palace at Westminster, in term time. 1. He was severely whipped before he was put in the pillory. 2. Being set in the pillory, he had one of his ears cut off. 3. One side of his nose slit. 4. Branded on one cheek with a red-hot iron, with the letters S. S. And, on that day sevennight, his sores upon his back, ear, nose, and face being not cured, he was whipped again at the pillory in Cheapside, and there had the remainder of his sentence executed upon him, by cutting off the other ear, slitting the other side of the nose, and branding the other cheek." Leighton was released, after ten years' captivity, by the Long Parliament, having by that time lost his sight, his hearing, and the use of his limbs.

‡ See his letter to Con, the popish resident, Stafford Papers, vol. ii., p. 112. His correspondences with this person are in all respects curious, and, to me, significant of a purpose which his death prevented the open disclosure of. § Stafford Papers, vol. i., p. 431, 432.

* Stafford Papers, vol. i., p. 111.

† Ibid., p. 155.

‡ Stafford Papers, vol. i., p. 173. Following this passage, in the same letter, is the language which it would be a gross outrage of decency to quote. The archbishop appears to have relished it exceedingly.

§ Stafford Papers, vol. i., p. 329.

|| It would be impossible to notice in detail the various personal contests in which Wentworth engaged, though none of them passed, not even the most trifling, without on this side, to draw Ireland into a conformity of religion with England; which, indeed, would undoubtedly set your majesty in greater strength and safety within your own dominions than anything now left by the great and happy wisdom of yourself and blessed father unaccomplished, to make us an happy and secure people within ourselves; and yet, this being a work rather to be effected by judgment and degrees than by a giddy zeal and haste, whenever it shall seem good in your wisdom to attempt it (for I am confident it is left as a means whereby to glorify your majesty's piety to posterity), there will, in the way towards it, many things fall continually in debate and consideration at the board, with which it will be very unfit any of the contrary religion be acquainted.*

Urged by the English council, he set about the great work. Undisguised was the astonishment of the archbishop, however, at the slow and gradual means proposed by the lord-deputy. His grace had fancied that the trouts who had been so completely tickled out of their money† might be as easily tickled out of their religion, or anything else. The Lord Wentworth thought differently. "It will be ever far forth of my heart," he wrote, in answer to urgent pressings of the question, accompanied with especial requests for the enforcing of fines for nonconformity, "to conceive that a conformity in religion is not above all other things principally to be intended; for, undoubtedly, till we be brought all under one form of divine service, the crown is never safe on this side; but yet the time and circumstances may very well be discoursed, and sure I do not hold this a fit season to disquiet or sting them in this kind; and my reasons are divers. This course alone will never bring them to church, being rather an engine to drain money out of their pockets than to raise a right belief and faith in their hearts, and so doth not, indeed, tend to that end it sets forth. The subsidies are now in paying, which were given with a universal alacrity; and very graceful it will be in the king to indulge them otherwise as much as may be till they be paid. It were too much at once to distemper them by bringing plantations upon them, and disturbing them in the exercise of their religion, so long as it be without scandal. And so, indeed, very inconsiderate, as I conceive, to move in this latter, till that former be fully settled, and by that means the Protestant party become by much the stronger, which, in truth, as yet I do not conceive it to be. Lastly, the great work of reformation ought not, in my opinion, to be fallen upon till all incidents be fully provided for, the army rightly furnished, the forts repaired, money in the coffers, and such a preparation in view as might deter any malevolent licentious spirit to stir up ill humour in opposition to his majesty's pious intendments therein; nor ought the execution of this to proceed by step or degrees, but all rightly dispersed, to be undertaken and gone through withal at once. And certainly, in the mean time, the less you call the conceit of it into their memory, the better it will be for us, and themselves the quieter; so, as if there were no wiser than I, the bishops should be privately required to forbear these ecclesiastical censures till they understood farther of his majesty's pleasure therein."*

Steadily he proceeded, as if already, in the far but not uncertain distance, he saw the accomplishment of this extraordinary design. He began at what he conceived to be the root of the evil. The churches had fallen to ruin; the Church revenues had been cut to pieces by long leases and fraudulent appropriations; and the offices of the Church had been given into the hands of the ignorant, since to such only the abject poverty of her means offered any of the inducements of service.† "Now," wrote Wentworth to the still precipitate archbishop, "to attempt the reducing of this kingdom to a conformity in religion with the Church of England, before the decays of the material churches here be repaired, an able clergy be provided, so that there might be both wherewith to receive, instruct, and keep the people, were as a man going to warfare without munition or arms. It being, therefore, most certain that this to be wished reformation must first work from ourselves, I am bold to transmit over to your grace these few propositions, for the better ordering this poor Church, which hath thus long laid in the silent dark. The best entrance to the cure will be clearly to discover the state of the patient, which I find many ways distempered: an unlearned clergy, which have not so much as the outward form of churchmen to cover themselves with, nor their persons any ways revered or protected; the churches unbuilt; the parsonage and vicarage houses utterly ruined; the people untaught through the non-residency of the clergy, occasioned by the unlimited shameful numbers of spiritual promotions with cure of souls, which they hold by commendams; the rites and ceremonies of the Church run over without all decency of habit, order, or gravity, in the course of their service; the possessions of the Church, to a great proportion, in lay hands; the bishops farming out their jurisdictions to mean and unworthy persons;" and so, through all the sources of the evil, in a despatch of elaborate learning and profound suggestion, the lord-deputy proceeds, enforcing upon the archbishop, finally, that he must surrender his present hopes of any immediate result. "It would be a brainsick zeal and a godly reformation, truly," he exclaims, in a supplementary despatch of yet greater energy and earnestness, "to force a conformity to a religion, whereas yet there is hardly to be found a church to receive, or an able minister to teach the people. No, no; let us fit ourselves in these two, and settle his majesty's payments for the army, discharge his debts, and then have with them and spare not! I believe the hottest will not set his foot faster or farther on

* Strafford Papers, vol. ii., p. 49.

† "Now, fie upon it, if the salmon of that river be bad, yet your loss is the less, since you have so many trouts that may be tickled into anything, or anything out of them."—Laud to Wentworth, Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 329.

† The reader will be startled, probably, to hear the value of some of the Irish bishoprics in that day. "The old Bishop of Kilfenora," writes Wentworth to Laud, "is dead, and his bishopric one of those which, when it falls, goes a begging for a new husband, being not worth above fourscore pounds to the last man; yet in the handling of an understanding prelate it might perchance grow to be worth two hundred pounds, but then it will cost money in suit."—Strafford Papers, vol. ii., p. 172.

than I shall do. In the mean time, I appeal to any equal-minded man whether they or I be more in the right."

Unparalleled were the confidence and self-possessed resource with which Wentworth's great schemes now ran side by side. At one and the same moment he forced the revenue by which his projected buildings in the Church were to be raised, and cleared away the obstructions which still covered the sites he had selected. The decision of ecclesiastical rights was removed by him from the courts of common law to the Castle-chamber; the Earl of Cork was forced to restore an annual revenue of £2000 which had been originally wrested from the Church; and, understanding that the Bishop of Killala had been meddling with underhand bargains to defraud his see, he sent for him to the presence chamber, and told him, with open and bitter severity, that he deserved to have his surplice pulled over his ears, and to be turned out of the Church on a stipend of four nobles a year!* His usual success followed these measures; lands and tithes came pouring into his hands; and he issued a commission for the repair of churches, and won for it a ready obedience.†

In the midst of his labours, Wentworth turned aside, for a moment, to prefer a personal suit to the king. Consideration in the eyes of those over whom he held so strict and stern a hand was beyond all things valuable to him. It was, indeed, the very material of his scheme of government. He appears, therefore, to have felt at this time that some sudden and great promotion from the king to himself would give his government an exaltation in the eyes of that "wild and rude people," of infinite importance to its security. His claims upon the king were immeasurable, as his services had been admitted to be. He wrote to him to solicit an earldom. "The ambition," he said, "which moves me powerfully to serve your majesty, as my obligations are above those that preceded in this employment, suggests unto me an hope I may be more enabled in these restless desires of mine, if I might, before our meeting again in Parliament, receive so great a mark of your favour as to have this family honoured with an earldom. I have chosen, therefore, with all humbleness, to address these lines immediately to yourself, as one utterly purposed to acknowledge all to your princely grace, and without deriving the least of the privy of thanks elsewhere." A characteristic desire closed the letter, that "no other person know hereafter your majesty found it in your wisdom not fit to be done."‡ And such was Charles's shortsighted and selfish wisdom! He refused the request. It was sufficient for his purpose that Wentworth was now indissolubly bound to him, since the personal hatred his measures had already excited in the English popular party precluded the possibility of his return to them. Nor had Wentworth provoked the hatred of the popular party alone. Under his superior tyranny, the lords of petty despotism had been crushed,* and incapable oppressors had become the lord-deputy's fiercest accusers of oppression. To please the king, moreover, he had taken upon himself the refusal of various offices to his more importunate courtiers, careless of the odium he provoked and scorned. To heap upon him any marks of personal favour, under such circumstances, was an act of courage and honesty which the weak monarch did not dare attempt. Such wretched tools as Buckingham were more to his personal liking, though less in the balance of his treasury! "I desire you not to think," he wrote, after refusing the lord-deputy's suit, "that I am displeased with the asking, though for the present I grant it not; for I acknowledge that noble minds are always accompanied with lawful ambitions. And be confident that your services have moved me more than it is possible for any eloquence or importunity to do; so that your letter was not the first proposer of putting marks of favour on you; and I am certain that you will willingly stay my time, now ye know my mind so freely, that I may do all things a mi modo."†

This refusal was sorely felt by Wentworth. Covering their allusion to the king, he threw into his next despatch to Cottington some expressions of uneasy regret. "I spend more here than I have of entertainments from his majesty; I suffer extremely in my own private at home; I spend my body and spirits with extreme toil; I sometimes undergo the misconstructions of those I conceived should not, would not have used me so. . . . But I am resolved to complain of nothing. I have been something unprosperous, slowly heard, and as coldly answered that way. I will either subsist by the integrity of my own actions, or I will perish."‡

The lord-deputy's relief was in the measures with which his enterprising genius had surrounded him. I have alluded to his repression of certain turbulences that had arisen in the convocation: he now, by his personal influence, prevailed with the learned Usher to surrender

* His inquiries into questionable titles and church grants had exploded many a little tyrant, though in this way much private wrong was done. The servants of the English court, however, could never exactly understand his policy in respect of opposition to the aristocracy, and especially his habit of sternly refusing any presents or conciliatory favours from them. I quote a characteristic passage from a despatch of the Secretary Windebank: "Though, while we had the happiness and honour to have your assistance here at the council board, you made many ill faces with your pen (pardon), I beseech your lordship, the over free censure of your Vandyking), and worse oftentimes with your speeches, especially in the business of the Lord Falconberg, Sir Thomas Gore, Vermuyden, and others, yet I understand you make worse there in Ireland, and there never appeared a worse face under a cork upon a bottle, than your lordship hath caused some to make in disgorging such church livings as their zeal had eaten up. Another remarkable error of your lordship, which makes much noise here, is that you refuse all presents, for which, in one particular, you had your reward; for it is said that a servant bringing you a present from his master, and your lordship refusing it, the servant likewise would have none of your reward. By this your lordship may perceive how circumspect you have reason to be of your ways, considering how many malicious eyes are upon you, and what interpretations they make of your actions."—Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 161.

† Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 332.

‡ Ibid., p. 354.

* See the Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 151–156, 171, 280, &c.

† One or two of the most remarkable of the measures he projected incidental to this purpose of conformity may be mentioned here. The reader must examine Wentworth's various despatches, if he desires to master the knowledge of them all. He took resolute steps to prevent the children of Catholics from being sent to foreign convents for their education. He proposed the erection of a vast number of Protestant schools throughout Ireland, with large endowments and able teachers. He enforced the most rigorous penalties upon non-residence. See Papers, vol. i., p. 393; vol. ii., p. 7.

‡ Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 301, 302.

the ecclesiastical articles he had forwarded to Ireland, and which were anything but acceptable to Laud; he forced upon the clergy a series of hateful metropolitan canons; and, by a series of measures similar in spirit to those which had subdued the Parliament, he confounded and subdued the restless parsons.* In an early despatch, he had to boast of only one dissentient voice from a new and most astounding "Protestant uniformity!"

The Irish common lawyers now received some farther proofs of his care, with intelligible hints of his prospective schemes. He presented them with the majority of the English statutes that had been passed since the time of Poyning's, but exacted from them certain conditions, at the same time, which soon enabled him to describe to the king, in the following terms, his Irish ministers of justice: "Not declined to serve other men's unwarrantable purposes by any importunity or application; never in so much power and estimation in the state and with the subject as now, and yet contained in that due subordination to the crown as is fit; ministering wholly to uphold the sovereignty; carrying a direct aspect upon the prerogatives of his majesty, without squinting aside upon the vulgar and vain opinions of the populace."†

The army next engaged his attention. He supplied them with clothes, with arms, with ammunition; he redeemed them from licentiousness,‡ and strengthened them in numbers and in discipline. He completed several regiments of foot, collected together some most efficient cavalry, and, in a very short time, astonished the court in England by returns of a richly-appointed and well-marshalled force. They heard with still greater astonishment that the lord-deputy himself could find time to visit the whole army, and to inspect every individual in it! And he farther declared to them, that he held himself ever ready to mount horse at a moment's warning, and lead a troop of his own, raised and accoutred at his own charge, to repress, by a sudden movement, any popular commotion.§ Vainly, however, he strove to communicate energy enough to Charles to procure his seconding some wider schemes projected by him in reference to the army. The army was the keystone of that vast building which the imagination of Wentworth had already raised in the distance. The army was to hang in potent control over everything, to be "the great peacemaker betwixt the British and the natives, betwixt the Protestant and the Papist, and the chief securer, under God and his majesty, of the future and past plantations." But Wentworth was foiled, by the indolent envy of his English coadjutors, from realizing the great desire he held, "that his majesty breed up and have a seminary of soldiers in some part or other of his dominions."*

Indolent envy and active opposition notwithstanding, the general reputation of the lord-deputy of Ireland increased daily. "Mr. Secretary Cooke," wrote Lord Cottington to him, "is so diligent and careful to give your lordship an account of all your despatches and answers to them, as there is nothing for me to say, but that, for aught I can discern, everybody else is so too. My lord-marshal is your own, my Lord of Canterbury your chaplain, Secretary Windebank your man, the king your favourite, and I your good lord. In earnest you have a mighty stock of opinion amongst us, which must of necessity make you damnable proud, if you take not heed."† The Lord-treasurer Weston alone, the old propitiator of the king's regards to the quondam supporter of the petition of rights, but now bitterly jealous of Wentworth's friendship with Laud, scarcely cared to conceal his animosity.‡ A fatal attack of illness, however, at this time removed Weston; and the only alloy which served to dash the secret satisfaction with which the news of this event was received by Wentworth, was the existence of very decided rumours that the vacant staff would be offered to himself.§

I have already touched on the many objections which Wentworth entertained to an office of this sort, and he now sought by every means, and with characteristic energy, to prevent its being offered to him at all. To his friends who wrote to him urging its acceptance, he peremptorily answered; and, at the same time, by the same messenger, forwarded various requests to several of them, that they would take on themselves to intimate in every quarter, as plainly as possible, their knowledge of his objection to it. In farther promotion of this object, he practised a very singular piece of deception. His retained gossip, Mr. Garrard—who continued faithfully and regularly, in the absence of a newspaper, to fulfil all the duties of one, and to retail to the deputy all the occurrences and scandal of the court and the city—had given him, from time to time, most minute accounts of the illness of Weston

* See Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 342-344.

† Strafford Papers, vol. ii., p. 18.

‡ "Whence it is that the soldier is now welcome in every place, where before they were an abomination to the inhabitants; that by this means the army in true account may be said to be of double the strength it had been apprehended."—Strafford Papers, vol. ii., p. 17.

§ "For myself, I had a dead stock in horses, furniture, and arms for my troop, that stood me in £6000, and all in readiness upon an hour's warning to march. Nor did I this out of vanity, but really in regard I did conceive it became me not to represent so great a majesty meanly in the sight of the people; that it was of mighty reputation to the service of the crown, when they saw me in such a posture, as that I was upon an hour's warning able to put myself on horseback, and to deliver, in spite of all opposition, a letter in any part of the kingdom; and lastly, in regard men should see I would not exact so much duty from any private captain as I did myself upon my myself, being their general."—Strafford Papers, vol. ii., p. 18.

* Strafford Papers, vol. ii., p. 198. † Ibid., vol. i., p. 430.

‡ The truth is, I conceive my lord-treasurer some time before his death wished me no good, being grown extreme jealous of my often writing to my Lord of Canterbury, and myself, out of a sturdiness of nature, not so gently passing by his unkind usage as a man of a softer and wiser temper might have done; for I confess I did stomach it very much to be so meanly suspected (being as innocent and clear of crime towards him as the day), considering that I had, upon my coming from court, given him as strong a testimony of my faith and boldness in his affairs—nay, indeed, a stronger, than any other friend he had durst, or, at least, would do for him. So as finding myself thus disappointed of the confidence I had in his professions at our parting, I grew so impatient as to profess even to himself I would borrow a being from no man living but my master, and there I would fasten myself as surely as I could. So as by his death it is not altogether improbable that I am delivered of the heaviest adversary I ever had."—Wentworth to the Earl of Newcastle, Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 411. See, also, a letter of Laud's, vol. i., p. 329.

§ See Garrard's letter, in Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 388, 389.

through its progressive stages, and finally had reported his death.* It was Wentworth's policy, however, to convey to the court, that, so indifferent was he in respect of Weston's office, he had never troubled himself to inquire the probable issue of his illness, and, indeed, had never heard of it. As soon, therefore, as an official intimation of the occurrence was sent to him from Cottington, we find him answering thus: "My very good lord, I was never more surprised in my life than upon the reading of your last letter, not having had any notice of my lord-treasurer's least indisposition before. And how it happens I know not, but I am sure I was never well since almost, and that Monday night last I swooned twice before they could get off my clothes."† And again, assuring Lord Newcastle: "Yet I protest, I ever wished well to his person, and am heartily sorry for his death, which was signified unto me by my Lord Cottington before I heard anything of his sickness, and took me, in a manner, by surprise."‡

These precautions were successful. Left settled in his government of Ireland, he next sought, by every possible resource, to establish a permanent revenue. In this pursuit, he exhausted his industry, his energy, his genius. Under his superintendence, the produce of the customs rose, within four years, from £12,000 a year to £40,000, and continued to advance rapidly. Nor were the means by which it was accomplished other than just and honourable. He improved the method of collection, protected the coasts, swept the Channel and the harbours of pirates, and, in fine, lifted the commerce and the shipping of Ireland into a rich prosperity, by freeing it from danger. "My humble advice," observes Wentworth, "for the increase of trade was, that his majesty should not suffer any act of hostility to be offered to any merchants or their goods within the Channel, which was to be preserved and privileged, as the greatest of his majesty's ports, in the same nature and property as the Venetian state do their Gulf, and the King of Denmark his Sound; and therefore I humbly besought his majesty and their lordships that it might accordingly be remembered and provided for in all future treaties with foreign princes." In completion of this scheme, the lord-deputy struggled hard to rescue the trade of Ireland from several absurd restrictions and monopolies; and in this, having partially succeeded, his government left a claim for gratitude which is remaining still.§

In resorting to just measures occasionally,

however, when they were not found to interfere with his ulterior schemes, Wentworth had taught himself no lesson of refraining from what was unjust. Money was to be had somehow: if justly, well; if not, it was to be had no less. He now, for instance, imposed a license upon the retail of tobacco, and himself farmed the privilege for an annual rent of £7000, and finally of £12,000. A tax was laid also on brewing, by way of feeler for the introduction of the excise—an object of mortal hatred with the Irish.

The statutes of wills and uses were introduced, no less beneficial to the crown, and, happily, more just to the subject. They strengthened the tenure of property, fixed a remedy against fraudulent conveyances, restored widows to their jointures, and heirs to their inheritances. What was vastly more important to Wentworth, they increased the king's fines in the Court of Wards by £10,000 a year! A mint, also, was erected in Ireland, in spite of desperate opposition from the officers of the English Mint, with the view of remedying the excessive scarcity of coin; workmen were introduced from England, to sink in various parts of the island for saltpetre, which Wentworth fancied might be obtained to commercial purposes; and he made several successful efforts to work the silver mines and marble quarries.*

Greater projects, too, than these, occupied the mind of the lord-deputy. Before he set foot in Ireland,† he had conceived the noble scheme of opening a victualling trade between Ireland and Spain. The distrust with which the patriotic party regarded Spain may have influenced him first, as if in defiance, to rise superior to such "vain apprehensions;" but be that as it might, his despatches vindicate his plan. They show how admirably the commodities and the wants of the respective kingdoms correspond, and how closely reciprocal are their interests. They even supply a statement, drawn up with enormous pains from the information of various commercial agents, of the commodities which each port in Spain could either receive from Ireland, or give back in return. In one matter especially Wentworth saw the source of enormous advantage, since the great annual fleets to the colonies, which were so often detained in the Spanish harbours for want of provisions, could clearly be supplied far more conveniently and cheaply from Ireland than from any other country in Europe. Contemporaneously with this measure, the lord-deputy had resolved to attempt two other proj-

* See Stafford Papers, vol. i., p. 243, 374, 387, &c.

† Stafford Papers, vol. i., p. 393.

‡ Stafford Papers, p. 411. Cottington himself was a candidate for the office, and never forgave Laud his disappointment, which the profits of the mastership of the records were by no means sufficient to heal over. The treasury was administered by commission for twelve months, when it was placed by Laud, to the astonishment of all who were still unacquainted with the archbishop's designs for the state advancement of the Church, in the hands of Juxon, bishop of London. Laud, recording the appointment in his Diary (March, 1636), observes, that "No churchman had it since Henry VII.'s time;" and adds, "Now if the Church will not hold themselves up under God, I can do no more."

§ For the various measures, and the elaborate reasoning with which the lord-deputy supported them, see Stafford Papers, vol. i., p. 67, 90, 106, 202, 308, 393, 307, 400, 521, 192, 331, 366, 386, 405, 174, 340, 299, &c., &c.; and vol. ii., p. 18, 198, 137, 20, 69, 135, 42, 151, &c., &c.

* I have already supplied various authorities for these measures, to which I must refer the reader. With one of his packets to the king, Wentworth forwarded "an ingot of silver of 300 ounces, being the first that ever was got in Ireland;" accompanying it with a proud expression of his hope that "this kingdom now at length, in these latter ages, may not only fill up the greatness and dominion, but even the coffers and exchequer of the crown of England. Sure I am, it becomes not this little one that her breasts should ever be dry, nor ought she with a sparing hand to communicate of her strength and wealth there, considering with what mass of treasure and streams of blood she hath been redeemed and preserved by that her elder and more excellent sister. May your majesty's days be as lasting and glorious as the best and purest of metals, and God Almighty prosper and accomplish all your princely thoughts and counsels, be they old or new."—Stafford Papers, vol. i., p. 174.

† See Stafford Papers, vol. i., p. 93, 94. That remarkable despatch was written while waiting at Westminster for the ship that was to convey him to Dublin.

ects. "And surely, sir," he wrote to the king, "if we be able to furnish, and go through with this undertaking—increase the growth and set up the manufactory of hemp and flax in that your kingdom—I will hope to leave your subjects there in much happier condition than I found them, without the least prejudice to your subjects here. For this is a ground I take with me, that to serve your majesty completely well in Ireland, we must not only endeavour to enrich them, but make sure still to hold them dependent upon the crown, and not able to subsist without us, which will be effected by wholly laying aside the manufacture of wools into cloth or stuff there, and by furnishing them from this kingdom, and then making your majesty sole merchant of all salts on that side; for thus shall they not only have their clothing, the improvement of all their native commodities (which are principally preserved by salt), and their victual itself from hence (strong ties and enforcements upon their allegiance and obedience to your majesty), but a means found, I trust, much to advance your majesty's revenue upon salt, and to improve your customs. The wools there grown, and the cloths there worn, thus paying double duties to your crown in both kingdoms, and the salt outward here, both inward and outward there."* In such principles as these, as through the majority of Wentworth's despotic schemes, some good wrestled with the evil. The linen manufacture, for instance, springing out of this monstrous intention, turned out to be a blessing to the island. Having learned, on his arrival in the country, that no article for export was manufactured there except a small quantity of coarse woollen yarn, and unwilling, by encouraging this branch, to interfere with the staple of England, he instantly resolved, by introducing the general cultivation of flax, to induce the manufacture of linen. At his own charge and adventure he imported and sowed a quantity of superior flax seed; the next year, his first crop having outgone his expectation, he expended £1000 on the same venture, erected a vast number of looms, procured workmen from France and Flanders, and at last sent forth a ship to Spain, at his own risk,† with the first investment of linen that had ever been exported from Ireland. Sanguine of hopes so well laid, Wentworth then hazarded a prediction which has since been amply realized. "Very ambitious am I," writes he to Sir William Boswell, "to set up a trade of linen-clothing in these parts, which, if God bless so as it be effected, will, I dare say, be the greatest enriching to this kingdom that ever befell it."‡ The other project he had set up along with this happily fell to the ground for want of encouragement. In proposing to monopolize the sale of salt, without which the Irish could neither carry on their victualling trade nor cure their ordinary provisions, and which was at that time either manufactured by patentees or imported from abroad, Lord Wentworth reckoned on a considerable increase of revenue, and the reduction of the Irish to a state of complete dependance. The internal manufacture abolished, it would be next to impossible to smuggle a commodity so bulky and so perishable by sea, and yet, he urged, "again of so absolute necessity as it cannot possibly stay upon his majesty's hand, but must be had whether they will or no, and may at all times be raised in price so far forth as his majesty shall judge to stand with reason and honour. Witness the Gabelles of salt in France."* This once accomplished, Wentworth felt he would have in his own hands the disposal of the food and the clothing of the Irish, and he pressed it with all his vehemence. "Holding them," exclaimed he, "from the manufacture of wool (which, unless otherwise directed, I shall by all means discourage), and then enforcing them to fetch their clothing from thence, and to take their salt from the king (being that which preserves and gives value to all their native staple commodities), how can they depart from us without nakedness and beggary? which in itself is so weighty a consideration as a small profit should not bear down!" The small profit, however, in consequence of the jealousies of Weston, did bear it down, and the lord-deputy was obliged at last to surrender it.

The embarrassments of the Irish treasury had now vanished; no anticipations any longer weakened it; every charge of government was paid to a day; and, in the fifth year of his power, Lord Wentworth announced to the king that the annual revenue would exceed the expenditure by £60,000.

This, then, was being "crowned with the completest success!" for, according to such political reasoners as M. de Lally-Tolendal, the prosperity of the exchequer is the true test of the wellbeing of the state, and as long as a wretched people can be flattered or terrified into "coining their hearts" in sums, the king is ably served, and the minister is borne out in his exactions. Yet Wentworth deserves better advocates; and it is perhaps due to his fame as a statesman to keep in mind that we do not view his system in a perfect state, since the ground, as it were, had only been cleared for the building when Death struck down the builder.

Yorkshire, meanwhile, and Wentworth Woodhouse, had not been forgotten by the lord-deputy! If he had been living simply as a private gentleman in Ireland, instead of being the immediate manager and director of schemes which would have overwhelmed the strength of a dozen ordinary men, he could not have attended with greater minuteness and apparent ease to his private affairs in England. I cannot resist extracting here some passages from an extraordinary letter to his early tutor, Mr. Greenwood, which occasion has already been taken to refer to. It is one of the most singular proofs that could be found anywhere of the compatibility of a comprehensive genius with a vigilant attention to the most minute details. From his vicereignty the Lord Wentworth can signify his desire "that my tenants use their grounds and houses as honest men and good husbands ought to do, according to their sev-

* Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 93, 94.

† See his characteristic letter to the Duke of Medina, Strafford Papers, vol. ii., p. 109, 110.

‡ Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 473.

* Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 192, 193; and see p. 182, 333, 346.

eral leases; that my woods be preserved, and at due seasons felled and sold to the best profit—spring-woods I mean; that the hedges and fences be preserved; that the ponds, pheasants, partridges, and parks be preserved, and as much profit made of the herbage of Tankersly Park as may be without hurt to the deer; that fires be kept in the houses at Woodhouse and Tankersly, and that the housekeepers preserve the rooms sweet, and the stuff without spoil, and principally that the houses be kept dry from taking of rain;" that "the keeper of Tankersly must have the more immediate care of the woods belonging to Tankersly, especially those within the park, and to see that the pond-heads there be kept up, and the water to have a large and open passage to run away in the time of flood, and the grates so cleansed and firm as they break not, nor yet choke up, in which cases all the fish will be sure to go away with the flood." And again, that "none of my demains be plowed in any case. I understand in this Richard Marris hath not followed my direction, which indeed, now and then, if a man would never so fain, he would have done. But if, upon advice taken with you and Robin Rockley, you find at any time good for the grounds they were broken up, then would I have them plowed for my own use (for I know right well the profit of those new rift grounds), taking still care that they be well limed and manured, and so left as fat and full in heart as might be, to which purpose I would have no cost spared, for I would have the grounds about my houses kept aloft, so as there may be beauty and pleasure communicated even from them to the houses themselves." With these desires are conveyed a vast host of minor directions respecting the servants he would have Greenwood reward, promote, confide in, or distrust. Nor does he forget to "beseech you to cause my new study there, which looks into the hall, to be glazed, strong doors and locks to be set upon it; and such boxes being made as are at Woodhouse, which Richard Forster will, upon your direction, give notice for, the evidence may be put into those boxes, and set in that study, where they will be more safe and handsomely kept than where they are now. If you could cause like locks to be made for that study as are at Woodhouse, so that one key might open the locks in both places, it were much the better, and advising a little with Richard Forster, he might so order the matter as to have them so;" and to beg that "the red damask bed, with stools, canopies, chairs, &c., belonging thereunto, be carefully looked unto." We learn also from this omniscient despatch, that the death of his steward, Richard Marris, "troubles me not so much, albeit in truth I loved him very well, as the sadness and indeed fearfulness of the misfortune thorough which he was lost—most grievous, God knows, for him, and scandalous to all that have relation to him; amongst the rest, I am sure to have my share. Nor do I think that he was drowned as you write, for then how should one pocket be dry? But rather that, heavy with drink, he dropped from his horse near the place where his cloak lay, and, so it may be, amazed with the fall, was dragged by the horse, and the girths loosing, left in that wet place, where he was found dead, and where, doubtless for want of company, and in a cold night and lodging, stormed to death. But enough of so woful a subject, which I wish might never be mentioned or remembered again, farther than to consider in it the just judgments of God, and to deter us from this swinish vice, and all other which may draw down upon ourselves like punishments." Subjoining this, the course to be pursued with respect to the brother and heir of the deceased is laid down at great length, and in all its possible bearings, coupled with the following characteristic notice: "I pray you in any case, if it may be, let him be drawn to this by fair and still means; but if that work not with him, then would I have you let him know that, until the account be declared betwixt me and his brother, which I am most willing and desirous may be before the next spring fairly examined by auditors indifferently chosen betwixt us, I will hold the possession both of lands and goods; that I will assign my debt to the king, and so extend and keep in extent the whole estate, till I be honestly and truly satisfied; as also that I will perform that last office in accomplishment of that which I know was his brother's intention, to see all his other creditors justly paid before he meddle with the estate, but that then at after I will not be his loss, by the help of God, one farthing. And I pray you, if the first milder way take not (which, if there be either honesty or conscience in the man, methinks it should), then to proceed roundly the other way, holding all you have, putting the bonds of Darcy Wentworth and Pieter Man in suit upon the land, and keeping all in the state you have already so well settled them, till my coming over." The reverend gentleman had previously been given to understand that, "as for all my rents, the course I desire to be held is thus: A month after every rent day, I would have a time appointed when yourself and Robert Rockley may meet, and all the bailiffs be appointed to attend you: there receive their accounts, giving them strict charge to gather what shall be behind, and to bring the remainder and finish their account at Thornhill within a month after. And I beseech you give them no sparing, for I have suffered very much by it; however, I never could perceive my tenants were a groat the better; besides, when they find they shall be distrained upon, they will observe their day carefully, so as within a rent day or two, this course strictly observed, the rents will come in without any stop." The whole production is, indeed, impressed with the peculiarities of Wentworth's subtle and energetic genius; nor was there reason for Mr. Greenwood to doubt, as he is at the close assured, that the writer "upon a good occasion would not deny his life to him."

So also, burdened with his mighty schemes, the lord-deputy found time for every office of private service, of friendship, and of scholar-like amusement. He made his newsman, Mr. Garrard, forward him copies of Dr. Donne's poetry,* which he was amazingly fond of; gathered antiquities for the king;† vanquished Inigo Jones in a discussion on architecture;‡ reared a young greyhound among his own chil-

* Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 333, &c.

† Ibid., vol. ii., p. 82.

‡ Ibid., p. 83.

children for the little Prince of York;* corresponded with old friends in Yorkshire;† discussed with Vandyke on various matters; hunted, hawked,‡ and played at the games of primer and mayo. "He played excellently well," says Radcliffe; "and for company sake, in Christmas, and after supper, he would play sometimes; yet he never was much taken with it, nor used it excessively, but as a recreation should be used. His chief recreation was after supper, when, if he had company which were suitable unto him, that is, honest, cheerful men, he would retire into an inner room, and set two or three hours, taking tobacco and telling stories with great pleasantness and freedom; and this he used constantly, with all familiarity in private, laying then aside all state and that due respect which in public he would expect."

Never for a single instant, however, were the public affairs suffered to wait his leisure. They threatened now to demand more than ordinary care, for the king had resolutely thwarted the deputy in his desire to continue the Parliament. "My reasons," he wrote, "are grounded upon my experience of them here. They are of the nature of cats—they ever grow curst with age; so that if ye will have good of them, put them off handsomely when they come to any age, for young ones are ever most tractable. . . . Now that we are well, let us content ourselves therewith."§ Charles, at the same time, had urged upon his minister the preferable course of following out their plans (which were far more favoured with himself than even a submissive Irish Parliament), of increasing the estates of the crown by a search after defective titles. Wentworth, upon this, set resolutely to work. He examined various old records, and discovered that the whole province of Connaught, on the forfeiture of its Irish chieftain, had lapsed, many years ago, to the crown. It had, indeed, even since that time, again been granted away, but the court lawyers now either found flaws in the conveyances or made them. It will be recollected that a recognition of the validity of such titles formed one of the obnoxious "graces" which Wentworth had laid to sleep so soundly.

Pledging himself at once to the king, therefore, that he would reduce Connaught to the absolute possession of the crown, the lord-deputy proceeded into the county of Roscommon, summoned a jury composed of "persons of such means as might answer the king a round fine in the Castle-chamber in case they should prevaricate, and who, in all seeming, even out of that reason, would be more fearful to tread shamefully and impudently aside from the truth than such as had less, or nothing to lose,"* told them that his present appeal to them was a mere act of courtesy, and, in return for a series of deep and significant threats, received a ready obedience. The same scenes, with the same results, were acted in Mayo and Sligo, and Lord Wentworth went on to Galway.

Here he was prepared for opposition. The people, chiefly Roman Catholics, were supported by a formidable body of priests, and had the strenuous countenance and assistance of their hereditary lord, the Earl of St. Alban's and Clanricarde, a nobleman of esteem at the English court. The spirit of Wentworth rose at the prospect, and he prepared the court, in a memorable despatch, for the measures they were to expect from him: "If it be followed with just severity," he wrote, "this opposition will prove of great use to the crown, as any one thing that hath happened since this plantation fell in proposition. It shall not only, with a considerable addition of revenue, bring security to this county, which of the whole kingdom most requires it, but make all the succeeding plantations pass with the greatest quietness that can be desired; whereas, if this froward humour be negligently or loosely handled, it will not only blemish the honour and comeliness of that which is effected already, but cut off all hope for the future." He summoned a jury on the same principle as in the preceding counties. They were obstinate in their refusal to obey him. The sheriff who had selected them was instantly fined £1000; the jurors themselves were cited into the Castle-chamber, and fined £4000 each; and the Earl of Clanricarde† received a heavy reprimand from the court, and was made to suffer severely. Bitter murmurs were heard in Ireland, and men spoke out more strongly in England. But the deputy knew no fear. "This comfort I have to support me against the malice of this race of sturdy beggars, that howbeit they threaten me with a Felton or a Ravillae, yet my master is pleased graciously to accept of my endeavours, and to say publicly at council-board the crown of England was never so well served on this side as since my coming to the government."‡

Exasperated, nevertheless, with these signs of opposition, he now thought to silence them effectually by one terrible warning. His knowledge of the character of the vice-treasurer, the Lord Mountnorris, has been already shown, and I have quoted the deeply significant intimation which opened their official connexion. Mountnorris had long disregarded this, and had, indeed, omitted no opportunity which his place afforded him of thwarting in every possible way the schemes of Wentworth. A trifling circumstance now gave the latter an occasion of punishment. Severely afflicted with the gout—for so frightful were his bodily infirmi-

* The Countess of Dorset had preferred the request, to which Wentworth instantly answered: "I did, with all gladness, receive from your ladyship, by this bearer, the first commands it ever pleased our young master to honour me withal, and before Christmas I will not fail to furnish his highness with the finest greyhound this kingdom affords; till then I shall humbly crave his highness's pardon; for to send any before I may have convenient time, under my own eye, to be sure he is of a safe and gentle disposition, and that I may try him here first, how he shall behave himself amongst my own children, were the greatest indiscretion and boldness in me possible. And albeit I assure myself your ladyship's care and other his highness's attendants would be such as the dog should do no harm, yet that were no thanks to me."—Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 303.

† Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 116.

‡ "In his later days," Radcliffe observes, "he got little time to see his hawks fly, though he always kept good ones."

§ Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 365. Wentworth's previous entreaties for a prorogation will be found at p. 353.

* Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 442; a despatch in which the entire proceedings are characteristically given.

† For the representations made by Wentworth against this nobleman, see Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 451, 479, 492; and vol. ii., p. 31, 35, 365, 381.

‡ Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 412; and see p. 371.

ties that freedom from one complaint seldom failed to be followed by thralldom to another—the lord-deputy sat one day in the presence-chamber, when one of his attendants—a Mr. Annesley, a distant relation of the Lord Mountnorris—accidentally dropped a stool upon his foot. “Enraged with the pain whereof,” says Clarendon, “his lordship with a small cane struck Annesley. This being merrily spoken of at dinner at the lord-chancellor’s table, where the Lord Mountnorris was, he said, ‘the gentleman had a brother that would not have taken such a blow.’”^{*} These words were spoken in the month of April. Eavesdroppers reported them to Wentworth, who instantly forwarded a messenger to London to bring back a king’s commission for the trial of Mountnorris. It was sent at his request. Not till December, however, was any farther step taken, though the interim had been employed in giving security to the lord-deputy’s purpose.

In December, Mountnorris received a summons to attend a council of war the next morning. Ignorant of the cause of so sudden a movement, he was vainly asking his brother councillors to explain it, when Wentworth entered, produced the king’s commission, charged Lord Mountnorris with an attempt to stir up mutiny against himself as general of the army, and ordered the charge to be read. It ran to this effect: That it having been mentioned at the lord-chancellor’s table that Annesley had let a stool fall on the lord-deputy’s foot, Mountnorris had scornfully and contemptuously said, “Perhaps it was done in revenge of that public affront that my lord-deputy did me formerly; but I have a brother who would not have taken such a revenge.” In vain the accused fell on his knees, and requested time for consultation; in vain he demanded even a copy of the charge, or permission to retain counsel: everything was denied to him; the lord-deputy cited two articles of war which rendered him amenable to imprisonment and to death; demanded from the councillors the immediate and summary judgment of a court-martial on both the articles; and sternly silenced a proposal which they ventured to submit, of separating the charges. Guilty the accused was to be voted, “of both or of none!” Even Lord Moore, one of the councillors—who, with Sir R. Loftus, the brother of another councillor, had proved Wentworth’s case—was ordered to resume his seat, and judge the man whom he had accused! Under the eye of the lord-deputy the council then deliberated and voted; and their sentence condemned Mountnorris to imprisonment, deprived him of all his offices, ignominiously dismissed him from the army, incapacitated him from ever serving again, and finally left him to be shot, or beheaded, at the pleasure of the general. Before the whole court Lord Wentworth then expressed exultation: “the sentence was just and noble, and for his part, he would not lose his share of the honour of it!” He turned afterward to the unfortunate Mountnorris; told him that now, if he chose, he had only to order execution, but that he would petition for his life, and “would sooner lose his hand than Mountnorris should lose his head.”

His purpose was to be more effectually answered, in truth, by a contemptuous pardon, and this, from the first, he appears to have designed, trusting to the general ignominy that would be thrown over Mountnorris to crush any after-attempt he might make against his own power. The remarks which have been already made on other personal oppressions apply here with still greater force, and to the system which Wentworth had to uphold should the horror and reproach be carried. It is certain that, at the period of this proceeding, Lord Clarendon has justly described the issue to which the positions of the parties had brought them: “That either the deputy of Ireland must destroy my Lord Mountnorris while he continued in his office, or my Lord Mountnorris must destroy the deputy as soon as his commission was determined.”^{*} Wentworth was not the man to leave this issue in the hands of chance, nor, at the same time, to blind himself to the results of such conduct as the necessity had forced upon him. “But if, because I am necessitated to preserve myself from contempt and scorn, and to keep and retain with me a capacity to serve his majesty with that honour becoming the dignity of that place I here by his majesty’s favour exercise, therefore I must be taken to be such a rigid Cato Censorius as should render me almost inhospitable to humane kind, yet shall not that persuade me to suffer myself to be trodden upon by men, indeed of that savage and insolent nature they would have me believed to be, or to deny unto myself and my own subsistence so natural a motion as is the defence of a man’s self.”

The wife of Mountnorris was a kinswoman of the Lady Arabella Hollis, whose memory Wentworth cherished with such enthusiasm, and “in the name and by the memory of her” hoping that God would so reward him for it upon “the sweet children of her kinswoman,” Lady Mountnorris, immediately after the sentence, in a deeply pathetic letter, besought Wentworth to take “his heavy hand from off her dear lord.”[†] Every writer concurs in stating that this letter was coldly and contemptuously disregarded by the lord deputy, but an extract from one of his despatches may at least serve to throw some doubt over such a statement. “I send you,” he writes to Secretary Cooke, “here enclosed the sentence of the council of war in the case of the Lord Mountnorris. . . . I foresee full well how I shall be skirmined upon for it on that side: causeless traducing and calumniating of me is a spirit that hath haunted me through the whole course of my life, and now become so ordinary a food as the sharpness and bitterness of it, in good faith, distempers not my taste one jot. Finally, as I formerly signed the sentence together with them, so do I most heartily now join in their letters to you, where we all become humble petitioners to his majesty for his life, which was, God knows, so little looked after by me, that howbeit I hold under favour the sentence most just, yet were it left me in choice whether he must lose his head or I my hand, this should redeem that. His lordship was prisoner in this castle some two days, but upon his physician's certificate that the badness of his lodging might prejudice his health, I sent him upon good bond restrained only to his own house, where he is like to remain till I receive his majesty's farther pleasure concerning him." It is most unlikely that such an extraordinary favour as this had been granted on the application of a physician merely, while the lord-deputy had an obvious reason for keeping out of sight the influence of the lady.

^{*} The reader may be referred, in case he desires to pursue this subject farther, to the most ample materials of judgment and discrimination as to the character and bearing of the parties. Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 73, 76, 119, 250, 349, 388, 392, 402, et seq.; 448, 497, et seq.; 502, 504, 508, et seq.; 511, et seq.; 514, 519; and to vol. ii., p. 3, 14, et seq., and 145. The unfortunate want of an index to the Strafford Papers makes these references necessary.

[†] Clarendon’s State Papers, vol. i., p. 449.

^{*} Clarendon, vol. i., p. 174. This statement is borne out by Baillie’s letters. Rushworth, on the other hand, gives it as Wentworth’s witnesses afterward swore to it. Collections, vol. iii., p. 187; and see Nelson’s Collections, vol. i., p. 59.

Some short time after, Mountnorris, on condition of submitting to Wentworth, and acknowledging the justice of his sentence, received his liberty. Prosecutions, however, had been lodged against him meanwhile in the Star Chamber, and he felt himself a lowered and wellnigh beggared man. "At my Lord Mountnorris his departure hence," writes the deputy, "he seemed wondrously humbled, as much as Chaucer's friar,* that would not for him anything should be dead; so I told him I never wished ill to his estate nor person farther than to remove him thence, where he was as well a trouble as an offence unto me; that being done (howbeit thorough his own fault with more prejudice to him than I intended), I could wish there were no more debate betwixt us; and I told him that, if he desired it, I would spare my prosecution against him in the Star Chamber there." Immediately before this passage occurs, in the same letter, Wentworth had remarked, "I assure you I have had a churlish winter of this; nor hath the gout been without other attendants that do prognostic no long life for me here below! which skills not much. He lives more that virtuously and generously spruds one month, than some other that may chance to dream out some years, and bury himself alive all the while." The life of the lord-deputy had, indeed, in the intensity of sensation it had required for its sustenance, covered a larger span of existence than years can measure, and now the term that remained to it was fated to be dashed with almost unceasing anxieties and troubles, more bitter in proportion to the temperament they wrought on.

His anticipations of the enmity that would be provoked against him by the case of Mountnorris were more than realized. Laud ventured to intimate to him, "I find that, notwithstanding all your great services in Ireland, which are most graciously accepted by the king, you want not them which whisper, and perhaps speak louder where they think they may, against your proceedings in Ireland, as being over-full of personal prosecutions against men of quality. . . . And this is somewhat loudly spoken by some on the queen's side. . . . I know you have a great deal more resolution in you than to decline any service due to the king, state, or Church, for the barking of discontented persons; and God forbid but you should; and yet, my lord, if you could find a way to do all these great services and decline these storms, I think it would be excellent well thought on."* To this advice succeeded other galling announcements. Lord Clanricarde died suddenly, from a broken heart, it was said, in consequence of the Galway proceedings; and the death of the sheriff of that county, who had been imprisoned by Wentworth, immediately followed. Both of these deaths were laid at his door. "They might as well," exclaimed the lord-deputy, adverting to the first, "they might as well have imputed unto me for a crime his being threescore and ten years old!" With cooler satire he put off the fate of the sheriff. "They will lay the charge of Darcy the sheriff's death unto me. My arrows are cruel that wound so mortally! but I should be more sorry, by much, the king should lose his fine." Still this did not subdue the daily increasing murmurs; one exaggeration begot another; and he resolved at last, by a sudden public appearance in England, to confound his accusers, and, even in their very teeth, to throw for new marks of favour.

Permission having been obtained from the king, Wentworth appeared at the English court in May, 1636. He was received with the highest favour, and so delighted the king with his

* Chaucer and Dr. Donne appear to have been Wentworth's favourite poets. Chaucer indeed, to the court readers of that day, was as Shakspeare in our own. It is clear, too, from the frequent use of peculiar expressions in his despatches, that the lord-deputy was not unacquainted, and that intimately, with the great dramatist, though he never, as with Chaucer and Donne, quotes connected passages. It is worth subjoining, as an instance out of many, one of Wentworth's sneers at Sir Piers Crosby—that "trifle Crosby," as he elsewhere calls him. "Since his departure I have neither heard from him nor of him, more than that he vouchsafed with his pretty composed looks to give the Galloway agents countenance and courtship before the eyes of all the good people that looked upon them, gracing and ushering them to and from all their appearances before the lords; there is no more to be added in his case but these two verses of old Jeffrey Chaucer:

"Nowhere so busy a man as he ther n'as,
And yet he seemed busier than he was."

When the newsmonger Garrard heard of the affair of Mountnorris, he quotes Dr. Donne, as if to communicate some tender sympathy to his lordship in that way: "When first I heard the news, which was on St. Stephen's day, and how all men talked of it, it disorder'd me, it brake my sleep, I waked at four in the morning, it made me herd the next day less in company; not that I believed what was said, but that I had no oracle, no such friend on the sudden to go to, who could give such satisfaction as I desired. Noblest lord, your letter hath done it; what Dr. Donne writ once is most true, Sir, more than kisses, letters mingle souls, for thus friends absent speak," &c.

* Stafford Papers, vol. i., p. 479. Lord Cottington's account was something different: "You said right, that Mountnorris his business would make a great noise; for so it hath amongst ignorant, but especially ill-affected people; but it hath struck little among the wiser sort, and begins to be blown away amongst the rest." His lordship, in the same letter, communicates to Wentworth a remarkable sequel to the affair. The lord-deputy, in order to procure Mountnorris's offices for his favourites (chiefly young Loftus, the husband of a lady who has been before adverted to), had proposed to distribute £6000 as a sort of purchase of them, to the principal English ministers. (Stafford Papers, vol. i., p. 508.) The sly old courtier Cottington, however, into whose hands the business fell, hit on a more notable expedient. "When William Raylton first told me," he writes, "of your lordship's intention touching Mountnorris's place for Sir Adam Loftus, and the distribution of moneys for the effecting thereof, I fell upon the right way, which was, to give the money to him that really could do the business, which was the king himself; and this hath so far prevailed, as by this post your lordship will receive his majesty's letter to that effect, so as there you have your business done without noise." The money happened to be particularly welcome to Charles, who had just been purchasing an estate! See Stafford Papers, vol. i., p. 311.

account of the various measures by which he had consolidated the government of Ireland, that he was entreated by his majesty to repeat the details "at a very full council." "Howbeit I told him I feared his majesty might be wearied with the repetition of so long a narrative, being no other than he had formerly heard, and that I desired, therefore, I might give my account to the lords without his majesty's farther expense of time, yet he told me it was worthy to be heard twice, and that he was, willing to have it so."* No wonder! A more striking description was never spoken. He detailed all the measures he had accomplished for the Church, the army, and the revenue, for manufactures and commerce, for the laws and their administration, and through every vigorous and well-aimed word shone the author of all those measures! Wentworth adverted, towards the close of his relation, to "some particulars wherein I have been very undeservedly and bloodily traduced." He mentioned the slanders that had been circulated, proclaiming him "a severe and austere hard-conditioned man, rather indeed a basha of Buda, than the minister of a pious Christian king." His report of what followed is a direct illustration of much that has been advanced in this memoir. "Howbeit, if I were not much mistaken in myself, it was quite the contrary; no man could show wherein I had expressed it in my nature, no friend I had would charge me with it in my private conversation, no creature had found it in the managing of my own private affairs, so as if I stood clear in all these respects, it was to be confessed by any equal mind that it was not anything within, but the necessity of his majesty's service, which enforced me into a seeming strictness outwardly. And that was the reason indeed; for where I found a crown, a Church, and a people spoiled, I could not imagine to redeem them from under the pressure with gracious smiles and gentle looks. It would cost warmer water than so! True it was, that where a dominion was once gotten and settled, it might be stayed and kept where it was by soft and moderate counsels, but where a sovereignty (be it spoken with reverence) was going down the hill, the nature of a man did so easily slide into the paths of an uncontrolled liberty as it would not be brought back without strength, nor be forced up the hill again but by vigour and force. And true it was indeed, I knew no other rule to govern by but by reward and punishment; and I must profess, that where I found a person well and entirely set for the service of my master, I should lay my hand under his foot, and add to his respect and power all I might, and that where I found the contrary, I should not handle him in my arms, or soothe him in his untoward humour, but if he came in my reach, so far as honour and justice would warrant me, I must knock him soundly over the knuckles; but no sooner he become a new man, apply himself as he ought to the government, but I also change my temper, and express myself to him, as unto that other, by all the good offices I could do him. If this be sharpness, if this be severity, I desired to be instructed better by his majesty and their lordships, for in truth it did not seem so to me; however, if I were once told that his majesty liked not to be thus served, I would readily conform myself, follow the bent and current of my own disposition, which is to be quiet, not to have debates and disputes with any. Here his majesty interrupted me, and said that was no severity, wished me to go on in that way, for if I served him otherwise I should not serve him as he expected from me."

Wentworth left the court for Wentworth Woodhouse loaded with the applause of the king and his lords of the council, and followed by the awful gaze of doubting multitudes.

As he passed through York he was arrested by enthusiastic friends, and with some difficulty escaped them. "I am gotten hither," he writes to Laud, "at last, to a poor house I have, having been this last week almost feasted to death at York. In truth, for anything I can find, they were not ill pleased to see me. Sure I am it much contented me to be amongst my old acquaintance, which I would not leave for any other affection I have, but to that which I both profess and owe to the person of his sacred majesty. Lord! with what quietness in myself could I live here in comparison of that noise and labour I meet with elsewhere; and, I protest, put up more crowns in my purse at the year's end too! But we'll let that pass; for I am not like to enjoy that blessed condition upon earth; and therefore my resolution is set to endure and struggle with it so long as this crazy body will bear it, and finally drop into the silent grave, where both all these (which I now could, as I think, innocently delight myself in) and myself are to be forgotten. And fare them well! I persuade myself exuto Lepido I am able to lay them down very quietly."²

His rest was extremely short, for he soon reappeared in York, discharged several of the duties of his presidency, and fell with all his accustomed vigour on the collection of ship-money. That famous tax had recently been levied. The same success waited upon Wentworth's present measures in respect to it as the capacity and energy which animated all he did almost invariably commanded. In every other county, murmurs, threats, and curses accompanied the payment; in Yorkshire, during Wentworth's presence, silence. His letter to the king reads like one of his Irish despatches. "In pursuit of your commands, I have effectually, both in public and private, recommended the justice and necessity of the shipping business, and so clearly shown it to be, not only for the honour of the kingdom in general, but for every man's particular safety, that I am most confident the assessment this next year will be universally and cheerfully answered within this jurisdiction."³

² Stafford Papers, vol. ii., p. 26.

³ In a subsequent letter Wentworth wrote: "I forgot in my last humbly to offer my opinion, that in case your majesty find or apprehend any backwardness in the south, it were good the next year's writs for the shipping assessment were hastened first down into these parts, where they are sure to find no opposition or unwillingness, which example may rather further than hinder in the right way which others ought to follow elsewhere."

* See Stafford Papers, vol. i., p. 13-22. The despatch in which Wentworth again, for the third time, details his remarkable narrative, is addressed to Wandesford, who, in the mean while, was administering the Irish government.

The lord-deputy, as the time approached for his return to his government, unburdened himself of a suit to the king which he now felt concerned him daily more and more. For the second time he entreated from Charles the honour of an earldom. He begged it in refutation of the malicious insinuations of his enemies, to prove that their calumnies were disbelieved, and to strengthen him in the eyes of the Irish. At the same time he wrote to Laud, telling him plainly the use the enemies of the state were making of the king's withholding from his deputy some public mark of his favour, and urging the danger it threatened to his authority and to the public service. Again Wentworth's suit was rejected. Since Charles's last answer, his reasons for refusal had increased every way. His reply was peremptory. "Believe it, the marks of my favours that stop malicious tongues are neither places nor titles, but the little welcome I give to accusers, and the willing ear I give to my servants." The jest with which his majesty's letter closed did not mend the matter. "I will end with a rule that may serve for a statesman, a courtier, or a lover—never make a defence or apology before you be accused." The lord-deputy felt this deeply. "I wish," he wrote to Laud, "thorough the opinion that I stand not full to his majesty's liking in my service in this place, his majesty's affairs may not suffer as well as myself. But fall that as it may, I am resolved never to stir that stone more, dead to me it is to be for ever. Indeed, I neither think of it, nor look for it." His friend George Butler he recommended to look for rewards and punishments in the next world; "for in good faith, George, all below are grown wonderous indifferent." Nor did Wentworth scruple to exhibit very broadly to the king the still rankling disappointment. "Out of the truth of my heart," he wrote, "and with that liberty your majesty is pleased to afford me (which shall nevertheless ever retain all the humility, modesty, and secrecy possible), admit me to say, reward well applied advantages the services of kings extremely much; it being most certain that not one man of very many serve their masters for love, but for their own ends and preferments, and that he is in the rank of the best servants that can be content to serve his master together with himself. Finally, I am most confident, were your majesty purposed but for a while to use the excellent wisdom God hath given you in the constant, right, and quick applying of rewards and punishments, it were a thing most easy for your servants in a very few years, under your conduct and protection, so to settle all your affairs and dominions as should render you, not only at home, but abroad also, the most powerful and considerable king in Christendom."*

With Laud, Wentworth communicated more freely on this subject, and in one of his more desponding letters suddenly consoles himself with Dr. Donne and Vandyke. "I most humbly thank your lordship for your noble care and counsel tending to the preservation of my health, a free bounty it is of your love towards me, where otherwise of myself I am so wonderous little considerable to anybody else. The Lady Astrea, the poet tells us, is long since gone to heaven, but under favour I can yet find reward and punishment on earth. Indeed, sometimes they are like Doctor Donne's 'anagram of a good face,'* the ornaments missed, a yellow tooth, a red eye, a white lip or so! and seeing that all beauties take not all affections, one man judging that a deformity which another considers as a perfection or a grace, this, methinks, convinceth the certain incertainty of rewards and punishments. Howsoever, he is the wisest commonly, the greatest, and happiest man, and shall surely draw the fairest table of his life, that understands, with Vandyke, how to dispose of these shadows best to make up his own comeliness and advantage."† Whereupon his grace of Canterbury warns the lord-deputy from Vandyke and Dr. Donne into the book of Ecclesiastes: "Once for all, if you will but read over the short book of Ecclesiastes, while these thoughts are in you, you will see a better disposition of these things, and the vanity of all their shadows, than is to be found in any anagrams of Dr. Donne's, or any designs of Vandyke; so to the lines there drawn I leave you."‡

Disappointed of that public mark of favour he had claimed so justly, but strengthened by private instructions§ from the king which left no bound or limit to his power, Lord Wentworth returned to Ireland. He resumed his measures precisely at the point in which he had left them, overawed every effort to disturb the breathless tranquillity which his energy had inspired, and under his vigilant eye the infant cultivation, manufactures, and commerce of the country began to increase and prosper. "While the subject enjoyed security from the entire suppression of internal insurrections and depredations, the royal revenues, arising from produce and consumption, experienced a rapid increase."|| This "security," however, was never felt to be other than that of absolutism, for Wentworth, hand in hand with his most striking financial improvements, carried on his inquiries into defective titles with a terrible rigour. He placed at the king's disposal the entire district of Ormond, and in his Irish exchequer the sum of £15,000, wrung from the family of the O'Byrnes in Wicklow, to redeem their possessions from a similar award. Successful in every effort he made, he did not care to call into request the new powers he had been intrusted with.

Not a messenger or a letter arrived from England, however, without news that dashed his prosperity and his pride. He saw as much

* "Marry and love thy Flavia, for she Hath all things whereby others beauteous be;
For though her eyes be small, her mouth is great;
Though theirs be ivory, yet her teeth be jet;
&c. &c. &c.

What though her cheeks be yellow, her hair's red;

Though all her parts be not in th' usual place,
She hath yet the anagrams of a good face!"

Second Elegy.

† Strafford Papers, vol. ii., p. 158.

‡ Ibid., p. 169.

§ See his letter to Wandesford, Strafford Papers, vol. ii., p. 13, et seq.

|| Mr. MacDiarmid, whose summary of Wentworth's financial measures is very able. I have occasionally availed myself of it. See Lives of British Statesmen, vol. ii., p. 170-181. The despatches of the lord-deputy, in the early portion of the second volume of the Strafford Papers, are singularly powerful.

beyond the narrow vision of the English courtiers as his sagacity outreached theirs, and, in the hollow madness of their measures, had already discerned disastrous issues. The ruin they were precipitating, he bitterly knew would involve himself; yet he had not even the poor consolation of feeling that the only portion of the king's service that had in it any of the elements of stability, his own government, had a single hearty defender in that English court. Their praises obsequiously waited on his presence alone. Laud, indeed, was still his friend; but Laud's ecclesiastical administration had by this time wellnigh incapacitated its master for any purpose of good. The popular party in England, meanwhile, taking advantage of the occasion, raised a loud and violent voice of clamour against the lord-deputy of Ireland. He flung it back, in the hasty self-bullying of his will, with a contemptuous scorn;* but he knew secretly its power, and in his graver despatches warned the court from leaving him unprotected to its effects: "With the disesteem of the governor," he wrote, "the government shall impair, if not in the existence, sure in the beauty of it, which is as considerable as that most men are guided and guide themselves by opinion. So as, if you will have my philosophy in the point, let no prince employ a servant longer than he is resolved to have him valued and esteemed by others, thorough those powers he shall manifest to be intrusted with him." Still he saw no symptoms of what he desired, and at last he wrote personally to the king. "Sir," he said, "I take my natural inclinations to be extremely much more tender and gentle than the smooth looks and cheeks of your ministers on that side find in their own bosoms, and yet heighten the cry upon me!" But Charles had now the queen's influence in many respects upon him, and the queen was not displeased to hear of the sinking fortunes of Wentworth. Lord Holland, her favourite counsellor, was even heard to insinuate that the lord-deputy was subject to occasional touches of madness. This, among the other reports, came to Wentworth's ear. He charged it upon Holland, who denied it, confessing he might have attributed "hypochondriac humours," certainly not madness. Wentworth wrote back to the king: "As for the 'hypochondriac humour' his lordship mentions, it is a great word and a courtly phrase; but if I mistake not the English of it, it is to be civilly and silently maddish; and if so, I can assure his lordship, he shall find as little of that in me as of any other more active heat. But I shall not stir that matter farther, only, if it be denied his lordship said I was mad, it were very easy to show his memory might, fail him sometimes. . . . Your majesty may be pleased to excuse this foul writing, being in truth so tormented in the present with the toothache, as troubles my sense more than the mistaken reports of any others shall do." Sad indeed were the bodily infirmities which exasperated these complainings of the lord-deputy. The gout, the toothache, the ague, an intermittent pulse, faint sweats and heaviness, and, to crown all, the frightful disorder of the stone, alternately broke his spirits, and warned him "that no long life awaited him here below!"

What still remained to him, he yet resolved to live out bravely. "A frame of wood," he writes to Laud, "I have given order to set up in a park I have in the county of Wicklow. And, gnash the tooth of these gallants never so hard, I will, by God's leave, go on with it, that so I may have a place to take my recreation for a month or two in a year, were it for no other reason than to displease them, by keeping myself, if so please God, a little longer in health."† Among other reports to his prejudice had been that of "building up to the sky."‡ We find him afterward adverting to this: "I acknowledge, that were myself only considered in what I build, it were not only to excess, but even to folly, having already houses moderate for my condition in Yorkshire; but his majesty will justify me, that at my last being in England, I acquainted him with a purpose I had to build him a house at the Naas, it being uncomely his majesty should not have one here of his own, capable to lodge him with moderate conveniency (which, in truth, as yet he hath not), in case he might be pleased sometimes hereafter to look upon this kingdom; and that it was necessary in a manner, for the dignity of this place, and the health of his deputy and family, that there should be one removing house of fresh air, for want whereof, I assure your lordship, I have felt no small inconvenience since my coming hither; that when it was built, if liked by his majesty, it should be his, paying me as its cost—if disliked, a suo damno, I was content to keep it, and smart for my folly. His majesty seemed to be pleased with all, whereupon I proceeded, and have, in a manner, finished it, and so contrived it for the rooms of state, and other accommodations which I have observed in his majesty's houses, as I had been, indeed, stark mad ever to have cast it so for a private family."‡

* Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 106.

† Ibid., p. 107. His expensive repairs of the Castle of Dublin had also been reproached to him. But on his first arrival he had certainly alleged a good case of necessity to Cooke: "This castle is in very great decay. I have been enforced to take down one of the great towers, which was ready to fall, and the rest are so crazy as we are still in fear part of it might drop down upon our heads."—Vol. i., p. 131.

‡ The remains of this building, which was called Juggarstowne Castle, are visible still, and, I am informed by gentlemen who have seen them, sufficiently indicate its extraordinary grandeur and extent. They cover several acres. They are close to the road-side, about sixteen Irish miles from Dublin, and provoke, even now, from many an unre-

* "In truth," he wrote to Laud, "I still wish (and take it also to be a very charitable one) Mr. Hamnden and others of his likeness were well whipt into their right senses; if that the rod be so used as that it smarts not, I am the more sorry. One good remedy were to send for your chimney-sweeper of Oxford, who will sing you a song made of one Bond, it seems a schoolmaster of the free-school of St. Paul's, London, and withal show how to jerk, to temper the voice, to guide the hand, to lay on the rod excellently; sure I am he made me laugh heartily when I was there last; and the chancellor of the University might with a word fetch up to your lordship at Lambeth both the person and the poems (for I must tell you there is the second, if not the third part of the song), and then bring but Mr. Hamnden and Bond in place, and it may every way prove a three man's song. But fetch in the nobleman you mention, and then it may chance to prove a very full concert! As well as I think of Mr. Hamnden's abilities, I take his will and peevishness to be full as great, and without diminution to him, judge the other, howbeit not the father of the country (a title some will not stick to give unto them both, to put them, if it be possible, the faster and farther out of their wits), the very stipit, the vertical point of the whole faction."—Strafford Papers, vol. ii., p. 158.

Between these two royal residences Wentworth now divided a great portion of his time. His mode of living equalled in magnificence the houses themselves. At his own charge he maintained a retinue of 50 attendants, besides his troop of 100 horse, which he had originally raised and equipped at an expense of £6000, and kept up at an enormous yearly cost. This style of living, which he took care to bear out in every other respect, he characteristically vindicated to Cottington as "an expense, not of vanity, but of necessity, judging it not to become me, having the great honour to represent his majesty's sacred person, to set it forth, no, not in any one circumstance, in a penurious mean manner, before the eyes of a wild and rude people."* Nor did he scruple to conceal the fact that his own private fortune had been assisted, in these vast charges, by certain public profits. "It is very true," he writes to Laud, "I have, under the blessing of Almighty God, and the protection of his majesty, £6000 a year good land, which I brought with me into his service; and I have a share for a short term in these customs, which, while his majesty's revenue is there increased more than £20,000 by year, proves nevertheless a greater profit to me than ever I dreamed of." When Laud read this passage to Charles, the king observed, impatiently, "But he doth not tell you how much;" and plainly intimated that he grudged the minister his share of profit.† Wentworth had few occasions of gratitude to Charles during a life worn out in his service! In respect of these customs, it is not to be doubted that Charles's suspicions were grossly unjust. He would have had more of abstract justice with him in objecting to a different source of his lord-deputy's revenue, that of the tobacco monopoly, for, on the latter ground, undoubtedly, Wentworth was open to grave charges, though even here the king was the last person from whom with any propriety they could issue.

The lord-deputy's private habits have been described. He hawked, he hunted,* and fishflecting passer-by, a curse upon the memory of "Black Tom." Such is the name by which the Irish peasantry still remember Strafford. When M. Boullaye-le-Gouz visited Ireland, he found this castle in the property and possession of Sir George Wentworth, Strafford's brother, and guarded by forty English soldiers.—Mr. Croker's MS.

* Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 128.

† Laud writes, "I have of late heard some muttering about it in court, but can meet with nothing to fasten on: only it makes me doubt somebody hath been nibbling about it."—See Strafford Papers, vol. ii., p. 127.

‡ Wittily he writes to Laud, "We are in expectance every hour to hear what becomes of us and the lord-chancellor—to say the plain truth, whether we shall have a government or no; and to the intent that I might be the better in utrumque paratus, at this present I am playing the Robin Hood, and here in the country of mountains and woods hunting and chasing all the out-lying deer I can light of. But, to confess truly, I met with a very shrewd rebuke the other day; for, standing to get a shoot at a buck, I was so damnable bitten with midges as my face is all muzzled over ever since, itches still as if it were mad. The marks they set will not go off again. I will warrant you, this week. I never felt or saw such in England. Surely they are younger brothers to the muskitoes the Indies brag on so much. I protest, I could even now well find in my heart to play the shrew soundly, and scratch my face in six or seven places."—Strafford Papers, vol. ii., p. 173. This allusion to the lord-chancellor had reference to a judgment recently given against that dignity by Wentworth himself, in a suit brought against him by Sir John Gifford, on behalf of Sir Francis Ruishe, for an increase of portion to the lady who had married young Loftus: "According to the lord-chancellor's own clear agreement with Sir Francis Ruishe, ed,* whenever his infirmities gave him respite. He passed some of his time also among books, and, in one portion at least of these studies, had his thoughts upon a stormy political future. "I wish," writes his friend Lord Conway to him, "you had had your fit of the gout in England, lest you should attribute something of the disease to the air of that country. I send you the Duke of Rohan's book, 'Le parfait Capitaine.' Do not think the gout is an excuse from fighting, for the Count Mansfelt had the gout that day he fought the battle of Fleury."† In the pleasures of the table he indulged little. "He was exceeding temperate," observes Radcliffe, "in meat, drink, and recreations. He was no whit given to his appetite; though he loved to see good meat at his table, yet he ate very little of it himself; beef or rabbits was his ordinary food, or cold powdered meats, or cheese and apples, and in moderate quantity. He was never drunk in his life, as I have often heard him say; and for so much as I had seen, I had reason to believe him; yet he was not so scrupulous but he would drink healths where he liked his company, and be sociable as any of his society, and yet still within the bounds of temperance. In Ireland, where drinking was grown a disease epidemical, he was more strict publicly, never suffering any health to be drunk at his public table but the king's, queen's, and prince's, on solemn days. Drunkenness in his servants was, in his esteem, one of the greatest faults." Throughout his various admirable letters to his young wards, the Saviles, in whose education he took extreme interest always, the hatred of this vice is still more characteristically shown. He returns to the warning again and again, coupling with drunkenness the equal vice of gaming: the one a "pursuit not becoming a generous, noble heart, which will not brook such starved considerations as the greed of winning;" the other, one "that father to the lady." These are Wentworth's words. The chancellor refused to submit to the judgment on the ground that the action ought to have been brought in the ordinary courts of law, and that the tribunal before which it was tried was both illegal and partial. Wentworth, upon this, had resorted to his usual severity, and was now waiting its issue with the king. It may be worth stating, that mistakes have been made with respect to the name of the lady chiefly affected in this case by Mr. MacDiarmid and other writers, in consequence of Sir John Gifford having brought the original action. She was Lady Loftus, not Lady Gifford.

* For some accounts of his fishing exploits, see Papers, vol. ii., p. 213, &c. Laud appears to have relished the lord-deputy's presents of "dried fish" amazingly, and to have been anything but fond of his "hung beef out of Yorkshire." His grace had a shrewd eye to appetite: "Since you are for both occupations, flesh and fish, I wonder you do not think of powdering or drying some of your Irish venison, and send that over to brag too."

† Strafford Papers, vol. ii., p. 45. Some of Lord Conway's letters referred to matters not quite so decent, and the lord-deputy's replies gave him no advantage on that score. See Papers, vol. ii., p. 144-146. Conway's acquaintance with his intrigues has already received notice, and the following passage from one of Wentworth's letters to this confidant is not a little significant: "I desire your judgment of the enclosed, which was written to this your servant the other day, and chancing to open and read it in the presence, I burst out before I got it read, that the standers-by wondered what merry tale it might be that letter told me. But I must conjure you to send it me back, not to trust it forth of your hands, only if you will, I am content you show it my Lord of Northumberland and my Lady of Carlisle, lest if it were shown to others they might judge me vane, or something else, of so princely a favour! For less, the least of her commands are not to be taken—what, then, may we term these her earnest desires?"

shall send you, by unequal staggering paces, to your grave, with confusion of face.*

No public duty was neglected meanwhile, for from his country parks and castles Wentworth in an hour or two could appear in the Dublin presence-chamber. The king sent him every license he required against the Lord-chancellor Loftus; and that nobleman, for having disputed the judicial functions of the deputy, "that transcendent power of a chancellor," as Wentworth scornfully called him, was deprived of the seals, and committed to prison till he consented to submit to the award and to acknowledge his error.†

But while the king thus secretly authorized these acts of despotism, the English court, no less than the English nation, were known to be objecting to their author. Impatiently he wrote to Laud, demanding at least the charge, something on which to ground an issue. "The humour which offends me," he exclaims, "is not so much anger as scorn, and desire to wrest out from among them my charge; for, as they say, if I might come to fight for my life, it would never trouble me—indeed, I should then weigh them all very light, and be safe under the goodness, wisdom, and justice of my master. Again, howbeit I am resolved of the truth of all this, yet to accuse myself is very uncomely. I love not to put on my armour before there be cause, in regard I never do so but I find myself the wearer and sorer for it the next morning."

He could get no satisfactory answer to this, for in truth the English court by this time had enough upon its hands. The king meditated a war with Spain for the recovery of the palatinate, to which he was the rather urged by the queen, since France had already engaged. Fortunately, before taking this step, he was induced to advise with the lord-deputy of Ireland. This was the first time Wentworth had ever been consulted on the general affairs of the kingdom, and he instantly forwarded a paper of opposing reasons to the king, so strongly and so ably stated that the war project was given up.‡ The queen's indifferent feeling to him, it may well be supposed, was not removed by such policy.§

* Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 169, &c. And see an admirable letter at p. 311 of vol. ii.

† This case was brought forward at the impeachment, and was much aggravated by a discovery, which has been before named, in reference to the young Lady Loftus. "In the preferring this charge," says Clarendon, "many things of levity, as certain letters of great affection and familiarity from the earl to that lady, which were found in her cabinet after her death, others of passion, were exposed to the public view" (vol. i., p. 175). Ample details of the entire course of the transaction will be found in referring to the Strafford Papers, vol. ii., p. 67, et seq., 82, 160, et seq., 172, et seq., 179, 196, 205, 227, et seq., 259, et seq., 298, 341, 369, 375, 389.

‡ The document will be found in the Strafford Papers, vol. ii., p. 60-64. It is one of the ablest of Wentworth's arguments for his scheme of absolute power. He takes occasion to say in it, "The opinion delivered by the judges, declaring the lawfulness of the assignment for the shipping, is the greatest service that profession hath done the crown in my time."

§ It ought to be stated, to Wentworth's honour, that, though he much desired to have stood well with her majesty, he declined to purchase her favour by acts inconsistent with his own public schemes. See curious evidences of this in Strafford Papers, vol. ii., p. 221, 222, 257, 329, 425, 426, &c. When she had solicited an army appointment for some young courtier, he wrote an earnest entreaty to her chamberlain, accompanying his reasons for declining

The peace, however, which Lord Wentworth so earnestly recommended was now more fatally broken. The whole Scottish nation rose against Charles, in consequence of Laud's religious innovations. Wentworth was not at first consulted respecting these commotions, but he had thrown out occasional advice in his despatches which was found singularly serviceable.* He strove as far as possible, by urging strong defensive measures, to prevent an open rupture. "If," he wrote to Charles, "the war were with a foreign enemy, I should like well to have the first blow; but being with your majesty's own natural, howbeit rebellious subjects, it seems to me a tender point to draw blood first; for, till it come to that, all hope is not lost of reconciliation; and I would not have them with the least colour impute it to your majesty to have put all to extremity till their own more than words enforce you to it."†

Nor did Wentworth serve Charles at this conjuncture with advice alone, for by his amazing personal energy he forced down some opening commotions among the 60,000 Scottish settlers in Ulster, and not only disabled them from joining or assisting their countrymen, but compelled them to abjure the covenant.‡ Nor this alone. He forwarded from Ireland a detachment of troops to garrison Carlisle; he announced that the army of Ireland was in a state of active recruiting and discipline; he offered large contributions from himself and his friends towards the necessary expenses of resistance; and by every faith of loyalty, and bond of friendship and of service, he called on every man in Yorkshire to stir himself in the royal cause. "To be lazy lookers on," he wrote to the Lord Lorne, "to lean to the king behind the curtain, or to whisper forth only our allegiance, will not serve our turn! much rather ought we to break our shins in emulation who should go soonest and farthest, in assurance and in courage, to uphold the prerogatives and full dominion of the crown; ever remembering ourselves that nobility is such a grudging and envied piece of monarchy, that all tumultuary force offered to kings doth ever, in the second place, fall upon the peers, being such notes in the eyes of a giddy multitude as they never believe themselves clear-sighted into their liberty indeed till these be at least levelled to a parity as the other altogether removed, to give better prospect to their anarchy."§

The sluggish and irresolute councils of England looked ill beside the movements of the deputy. The king asked a service from him, but the instructions came too late. "If his majesty's mind had been known to me in time," he wrote to Vane, the treasurer of the household, "I could have as easily secured it against all the covenanters and devils in Scotland as the appointment: "If I may by you understand her majesty's good pleasure, it will be a mighty quietness unto me; for if once these places of command in the army become suits at court, looked upon as preferments and portions for younger children, the honour of this government, and, consequently, the prosperity of these affairs, are lost." The king himself appears to have made it a personal request of Wentworth, that he should carry himself "with all duty and respect to her majesty."—Vol. ii., p. 256.

* See vol. ii., p. 191, 192, 235, 280, 324, &c.

† Strafford Papers, vol. ii., p. 314.

‡ Ibid., vol. ii., p. 270, 338, 345.

§ Ibid., p. 210.

now walk up and down this chamber; but where trusts and instructions come too late, there the business is sure to be lost." Openly he now expressed his censure of the royal scheme that had prevailed since the death of Buckingham. "I never was in love with that way of keeping all the affairs of that kingdom of Scotland among those of that nation, but carried indeed as a mystery to all the council of England; a rule but over much kept by our master, which I have told my Lord of Portland many and often a time, plainly professing unto him that I was much afraid that course would at one time or other bring forth ill effects; what those are, we now see and feel at one and the same instant." Finally, when Vane had written in an extremely desponding tone, he rallied him with a noble energy. "It is very true you have reason to think this storm looks very foul and dark towards us, so do also myself; for if the fire should kindle at Raby, I am sure the smoke would give offence to our eyesight at Woodhouse! but I trust the evening will prove more calm than the morning of this day promises. Dulcius lumen solis esse solet jam jam cadentis. All here is quiet; nothing colours yet to the contrary. And if I may have the countenance and trust of my master, I hope, in the execution of such commands as his majesty's wisdom and judgment ordain for me, to contain the Scottish here in their due obedience, or, if they should stir (our 8000 arms and twenty pieces of cannon arrived, which I trust now will be very shortly), to give them such a heat in their cloaths as they never had since their coming forth of Scotland! And yet our standing army here is but 1000 horse and 2000 foot, and not fewer of them, I will warrant you, than 150,000, so you see our work is not very easy. The best of it is, the brawn of a lark is better than the carcass of a kite, and the virtue of one loyal subject more than of 1000 traitors. And is not this pretty well, frow you, to begin with?"

No extremity was urged that found Wentworth unprepared. Windebanke hinted the danger he incurred. "I humbly thank you," he answered, "for your friendly and kind wishes to my safety, but if it be the will of God to bring upon us for our sins that fiery trial, all the respects of this life laid aside, it shall appear more by my actions than words that I can never think myself too good to die for my gracious master, or favour my skin in the zealous and just prosecution of his commands. Statutum est semel." Another—whom he fancied not unwilling to thwart him, reckoning upon safety from the consequences in the lord-deputy's certain destruction—he thus warned: "Perchance even to those that shall tell you before their breath I am but as a feather, I shall be found sadder than lead! for let me tell you, I am so confidently set upon the justice of my master, and upon my own truth, as under them and God I shall pass thorough all the factions of court and heat of my ill-willers without so much as singding the least thread of my coat, nor so alone, but to carry my friends along with me." And, in the midst of the storms his measures were raising on all sides round him, he found time and ease enough to amuse himself in tormenting with grave jests a foolish Earl of Antrim, whom the king had sent to "assist" him. The despatches he wrote on the subject of the "Antrim negotiations" are positive masterpieces of wit and humour.* At the same time, he did not hesitate to assure the king that, but for the safety of Ireland, he would "be most mightily out of countenance to be found in any other place than at his majesty's side!"

Charles acknowledged these vast services with frequent letters. Wentworth was now his great hope, and he found, at last, that at all risks he must have him in England. He had formerly declined his offered attendance—he now prayed for it. He wished, he said, to consult him respecting the army, "but I have much more," he sorrowfully added, "and indeed too much, to desire your counsel and attendance for some time, which I think not fit to express by letter, more than this—the Scots' covenant begins to spread too far. Yet, for all this, I will not have you take notice that I have sent for you, but pretend some other occasion of business."

Wentworth instantly prepared himself to obey. A short time only he took to place his government in the hands of Wandesford and to arrange some of his domestic concerns. His children were his great care. "God bless the young whelps," he said, "and for the old dog there is less matter."† Lady Clare, his mother-in-law, had often requested to have the elder girl with her, and Wentworth had as often vainly tried to let her leave his side. His passion was to see them all near him in a group together, as they may yet be seen in the undying colours of Vandyke, from whose canvass, also, as though it had been painted yesterday, the sternly expressive countenance of their father still gazes at posterity. The present was a time, however, when the sad alternative of a separation from himself promised him alleviation even, and he resolved to send both sisters to their grandmother. The letter he despatched on the occasion to the Lady Clare remains, and it is too touching and beautiful to be omitted here. A man so burdened with the world's accusations as Strafford should be denied none of the advantage which such a document can render to his memory: It is unnecessary to direct attention to its singularly characteristic conclusion:

"My Lord of Clare having writ unto me your ladyship desired to have my daughter

* See the Strafford Papers, vol. ii., p. 157, 204, 211, 259, et seq., 300, et seq., 321, et seq., 325, 331, 334, 339, 353, 356. It is not too much to say that, in reading these papers, the memory is called to the Swifts of past days, and the Fomblanques of our own. The poor lord's pretensions are most ludicrously set forth, and in a vein of exquisite pleasantry, but little consistent with the popular notion of Strafford's unbending sternness.

† See various letters in the course of his correspondence, in which the most tender enthusiasm is expressed for them, and for their dead mother (vol. i., p. 236; vol. ii., p. 122, 123, 146, 379, 380). Nor was his affection less warmly expressed to the child of his living wife. In several affectionate letters to the latter he never fails to send his blessing to "the baby" or to "little Tom." Shortly before this visit to England, however, the latter died, and shortly after it, a girl was born.

* This letter is dated "Fairwood Park [the name of his seat in Wicklow], this 16th of April, 1639. I will change it with you, if you will, for Fair Lane."—Strafford Papers, vol. ii., p. 325-328.

Anne with you for a time in England, to recover her health, I have at last been able to yield so much from my own comfort, as to send both her and her sister to wait your grave, wise, and tender instructions. They are both, I praise God, in good health, and bring with them hence from me no other advice, but entirely and cheerfully to obey and do all you shall be pleased to command them, so far forth as their years and understanding may administer unto them.

"I was unwilling to part them, in regard those that must be a stay one to another, when by course of nature I am gone before them. I would not have them grow strangers whilst I am living. Besides, the younger gladly imitates the elder, in disposition so like her blessed mother, that it pleases me very much to see her steps followed and observed by the other.

"Madam, I must confess, it was not without difficulty before I could persuade myself thus to be deprived the looking upon them, who, with their brother, are the pledges of all the comfort, the greatest at least, of my old age, if it shall please God I attain thereunto. But I have been brought up in afflictions of this kind, so as I still fear to have that taken first that is dearest unto me, and have in this been content willingly to overcome my own affections in order to their good, acknowledging your ladyship capable of doing them more good in their breeding than I am. Otherways, in truth, I should never have parted with them, as I profess it a grief unto me not to be able as well as any to serve the memory of that noble lady in these little harmless infants.

"Well, to God's blessing and your ladyship's goodness I commit them! where-ever they are, my prayers shall attend them, and have of sorrow in my heart till I see them again I must, which I trust will not be long neither. That they shall be acceptable unto you, I know it right well, and I believe them so graciously minded to render themselves so the more, the more you see of their attention to do as you shall be pleased to direct them, which will be of much contentment unto me; for, whatever your ladyship's opinion may be of me, I desire, and have given it them in charge (so far as their tender years are capable of), to honour and observe your ladyship above all the women in the world, as well knowing that in so doing they shall fulfil that duty whereby of all others they could have delighted their mother the most; and I do infinitely wish they may want nothing in their breeding my power or cost might procure them, or their condition of life hereafter may require; for, madam, if I die tomorrow, I will, by God's help, leave them ten thousand pounds apiece, which I trust, by God's blessing, shall bestow them to the comfort of themselves and friends, nor at all considerably prejudice their brother, whose estate shall never be much burdened by a second venter, I assure you.

"I thought fit to send with them one that teacheth them to write; he is a quiet, soft man, but honest, and not given to any disorder; him I have appointed to account for the money to be laid forth, wherein he hath no other direction but to pay and lay forth as your ladyship shall appoint, and still as he wants to go to Woodhouse, where my cousin Rockley will supply him. And I must humbly beseech you to give order to their servants, and otherwise to the tailors at London for their apparel, which I wholly submit to your ladyship's better judgment, and be it what it may be, I shall think it all happily bestowed, so as it be to your contentment and theirs, for cost I reckon not of; and anything I have is theirs so long as I live, which is only worth thanks, for theirs and their brother's all I have must be whether I will or no, and therefore I desire to let them have to acknowledge me for before.

"Nan, they tell me, danceth prettily, which I wish (if with convenience it might be) were not lost, more to give her a comely grace in the carriage of her body, than that I wish they should much delight or practise it when they are women. Arabella is a small practitioner that way also, and they are both very apt to learn that, or anything they are taught.

"Nan, I think, speaks French prettily, which yet I might have been better able to judge had her mother lived. The other also speaks, but her maid being of Guernsey, the accent is not good. But your ladyship is in this excellent, as that, as indeed all things else which may benefit them, they may, and I hope will, learn better with your ladyship than they can with their poor father, ignorant in what belongs women, and otherways, God knows, distracted, and so wanting unto them in all, saving in loving them, and therein, in truth, I shall never be less than the dearest parent in the world!

"Their brother is just now sitting by my elbow, in good health, God be praised; and I am in the best sort accommodating this place for him, which, in the kind, I take to be the noblest one of them in the king's dominions, and where a grass time may be passed with most pleasure of that kind. I will build him a good house, and by God's help, leave, I think, near three thousand pounds a year, and wood on the ground, as much, I dare say, if near London, as would yield fifty thousand pounds, besides a house within twelve miles of Dublin, the best in Ireland, and land to it which, I hope, will be two thousand pounds a year, all which he shall have to the rest, had I twenty brothers of his to sitt beside me. This I write not to your ladyship in vanity, or to have it spoken of, but privately, to let your ladyship see I do not forget the children of my dearest wife, nor altogether bestow my time fruitlessly for them. It is true I am in debt, but there will be, besides, sufficient to discharge all I owe, by God's grace, whether I live or die. And next to these children, there are not any other persons I wish more happiness than to the house of their grandfather, and shall be always most ready to serve them, what opinion soever be had of me, for no others' usage can absolve me of what I owe not only to the memory, but to the last legacy that noble creature left with me when God took her to himself. I am afraid to turn over the leaf, lest your ladyship might think I could never come to a conclusion; and shall, therefore," &c.

He had arranged everything for his departure, when one of his paroxysms of illness seized him. He wrestled with it desperately, and set sail. On landing at Chester, he wrote to Lady Wentworth a sad description of the effects of the journey upon his gout, and the "flux" which afflicted him. He rallied, however, and appeared in London in November, 1639. In a memorable passage, the historian May has described the general conversation and conjecture which had prepared for his approach. Some, he says, remembering his early exertions in the cause of the people, fondly imagined that he had hitherto been subservient to the court only to ingratiate himself thoroughly with the king, and that he would now employ his ascendancy to wean his majesty from arbitrary counsels. Others, who knew his character more profoundly, had different thoughts, and secretly cherished their own most active energies.

Wentworth, Laud, and Hamilton instantly formed a secret council—a "cabinet council," as they were then enviously named by the other courtiers—a "junto," as the people reproachfully called them. The nature of the measures to be taken against the Scots was variously and earnestly discussed, and Wentworth, considering the extremity of affairs, declared at once for war.

Supplies to carry it on formed a more difficult question still, but it sank before Wentworth's energy. He proposed a loan—subscribed to it at once, by way of example, the enormous sum of £20,000—and pledged himself to bring over a large subsidy from Ireland, if the king would call a Parliament there. Encouraged by this assurance, it was resolved to call a Parliament in England also. Laud, Juxon, Hamilton, Wentworth, Cottington, Vane, and Windebanke were all present in council when this resolution was taken. The king then put the question to them whether, upon the resistiveness of Parliament, they would assist him "by extraordinary ways." They assented, passed a vote to that effect, writs for Parliaments in both countries were issued, and Wentworth prepared himself to quit England.

Charles, unsolicited, now invested him with the dignity of earldom. His own very existence seemed dependant on Wentworth's faith, and there was sufficient weakness in the character of the king to render it possible for him to suppose that, even at such a time, the inducement of reward might be necessary as a precaution. The lord-deputy was created Earl of Strafford and Baron of Raby, adorned with the Garter, and invested with the title of Lord-lieutenant, or Lieutenant-general of Ireland—a title which had not been given since the days of Essex. "God willing," wrote Strafford to his wife immediately after, "you will soon see the lieutenant of Ireland, but never like to have a deputy of Ireland to your husband any more."*

On his way to Ireland, the earl was overtaken at Beaumaris by a severe attack of gout, yet, still able to move, he hurried on board, notwithstanding the contrary winds, lest he should be thrown down utterly. He wrote, at the same time, to Secretary Cooke, in the highest spirits, to assure him and his master that they need not fear for his weakness. "For," exclaims the lord-lieutenant, "I will make strange shift, and put myself to all the pain I shall be able to endure, before I be anywhere wanting to my master or his affairs in this conjuncture, and, therefore, sound or lame, you shall have me with you before the beginning of the Parliament. I should not fail, though SIR JOHN ELIOT were living! In the mean space, for love of Christ, call upon and hasten the business now in hand, especially the raising of the horse and all together, the rather, for that this work now before us, should it miscarry, we all are like to be very miserable; but, carried through advisedly and gallantly, shall by God's blessing set us in safety and peace for our lives at after, nay, in probability, the generations that are to succeed us. Pi à faute de courage, je n'en aye que trop! What might I be with my legs, that am so brave without the use of them! Well, halt, blind, or lame, I will be found true to the person of my gracious master, to the service of his crown and my friends." Strange that, at such a moment, Lord Strafford should have recalled the memory of the virtuous and indomitable Eliot! He was soon doomed to know on whose shoulders the mantle of Buckingham's great opponent had fallen.

In March, 1640, Strafford again arrived in Ireland. The members of the Parliament that had just been summoned crowded round him with lavish devotion, gave him four subsidies, which was all that he had desired, and declared that that was nothing in respect to their zeal, for that "his majesty should have the fee-simple of their estates for his great occasions." In a formal declaration, moreover, they imbodyed all this, declared that their present warm loyalty rose from a deep sense of the inestimable benefits the lord-lieutenant had conferred upon their country, and that all these benefits had been effected "without the least hurt or grievance to any well-disposed subject."† The authors of this declaration were the first to turn upon Strafford in his distress. Valuing their praise for its worth in the way of example, the earl forwarded it to England, and requested it to be published to the empire.

He had now been a fortnight in Ireland. Within that time, with a diligence unparalleled and almost incredible, he had effected these results with the Parliament, and levied a body of 8000 men as a re-enforcement to the royal army.‡ He again set sail for England.

I pause here to illustrate the character of this extraordinary person in one respect, which circumstances are soon to make essential. His infirmities of health have frequently been alluded to, but they come now upon the scene more fatally. No one, that has not carefully examined all his despatches, can have any notion of their frightful nature and extent.

The soul of the Earl of Strafford was indeed lodged, to use the expression of his favourite Donne, within a "low and fatal room." We have already seen his friend Radcliffe informing us that in 1622 "he had a great fever, and

* Letter in the Thoresby Museum, Biog. Brit., vol. vii., p. 4182. Some days before he had written to her characteristic news of his children. "The two wenches," he said, "are in perfect health, and now, at this instant, in this house, lodged with me, and rather desirous to be so than with their grandmother. I am not yet fully resolved what to do with them." They were afterward sent back to Lady Clare till the Lady Strafford arrived in London.

* See Strafford Papers, vol. ii., p. 396, 397. Rushworth, vol. iii., p. 1051. Nalson, vol. i., p. 280-284.

† See Radcliffe's Essay.

the next spring a double tertian, and after his recovery a relapse into a single tertian, and a while after a burning fever." It is melancholy to follow the progress of his infirmities, as they are casually recorded by himself: how the trouble of "an humour, which in strict acceptation you might term the gout," soon increases to "an extreme fit, which renders him unfit, not only for business, but for all handsome civility," and is aggravated by "so violent a fit of the stone, as I shall not be able to stir these ten days: it hath brought me very low, and was unto me a torment for three days and three nights above all I ever endured since I was a man!" how the eyes that are "these twelve days full of dinness," ere long are "scarce able to guide his pen thorough blindness with long writing;" and this, too, while "an infirmity I have formerly had in great measure, saluteth me, to wit, an intermitting pulse, attended with faint sweats and heaviness of spirits!"

But ever by the side of the body's weakness we find a witness of the spirit's triumph—a vindication of the mightiness of will! A lengthened despatch to the secretary is begun in "a fit of the gout, which, keeping me still in bed, partly with pain and partly with weariness, makes me unfit for much business." When he entreats a correspondent to "pardon my scribbling, for since the gout took me I am not able to write but with both my legs along upon a stool, believe me, which is not only wearisome in itself, but a posture very untoward for guiding my pen aright," it is with the consolation that, "as Sir Walter Raleigh said very well, so the heart lie right, it skills not much for all the rest." And the advice to "forbear his night watches, and now begin to take more care of his health," is met by the assurance that, "had he fivescore senses to lose, he did and ought to judge them all well and happily bestowed in his majesty's service!"

On the occasion of this last return to England, however, even what has been described would serve little to express what he suffered. Then, when every energy was to be taxed to the uttermost, the question of his fiery spirit's supremacy was indeed put to the issue by a complication of ghastly diseases! In the letter from Dublin, dated Good Friday, 1640, which assures the king that "from this table I shall go on shipboard," he is compelled to add that, "besides my gout, I have a very violent and ill-conditioned flux upon me, such as I never had before. It hath held me already these seven days, and brought me so weak, as in good faith nothing that could concern myself should make me go a mile forth of my chamber. But this is not a season for bemoaning of myself; for I shall cheerfully venture this crazed vessel of mine, and either, by God's help, wait upon your majesty before the Parliament begin, or else deposit this infirm humanity of mine in the dust!" And "from the table" on "shipboard" he went accordingly, and arrived at Chester on the 4th of April, quite broken down by the fatigues of a rough voyage. "I confess," he writes, "that I forced the captain to sea against his will, and have since received my correction for it. A marvellous foul and dangerous night, indeed, we have had of it!" In this state he despatches the following letter to the king: "May it please your sacred majesty,—With some danger I wrought thorough a storm at sea, yet light on a greater misfortune here in harbour, having now got the gout in both my feet, attended with that ill habit of health I brought from Dublin. I purposed to have been on my way again early this morning, but the physician disadviseth it; and in truth, such is my pain and weakness, as I verily believe I were not able to endure it. Nevertheless, I have provided myself of a litter, and will try to-morrow how I am able to bear travel, which if possible I can do, then by the grace of God will I not rest till I have the honour to wait upon your majesty. In the mean time, it is most grievous unto me to be thus kept from those duties which I owe your majesty's service on this great and important occasion. In truth, sir, in my whole life I never desired health more than now, if it shall so please God; not that I can be so vain as to judge myself equally considerable with many other of your servants, but that I might give my own heart the contentment to be near your commands, in case I might be so happy as to be of some small use to my most gracious master in such a conjuncture of time and affairs as this is. God long preserve your majesty."

Next, he dictates a long despatch to the Earl of Northumberland, and attempts, at least, to conclude it with his own hand: "And yet, howbeit I am much resolved and set on all occasions for your service, will my weary hand be able to carry on my pen not one line farther, than only in a word to write myself, in all truth and perfection, your lordship's most humbly to be commanded, STRAFFORDE."

I quote also from this despatch to Northumberland an extraordinary incident which occurred on this occasion, and which illustrates his unremitting vigilance in matters which he could hardly have been expected to superintend even under far more favourable circumstances. "Upon my landing at Nesson I observed a Scottish ship there riding upon her anchors, of some six or seven score ton, and of some eight or ten pieces of ordnance, and here in town I learn that the ship belongs to Irwin, that she was fraught by some merchants here with sacks, and that the master, now in town, is this morning to receive some £600 for freight. Hereupon, considering the day for the general imbargo is so instant, as your lordship knows, I have privately advised the merchants to stay payment of the freight until to-morrow, and will give present direction for the apprehension of the master and his mate, now in town. I have also spoken to the customers to send down to Nesson to arrest the said ship upon pretence of cozening the king in his customs, for which the master is to be examined, and, however, the ship to be fraught for the king's service for the transportation of these men. I have likewise given command to Captain Bartlett presently to repair thither, to be assistant therein to the officers of the customs, and before his leaving the port to see execution of all this, as also to take forth of her all her Scottish mariners, her sails and guns, and to bring them on shore, leaving only aboard such English mariners as shall be sufficient to send the ship there, till farther directions. Thus will she lye fair and open for your arrest, and perchance prove your best prize of that kind, and really being manned with English mariners, which may be pressed for that occasion, be of all other the fittest vessel for the transportation of your men and ammunition to Dunbarton. If I have been over-diligent herein, in doing more than (I confess) I have commission for, I humbly crave your lordship's pardon, and hope the rather to obtain it, in regard it is a fault easily mended, for my honest Blue-cap will be hereby so affrighted, as the delivery back unto him of his freight, goods, and ship will sufficiently fulfil his desires and contentment."

A letter written the following day to Windebanke is most eminently characteristic: "I thank you," he says, "for your good wishes, that I might be free of the gout; but a deaf spirit I find it, that will neither hear nor be persuaded to reason. My pain, I thank God, is gone, yet I am not able to walk once about the chamber, such a weakness hath it left behind. Nevertheless, my obstinacy is as great as formerly, for it shall have much more to do before it make me leave my station in these uncertain times. Of all things I love not to put off my cloaths and go to bed in a storm. The lieutenant," he proceeds, "that made the false muster, cannot be too severely punished. If you purpose to overcome that evil, you must fall upon the first transgressors like lightning!"

Beside such zealotousness as Strafford's, the devotion of others was like to come tardily off. The letter to Windebanke proceeds: "The proxies of the Irish nobility I have received and transmitted over. I cannot but observe how cautious still your great friend, my Lord of St. Alban's, is, lest he might seem to express his affections towards the king with too much frankness and confidence. Lord! how willing he is, by doing something, as good as nothing, to let you see how well contented he would be to dissolve the crown, if it were in his power, as indeed it is not. But if his good lordship and his fellows were left to my handling, I should quickly teach them better duties, and put them out of liking with these perverse froward humours. But the best is, by the good help of his friends, he need not apprehend the short horns of such a curst cow as myself; yet this I will say for him, all your kindness shall not better his affections to the service of the crown, or render him thankful to yourselves longer than his turn is in serving. Remember, sir, that I told you of it. The Lord Roch is a person in a lesser volume, of the very self-same edition. Poor soul, you see what he would be at, if he knew how. But seriously let me ask you a question, What would these and such like gentlemen do, were they absolute in themselves, when they are thus forward at that very instant of time when their whole estates are justly and fairly in the king's merey? In a word, till I see punishments and rewards well and roundly applied, I fear very much the frowardness of this generation will not be reduced to moderation and right reason, but that it shall extremely much difficult his majesty's ministers, nay, and himself too, in the pursuit of his just and royal designs."

Mr. Brodie has accused Strafford's despatches of heaviness, and certainly every word in them has its weight. This extraordinary letter concludes thus: "It troubles me very much to understand by these your letters that the deputy lieutenants of Yorkshire should show themselves so foolish and so ingrate as to refuse to levy 200 men and send them to Berwick, without a caution of reimbursement of coat and conduct money. As for the precedent they allege, they well term them to be indeed of former times, for sure I am none of them can remember any such thing of their own knowledge, or have learned any such thing by their own practice. What they find in some blind book of their fathers kept by his clerk, I know not, but some such poor business is the best proof I believe they can show for that allegation. Perchance Queen Elizabeth now and then did some such thing; but then it ought to be taken as matter of bounty, not of duty, the law being so clear and plain in that point, as you know. Upon my coming to town I will inform myself who have been the chief leaders in this business, and thereupon give my gentlemen something to remember it by hereafter. But, above all, I cannot sufficiently wonder that my lords at the board should think of any other satisfaction than sending for them up, and laying them by the heels, especially considering what hath already been resolved on there amongst us. What, I beseech you, should become of the levy of your 30,000 men, in case the other counties of the kingdom should return you the like answer? And therefore this insolence of theirs ought, in my poor opinion, to have been suffocated in the birth, and this boldness met with a courage, which should have taught them their part in these cases to have been obedience, and not dispute. Certain I am, that in Queen Elizabeth's time (those golden times that appear so glorious in their eyes, and render them dazzled towards any other object) they would not have had such an expostulation better cheap than the Fleet. The very plain truth is, and I beseech you that it may humbly, on my part, be represented to his majesty in discharge of my own duty, that the council-board of late years have gone with so tender a foot in those businesses of lieutenantacy, that it hath almost lost that power to the crown; and yet such a power it is, and so necessary, as I do not know how we should be able either to correct a rebellion at home, or to defend ourselves from an invasion from abroad, without it. All which, nevertheless, I mention with all humility in the world, without the least imputation to any particular person living or dead, and humbly beseech his majesty to cause the reins of this piece of his government to be strongly gathered up again, which have of late hung too long loose upon us his lieutenants and deputy lieutenants within the kingdom."

Notwithstanding his desperate state, Strafford caused himself to be pushed on to London. A desire of the king that he should not hazard the journey, reached him already engaged in it.* He persisted in being transported thither in a litter by easy journeys. In London a greater and final occasion was yet to be afforded him for the display of an indomitable nature triumphantly baffling disease and decay, and still, with the increasing and imperious urgency of the need, towered ever prouder the inexhaustible genius of Strafford.

* It is worth quoting, as almost the only expression of care and sympathy Charles had hitherto given to his minister. "Having seen divers letters, Strafford, to my Lord

The Parliament had met, and the earl immediately took his seat in the House of Lords. Their proceedings, and their abrupt dissolution, belong to history. After that fatal state error, an army, to the command of which Northumberland had been appointed, was marched against the Scots. Severe illness, however, held Northumberland to his bed, and the king resolved to appoint Strafford in his place. "The Earl of Strafford," observes Clarendon, "was scarce recovered from a great sickness, yet was willing to undertake the charge out of pure indignation to see how few men were forward to serve the king with that vigour of mind they ought to do; but knowing well the malicious designs which were contrived against himself, he would rather serve as lieutenant-general under the Earl of Northumberland than that he should resign his commission; and so, with and under that qualification, he made all possible haste towards the north before he had strength enough for the journey."* The same noble historian, after saying that Strafford could with difficulty, in consequence of illness, sit in his saddle, describes the shock he experienced in receiving intelligence of the disgraceful flight of a portion of the king's troops at Newbourn on the Tyne, and proceeds thus: "In this posture the Earl of Strafford found the army about Durham, bringing with him a body much broken with his late sickness, which was not clearly shaken off, and a mind and temper confessing the dregs of it, which, being marvellously provoked and inflamed with indignation at the late dishonour, rendered him less gracious, that is, less inclined to make himself so, to the officers upon his first entrance into his charge: it may be, in that mass of disorder not quickly discerning to whom kindness and respect was justly due. But those who by this time, no doubt, were retained for that purpose, took that opportunity to incense the army against him, and so far prevailed in it, that in a short time it was more inflamed against him than against the enemy."† In this melancholy state, with a disgraced and mutinous force, Strafford fell back upon York.

From this moment he sank daily. Intrigues of the most disgraceful character, carried on by Holland, Hamilton, and Vane, and assisted every way by the queen, united with his sickness to break him down. Still he was making desperate efforts to strengthen and animate his army, when suddenly he found that a treaty with the Scots had actually commenced, and that his especial enemy, Lord Savile, was actively employed to forward it. Ultimately, these negotiations were placed in the hands of sixteen peers, every one of whom were his personal opponents. And the crowning enemy was behind—"an enemy," as Lord Clarendon observes, "more terrible than all the others, and like to be more fatal, the whole Scottish nation, provoked by the declaration he had procured of Ireland, and some high carriage and expressions of his against them in that kingdom."* They illustrated this eminent hatred by peremptorily refusing, in the midst of much profession of attachment to the king and the English nation, to hold any conferences at York, because it was within the jurisdiction of him whom they called that "chief incendiary," their "mortal foe," the Lord-lieutenant of Ireland.

In this there was exaggeration. Notwithstanding the assertions of nearly all the histories that Strafford's continual counsel to Charles was to rely on arms alone, it is quite certain, from the minutes of the Council of Peers at York,† that this is erroneous. When he sent the commission to Ormond to bring over his own army of 20,000 men from Ireland, the negotiations had not been resumed, and, on the resumption of them, that commission was withdrawn. Now, however, thwarted and exasperated on all sides, he resolved to furnish one more proof (it was destined to be the last) of the possibility of recovering the royal authority by a great and vigorous exertion. During the negotiations no actual cessation of arms had been agreed to by the Scots, and he therefore secretly despatched a party of horse, under a favourite officer, to attack them in their quarters. A large body of the enemy were defeated by this manœuvre, all their officers taken prisoners, the army inspirited, and the spirits of Strafford himself restored. Again he spoke confidently of the future, when suddenly the king, prevailed on by others, commanded him to forbear. In the same moment, without any previous warning, he was told that a Parliament was summoned.

Strafford saw at once the extent of his danger. He had thrown his last stake and lost it. He prayed of the king to be allowed to retire to his government in Ireland, or to some other place where he might promote his majesty's service, and not deliver himself into the hands of his enraged enemies. Charles refused. He still reposed on the enormous value of his minister's genius, and considered that no sacrifice too great might be incurred for the chance of its service to himself in the coming struggle. At the same time, he pledged himself by a sol-of Canterbury, concerning the state of your health at this time, I thought it necessary by this to command you not to hazard to travel before ye may do it with the safety of your health, and in this I must require you not to be your own judge, but be content to follow the advice of those that are about you, whose affections and skill ye shall have occasion to trust unto. If I did not know that this care of your health were necessary for us both at this time, I would have deferred my thanks to you for your great service lately done until I might have seen you. So, praying to God for your speedy recovery, I rest your assured friend."

* History, vol. i., p. 114.

† Vol. i., p. 115.

* The hatred was, indeed, mutual. Strafford more than once, in his despatches, shows that he even disliked, and was disposed to turn into ridicule, their mode of speech. Alluding to a Scotchman, for instance, a Mr. Barre, whom he supposed to have been favoured by the court intriguers against him, he writes from Ireland thus: "Then on that side he procures, by some very near his majesty, access to the king, there whispering continually something or another to my prejudice; boasts familiarly how freely he speaks with his majesty, what he saith concerning me, and now ant please your majesty ea verbe mare anent your debuty of Yrland, with many such like botades, stuffed with a mighty deal of untruths and follies amongst." And see Rushworth, vol. iii., p. 1293.

† Printed in the Hardwicke State Papers. And see a very able and impartial view of Strafford's conduct and character, in the History continued from Mackintosh emin promise, that, "while there was a king in England, not a hair of Strafford's head should be touched by the Parliament!" The earl arrived in London.

"It was about three of the clock in the afternoon," says Clarendon, "when the Earl of Strafford (being infirm and not well disposed in health, and so not having stirred out of his house that morning), hearing that both houses still sate, thought fit to go thither. It was believed by some (upon what ground was never clear enough) that he made that haste there to accuse the Lord Say, and some others, of having induced the Scots to invade the kingdom; but he was scarce entered into the House of Peers, when the message from the House of Commons was called in, and when Mr. Pym at the bar, and in the name of all the Commons of England, impeached Thomas, earl of Strafford (with the addition of all his other titles), of high treason!"

Upward of twelve years had elapsed since Sir Thomas Wentworth stood face to face with Pym. Upon the eve of his elevation to the peerage they had casually met at Greenwich, when, after a short conversation on public affairs, they separated with these memorable words, addressed by Pym to Wentworth: "You are going to leave us, but I will never leave you while your head is upon your shoulders!"* That prophetic summons to a more fatal meeting was now at last accomplished!

Strafford had entered the House, we learn from one who observed him, with his usual impetuous step—"with speed," says Baillie, "he comes to the House; he calls rudely at the door; James Maxwell, keeper of the black rod, opens; his lordship, with a proud, glooming countenance, makes towards his place at the board-head; but at once many bid him void the House; so he is forced, in confusion, to go to the door till he was called. . . He offered to speak, but was commanded to be gone without a word. In the outer room, James Maxwell required him, as prisoner, to deliver his sword. When he had got it, he cries, with a loud voice, for his man to carry my lord-lieutenant's sword. This done, he makes through a number of people to his coach, all gazing, no man capping to him, before whom that morning the greatest in England would have stood discovered."

This was a change indeed! Yet it was a change for which Strafford would seem to have been found not altogether unprepared. In all the proceedings preliminary to his memorable trial, in all the eventful incidents that followed, he was quiet and collected, and showed, in his general bearing, a magnanimous self-subduement. It is a mean as well as a hasty judgment which would attribute this to any unworthy compromise with his real nature. It is probably a juster and more profound view of it to say, that into a few of the later weeks of his life new knowledge had penetrated from the midst of the breaking of his fortunes. It was well and beautifully said by a then living poet,

"The soul's dark cottage, battered and decayed, Lies in new light through chinks that time has made!"

* An admirable commentary on this fierce text is supplied by my friend Mr. Cattermole, at the commencement of the volume.

Q

and when suddenly upon the sight of Strafford broke the vision of the long unseen assembly of the people, with the old chiefs and the old ceremonies, only more august and more fatal—when he saw himself, in a single hour, disabled by a set of men not greater in vigour or in intellect than those over whom the weak-minded Buckingham had for years contemptuously triumphed—the chamber of that assembly forsaken for Westminster Hall—its once imperious master become a timid auditor, listening unobserved through his screening curtains, and unable to repress by his presence a single threatening glance, or subdue a single fierce voice, among the multitude assembled to pronounce judgment on his minister—that multitude grown from the "faithful Commons" into the imperial council of the land, and the sworn upholders of its not yet fallen liberties—Pym no longer the mouthpiece of a faction that might be trampled on, but recognised as the chosen champion of the people of England, "the delegated voice of God"—when Strafford had persuaded himself that all this vision was indeed a reality before him, we may feel the sudden and subduing conviction which at once enthralled him to itself! the conviction that he had mistaken the true presentment of that principle of power which he worshipped, and that his genius should have had a different devotion. He had not sunk lower, but the Parliament had towered immeasurably higher!

The first thing he did after his arrest was to write to the Lady Strafford. "Sweet harte,—You have heard before this what hath befallen me in this place, but be you confident, that if I fortune to be blamed, yet I will not, by God's help, be ashamed. Your carriage upon this misfortune I should advise to be calm, not seeming to be neglective of my trouble, and yet so as there may appear no defection in you. Continue on the family as formerly, and make much of your children. Tell Will, Nan, and Arabella I will write to them by the next. In the mean time, I shall pray for them to God that he may bless them, and for their sakes deliver me out of the furious malice of my enemies, which yet I trust, through the goodness of God, shall do me no hurt. God have us all in his blessed keeping. Your very loving husbande, STRAFFORDE."

A few days after this, having vainly proffered bail, he was committed to the Tower. Thereupon he wrote again to Lady Strafford. "Sweet harte,—I never pityed you so much as I do now, for in the death of that great person the deputy, you have lost the principal friend you had there, whilst we are here riding out the storm, as well as God and the season shall give us leave. Yet I trust Lord Dillon will supply unto you in part that great loss, till it please God to bring us together again. As to myself, albeit all be done against me that art and malice can devise, with all the rigour possible, yet I am in great inward quietnesse, and a strong believe God will deliver me out of all these troubles. The more I look into my case, the more hope I have, and sure, if there be any honour and justice left, my life will not be in danger, and for anything els, time, I trust, will salve any other hurt which can be done me. Therefore hold up your heart, look to the children and your house, let me have your prayers, and at last, by God's good pleasure, we shall have our deliverance, when we may as little look for it as we did for this blow of misfortune, which, I trust, will make us better to God and man. Your loving husbände, STRAFFORDE."

The preliminary arrangements having been settled, and some negotiations proposed by Charles with a view to his rescue having failed, Strafford's impeachment began. Never had such "pompous circumstances" and so "state-ly a manner" been witnessed at any judicial proceeding in England. One only, since that day, has matched it. It was not the trial of an individual, but the solemn arbitration of an issue between the two great antagonist principles, liberty and despotism. Westminster Hall, which had alternately witnessed the triumphs of both, was the fitting scene. Scaffolds, nearly reaching to the roof, were erected on either side, eleven stages high, divided by rails. In the upper ranks of these were the commissioners of Scotland and the lords of Ireland, who had joined with the commoners of England in their accusations. In the centre sat the peers in their Parliament robes, and the lord-keeper and the judges, in their scarlet robes, were on the wooolsacks. At the upper end, beyond the peers, was a chair raised under a cloth of state for the king, and another for the prince. The throne was unoccupied, for the king was supposed not to be present, since in his presence, by legal construction, no judicial act could legally be done. Two cabinets or galleries, with trellis-work, were on each side of the cloth of state. The king, the queen, and their court occupied one of these,* the foreign nobility then in London the other. The Earls of Arundel and Lindsey acted, the one as High-steward, and the other as High-constable of England. Strafford entered the hall daily, guarded by two hundred trainbands. The king had procured it as a special favour that the axe should not be carried before him. At the foot of the state-cloth was a scaffold for ladies of quality; at the lower end was a place with partitions, and an apartment to retire to, for the convenience and consultations of the managers of the trial; opposite to this the witnesses entered; and between was a small desk, at which the accused earl stood or sat, with the Lieutenant of the Tower beside him, and at his back four secretaries.

The articles of accusation had gradually, during the long and tedious preliminary proceedings, swelled from nine—which was their original number—to twenty-eight. Pym, in an able speech, presented them to the House of Lords. Strafford entreated that—seeing these charges filled 200 sheets of paper, and involved the various and ill-remembered incidents of fourteen years of a life of severe action—the space of three months should be permitted for the answer. He was allowed three weeks, and on the 24th of February, 1641, his answers, in detail, to the charges of the Commons were read to the House. The 22d of March was then fixed for the commencement of his trial.

On the first reception of the articles, Strafford, with characteristic purpose, wrote to his wife. "Sweet harte,—It is long since I writt unto you, for I am here in such a trouble as gives me little or no respitt. The charge is now come in, and I am now able, I prayse God, to tell you that I conceive there is nothing capitall; and for the reste, I know at the worste his majestie will pardon all, without hurting my fortune; and then we shall be happy, by God's grace. Therefore comfort yourself, for I trust thes cloudes will away, and that wee shall have faire weather afterwarde. Farewell. Your loving husbände, STRAFFORDE." He expressed the same opinion in a letter to Sir Adam Loftus.

A short summary of the charges will be sufficient for the present purpose; for it is not necessary, after the ample notice which has been given of Strafford's life and actions, to occupy any considerable space with the proceedings, which only farther illustrated them here.*

The grand object which the leaders of the Commons had in view was to establish against Strafford AN ATTEMPT TO SUBVERT THE FUNDAMENTAL LAWS OF THE COUNTRY.† They had an unquestionable right, with this view, to blend in the impeachment offences of a different degree; nor was it ever pretended by them that more than one or two of the articles amounted to treason. Their course—to deduce a legal construction of treason from actions notoriously gone "thorough" with in the service and in exaltation of the king—was to show that, no matter with what motive, any actions undertaken which had a tendency to prove destructive to the state, amounted, in legal effect, to a traitorous design against the sovereign. The sovereign, it was argued by these great men, could never have had a contemplated existence beyond, or independent of, the state. It could never have been the object, they said, to have defended the king by the statute of Edward III., and to have left undefended the great body of the people associated under him. This principle Strafford had himself recognised in his support of the petition of right, and it is truly observed by Rushworth, that "all the laws confirmed and renewed in that petition of right were said to be the most evenomed arrows that gave him his mortal wound." The proofs by which it was proposed to sustain the tremendous accusation were to be deduced from a series of his actions infringing the laws, from words intimating arbitrary designs, and from certain counsels which directly tended to the entire ruin of the frame of the Constitution.

Over the three great divisions of his public functions the articles of impeachment were distributed. As president of the council of York, he was charged with having procured powers subversive of all law, with having committed insufferable acts of oppression under colour of his instructions, and with having distinctly announced tyrannical intentions, by declaring that the people should find "the king's little finger heavier than the loins of the law." As governor of Ireland, he was accused of having publicly asserted "that the Irish was a conquered nation, and that the king might do with them as he pleased." He was charged with acts of oppression towards the Earl of Cork, Lord Mountnorris, the Lord-chancellor Loftus, the Earl of Kildare, and other persons. He had, it was alleged, issued a general warrant for the seizure of all persons who refused to submit to any legal decree against them, and for their detention till they either submitted, or gave bail to appear before the council table: he had sent soldiers to free quarters on those who would not obey his arbitrary decrees; he had prevented the redress of his injustice by procuring instructions to prohibit all persons of distinction from quitting Ireland without his express license: he had appropriated to himself a large share of the customs, the monopoly of tobacco, and the sale of licenses for the exportation of certain commodities: he had committed grievous acts of oppression in guarding his monopoly of tobacco: he had, for his own interest, caused the rates on merchandise to be raised, and the merchants to be harassed with new and unlawful oaths: he had obstructed the industry of the country by introducing new and unknown processes into the manufacture of flax: he had encouraged his army, the instrument of his oppression, by assuring them that his majesty would regard them as a pattern for all his three kingdoms: he had enforced an illegal oath on the Scottish subjects in Ireland: he had given undue encouragement to Papists, and had actually composed the whole of his new-levied troops of adherents from that religion. As chief minister of England, it was laid to his charge that he had instigated the king to make war on the Scots, and had himself, as governor of Ireland, commenced hostilities: that, on the question of supplies, he had declared, "That his majesty should first try the Parliament here, and if that did not supply him according to his occasions, he might then use his prerogative to levy what he needed; and that he should be acquitted both of God and man if he took some other courses to supply himself, though it were against the will of his subjects;" that, after the dissolution of that Parliament, he had said to his majesty, "That, having tried the affections of his people, he was loose and absolved from all rules of government, and was to do everything that power would admit; that his majesty had tried all ways, and was refused, and should be acquitted both to God and man; that he had an army in Ireland which he might employ to reduce England to obedience." He was farther charged with having counselled the royal declaration which reflected so bitterly on the last Parliament; with the seizure of the bullion in the Tower; the proposal of coining base money; a new levy of ship-money; and the loan of £100,000 from the city of London. He was accused of having told the refractory citizens that no good would be done till they were laid up by the heels, and some of their aldermen hanged for an example. It was laid to his charge that he had levied arbitrary exactions on the people of Yorkshire to maintain his troops; and, finally, that his counsels had given rise to the rout at Newburn.*

* Rushworth has devoted a large folio volume to the occurrences of the impeachment alone.

† They had passed this vote in the House of Commons, and against it not a voice was raised, even by the earl's most ardent supporters. "That the Earl of Strafford had endeavoured to subvert the ancient and fundamental laws of the realm, and to introduce arbitrary and tyrannical government."

* The king, however, observes Bailie, "brake down the screens with his own hands, so they sat in the eyes of all, but little more regarded than if they had been absent, for the lords sat all covered." Bailie was the principal of the college of Glasgow, and present by order of the Scottish party.

In his answers and opposing evidence, Strafford maintained that "the enlarged instructions for the council of York had not been procured by his solicitations; that the specified instances of oppression in the northern counties were committed after his departure for Ireland; and that the words imputed to him were directly the reverse of those which he had spoken. With regard to Ireland, he vindicated his opinion that it was a conquered country, and that the king's prerogative was much greater there than in England. He contended that all the judgments, charged on him as arbitrary, were delivered by competent courts, in none of which he had above a single voice: that the prevention of persons from quitting the kingdom without license, as well as placing soldiers at free quarters on the disobedient, were transactions consistent with ancient usages: that the flax manufacture owed all its prosperity to his exertions, and that his prohibition tended to remedy some barbarous and unjust methods of sorting the yarn: that his bargains for the customs and tobacco were profitable to the crown and the country: and that the oath which he had enforced on the Scots was required by the critical circumstances of the times, and fully approved by the government. In regard to his transactions in England, he answered that hostility against Scotland having been resolved on, he had merely counselled an offensive in preference to a defensive war: that his expressions relative to supplies were in strict conformity to the established maxim of the Constitution:† that, in such emergencies as a foreign invasion, the sovereign was entitled to levy contributions, or adopt any other measure for the public defence: that the words relative to the employment of the Irish army were falsely stated, and that he had not ventured to apply to the kingdom of England words uttered in a committee expressly assembled to consider of the reduction of Scotland. He said that his harsh expressions towards the citizens of London were heard by only one interested individual, and not heard by others who stood as near him: that the contributions in Yorkshire were voluntary: and that the proposals for seizing the bullion and coining base money did not proceed from him.‡

The charges which remained untouched by these answers were abandoned by the Commons, as irrelative or incapable of proof, and on the 23d of March, 1641, the chief manager, Mr. Pym, rose in Westminster Hall, and opened the case against him.

The "getting up" of that mighty scene has been described, and a few words may serve to put it, as it were, in action.

Three kingdoms, by their representatives, were present, and for fifteen days, the period of the duration of the trial, "it was daily," says Bailie, "the most glorious assembly the isle could afford." The earl himself appeared before it each day in deep mourning, wearing his George. The stern and simple character of his features accorded with the occasion—his “countenance manly black,” as Whitelock terms it, and his thick dark hair cut short from his ample forehead. A poet who was present exclaimed,

* Strafford's Trial, p. 61-75. Nalson, vol. ii., p. 11-20.

† Salus populi suprema lex.

‡ Strafford's Trial, p. 61-75. Nalson, vol. ii., p. 11-20. I have partly availed myself, in the above, of Mr. MacDermid's abstract, p. 251-259. Some of the charges specified were added in the course of the trial.

“On thy brow
Sate terror mixed with wisdom, and at once Saturn and Hermes in thy countenance.”

To this was added the deep interest which can never be withheld from sickness bravely borne. His face was dashed with paleness, and his body stooped with its own infirmities even more than with his master's cares. This was, indeed, so evident, that he was obliged to allude to it himself, and it was not seldom alluded to by others. “They had here,” he said, on one occasion, “this rag of mortality before them, worn out with numerous infirmities, which, if they tore into shreds, there was no great loss, only in the spilling of his, they would open a way to the blood of all the nobility in the land.” His disorders were the most terrible to bear in themselves, and of that nature, moreover, which can least endure the aggravation of mental anxiety. A severe attack of stone,* gout in one of his legs to an extent even with him unusual, and other pains, had bent all their afflictions upon him. Yet, though a generous sympathy was demanded on this score, and paid by not a few of his worst opponents, it availed little with the multitudes that were present. Much noise and confusion prevailed at all times through the hall; there was always a great clamour near the doors; and we have it, on the authority of Rushworth himself, that at those intervals when Strafford was busied in preparing his answers, the most distracting “hubbubs” broke out, lords walked about and chatted, and commoners were yet more offensively loud.† This was unfavourable to the recollection, for disproof, of incidents long passed, and of conversations forgotten!‡ But conscious that he was not to be allowed in any case permission to retire, as soon as one of his opponent managers had closed his charge, the earl calmly turned his back to his judges, and, with uncomplaining composure, conferred with his secretaries and counsel.

He had, indeed, it is not to be forgotten, strong assurances to sustain him secretly. He had, first, his own conviction of the legal incompetency of the charges, and to this was added the doubly-pledged faith of the king. In his prison he had received the following letter: “STRAFFORD,—The misfortune that is fallen upon you by the strange mistaking and conjuncture of these times being such that I must lay by the thought of employing you hereafter in my affairs, yet I cannot satisfy myself in honour or conscience without assuring you (now in the midst of your troubles) that, upon the word of a king, you shall not suffer in life, honour, or fortune. This is but justice, and therefore a very mean reward from a master to so faithful and able a servant as you have showed yourself to be, yet it is as much as I conceive the present times will permit, though none shall hinder me from being your constant and faithful friend, CHARLES.” But against these aids were opposed certain significant symptoms of a desperate and fatal purpose on the part of the managers of the impeachment. The bishops, on whom he might reasonably have relied, had, on the motion of Williams, withdrawn from attendance “in agitatione causæ sanguinis,” surrendering the right they had, under what was called “the constitutions of Clarendon,” of attending in capital trials up to the stage of judgment. Next, the person on whose evidence Strafford mainly relied in the proof of his answers, Sir George Radcliffe, had, by a master-stroke of Pym's, been incapacitated suddenly by a charge of treason against himself; not preferred, certainly, without cause, on the presumption of the guilt of the principal—for he had been Strafford's guilty agent in all things—but preferred with a fatal effect to Strafford himself. Again, though counsel had been granted him, they were restricted by the lords, on conference with the commons, to the argument of points of law. Lastly, with an irresistible energy, equalled only by Strafford's own, Pym had forced from the king a release for all the members of his secret council from their oath of secrecy, in order to their examination before the committee of impeachment.

“My lords,” said Strafford, alluding to this, and to certain words of his own which such examination had been alleged to have proved, “My lords, these words were not wantonly or unnecessarily spoken, or whispered in a corner, but they were spoken in full council, where, by the duty of my oath, I was obliged to speak according to my heart and conscience, in all things concerning the king's service. If I had forborne to speak what I conceived to be for the benefit of the king and the people, I had been perjured towards Almighty God; and for delivering my mind openly and freely, shall I be in danger of my life as a traitor! If that necessity be put upon me, I thank God, by his blessing, I have learned not to stand in fear of him who can only kill the body. If the question be whether I must be traitor to man or perjured to God, I will be faithful to my Creator; and whatsoever shall befall me from popular rage or from my own weakness, I must leave it to that Almighty Being, and to the justice and honour of my judges. My lords, I conjure you not to make yourselves so unhappy as to disable yourselves and your children from undertaking the great charge and trust of the Commonwealth. You inherit that trust from your fathers, you are born to great thoughts, you are nursed up for the great and weighty employments of the kingdom. But if it be once admitted that a counsellor, delivering his opinion with others at the council-table, candidè et castè, under an oath of secrecy and faithfulness, shall be brought into question, upon some misapprehension or ignorance of law—if every word, that he speaks from a sincere and noble intention, shall be drawn against him for the attainting of him, his children, and posterity—I know not (under favour I speak it) any wise or noble person of fortune who will, upon such perilous and unsafe terms, adventure to be counsellor to the king! therefore I beseech your lordships so to look on me that my misfortune may not bring an inconvenience upon yourselves. And though my words were not so advised and discreet, or so well weighed as they ought to be, yet I trust your lordships are too honourable and just to lay them to my charge as high treason. Opinions may make a heretic, but that they make a traitor I have never heard till now."

* See Nalson, vol. ii., p. 100, et seq.

† Baillie adds, that in these periods “flesh and bread” was ate, and “bottles of beer and wine were going thick from mouth to mouth.”

‡ Baillie cannot refrain from saying, while he describes the guilt to have been fully proved, that some of the evidence was only “chamber and table discourse, flim-flams, and fearie-fairies.”

Again, in reference to matters alleged against him on the evidence of familiar conversations, he eloquently protested thus: "If, my lords, words spoken to friends in familiar discourse, spoken in one's chamber, spoken at one's table, spoken in one's sick bed, spoken perhaps to gain better reason, to give himself more clear light and judgment by reasoning—if these things shall be brought against a man as treason, this, under favour, takes away the comfort of all human society—by this means we shall be debarred from speaking (the principal joy and comfort of society) with wise and good men to become wiser, and better our lives. If these things be strained to take away life and honour, and all that is desirable, it will be a silent world! A city will become a hermitage, and sheep will be found amongst a crowd and press of people, and no man shall dare to impart his solitary thoughts or opinions to his friend and neighbour!" Noble and touching as this is, let the reader remember, as he reads it, the case of Mountnorris, and the misquoting and torturing of words, in themselves harmless, by which the lord-deputy of Ireland sacrificed that man to his schemes of absolute power. It is mournful to be obliged to add that it is chiefly the genius of a great actor which calls for admiration in this great scene; for though he was, as we may well believe, sincere in his sudden present acknowledgment of that power of the Commons which he had so often braved, the same plea of sincerity cannot serve him in his bold outfacing of every previous action of his power.

As the trial proceeded, so extraordinary were the resources he manifested, that the managers of the Commons failed in much of the effect of their evidence. Even the clergy who were present forgot the imprisonment of the weak and miserable Laud (who now lay in prison, stripped of his power by this formidable Parliament, which the very despotism of himself and Strafford had gifted with its potentially operative force!), and thought of nothing but the "grand apostate" before them. "By this time," says May, "the people began to be a little divided in opinion. The clergy in general were so much fallen into love and admiration of this earl, that the Archbishop of Canterbury was almost quite forgotten by them. The courtiers cried him up, and the ladies were exceedingly on his side. It seemed a very pleasant object to see so many Sempronias, with pen, ink, and paper in their hands, noting the passages, and discoursing upon the grounds of law and state. They were all of his side, whether moved by pity proper to their sex, or by ambition of being able to judge of the parts of the prisoner. But so great was the favour and love which they openly expressed to him, that some could not but think of that verse—

"Non formosus erat, sed erat facundus Ulysses, Et tamen aequoreas torait amore deas!"

Even the chairman of the committee who prepared his impeachment, the author of the Memorials, observes, "Certainly never any man acted such a part, on such a theatre, with more wisdom, constancy, and eloquence, with greater reason, judgment, and temper, and with a better grace in all his words and gestures, than this great and excellent person did."

Such, indeed, appeared to be a very prevailing feeling, when, on the morning of the 10th of April, before the opening of that day's trial, Pym entered the House of Commons and announced a communication respecting the Earl of Strafford of vital importance. The members were ordered to remain in their places, and the doors of the House were locked. Pym and the young Sir Harry Vane then rose, and produced a paper containing "a copy of notes taken at a junto of the privy council for the Scots affairs, about the 5th of May last." These notes were made by Sir Henry Vane the elder, and Clarendon says that he placed them in the hands of Pym out of hatred to Strafford. With much more appearance and likelihood of truth, however, Whitelocke states that the elder Vane, being absent from London, and in want of some papers, sent the key of his study to his son, and that the latter, in executing his father's orders, found this paper, and was ultimately induced by Pym to allow its production against Strafford. The Commons received this new evidence with many expressions of zealous thankfulness.

On the 13th of April the notes were read in Westminster Hall by Pym. They were in the shape of a dialogue and conference, and contained opinions delivered by Laud and Hamilton; but the essential words were words spoken by Strafford to the king. "You have an army in Ireland that you may employ to reduce this kingdom to obedience." Vane the elder was then called. He denied recollection of the words at first, till it had been asserted by others of the privy council that Strafford had used those words, "or the like," when the earl's brother-in-law, Lord Clare, rose and suggested that "this kingdom," by grammatical construction, might mean Scotland. With singular ability Strafford directed all his resources to the weakening of this evidence, but it was generally regarded as fatal. He urged his brother-in-law's objection; the very title of the notes, in proof of the country referred to, "no danger of a war with Scotland, if offensive, not defensive;" and protested against a man's life being left to hang upon a single word. The evidence was finally admitted against him, and he was called upon to make his general defence in person against the facts, leaving the law to his counsel.

He began by adverting to his painful and adverse position, alone and unsupported, against the whole authority and power of the Commons, his health impaired, his memory almost gone, his thoughts unquiet and troubled. He prayed of their lordships to supply his many infirmities by their better abilities, better judgments, better memories. "You alone," he said, "I acknowledge, with all gladness and humility, as my judges. The king condemns no man; the great operation of his sceptre is mercy; he dispenses justice by his ministers; but, with reverence be it spoken, he is not my judge, nor are the Commons my judges, in this case of life and death. To your judgment alone, my lords, I submit myself in all cheerfulness. I have great cause to give thanks to God for this, and celebrated be the wisdom of our ancestors who have so ordained."

With great force and subtle judgment he then argued against the doctrine of arbitrary and constructive treason, and afterward proceeded: "My lords, it is hard to be questioned upon a law which cannot be shown. Where hath this fire lain hid so many hundred years, without smoke to discover it, till it thus bursts forth to consume me and my children? That punishment should precede promulgation of a law, to be punished by a law subsequent to the fact, is extreme hard! What man can be safe if this be admitted? My lords, it is hard in another respect—that there should be no token set by which we should know this offence, no admonition by which we should avoid it. My lords, be pleased to give that regard to the peerage of England, as never expose yourselves to such moot points—such constructive interpretations of laws: if there must be a trial of wits, let the subject-matter be of somewhat else than the lives and honours of peers. It will be wisdom for yourselves, for your posterity, and for the whole kingdom, to cast into the fire these bloody and mysterious volumes of constructive and arbitrary treason, as the primitive Christians did their books of curious arts, and betake yourselves to the plain letter of the law and statute, that telleth us what is and what is not treason, without being more ambitious to be more learned in the art of killing than our forefathers! It is now 240 years since any man was touched for this alleged crime, to this height, before myself. Let us not awaken these sleeping lions to our destructions, by taking up a few musty records, that have lain by the walls so many ages, forgotten or neglected. May your lordships please not to add this to my other misfortunes—let not a precedent be derived from me, so disadvantageous as this will be in its consequence to the whole kingdom. Do not, through me, wound the interest of the Commonwealth: and howsoever these gentlemen say they speak for the Commonwealth, yet in this particular I indeed speak for it, and show the inconveniences and mischiefs that will fall upon it; for, as it is said in the statute 1 Hen. IV., 'No one will know what to do or say for fear of such penalties.' Do not put, my lords, such difficulties upon ministers of state, that men of wisdom, of honour, and of fortune may not with cheerfulness and safety be employed for the public. If you weigh and measure them by grains and scruples, the public affairs of the kingdom will lie waste; no man will meddle with them who hath anything to lose. My lords, I have troubled you longer than I should have done, were it not for the interest of those dear pledges a saint in Heaven hath left me." At this word (says the reporter) he stopped a while, letting fall some tears to her memory; then he went on: "What I forfeit myself is nothing; but that indiscretion should extend to my posterity woundeth me to the very soul.

You will pardon my infirmity; something I should have added, but am not able; therefore let it pass. Now, my lords, for myself, I have been, by the blessing of Almighty God, taught that the afflictions of this present life are not to be compared to the eternal weight of glory which shall be revealed hereafter. And so, my lords, even so, with all tranquillity of mind, I freely submit myself to your judgment, and whether that judgment be of life or death, Te Deum Laudamus.*"

Great was the struggle to be made against such noble and affecting eloquence, and Pym proved himself not unequal to it. While we yield due admiration to the unexampled demeanour of Strafford in this conjuncture—to that quick perception of his exact position, which, while it revealed to him the whole magnitude of the danger, suggested the most plausible defence, and supplied resolution where, to an ordinary spirit, it would have induced despair, so that, while sinking down the tremendous gulf into which he had been so suddenly precipitated, he displayed the same coolness in catching at every weed, however feeble, that might retard his descent, as though the peril had long been foreseen and the methods of escape long rehearsed—while we praise this in him, let us not forget the still more extraordinary bearing of his adversary—the triumph of Pym, as unparalleled as the overthrow of Strafford. In either case, the individual rose or fell with the establishment or the withdrawal of a great principle. Pym knew and felt this, and that with him it now rested whether or not the privileges so long contested, the rights so long misunderstood, of the great body of the people, should win at last their assured consummation and acknowledgment. In the speeches of Pym, the true point is to be recognised on which the vindication of Strafford's death turns. The defence of the accused was technical, and founded on rules of evidence and legal constructions of statutes, which, though clearly defined since, were in that day recognised doubtfully, and frequently exceeded. The

* This is from Whitelocke's Memorials. It is the most beautiful and complete report that has been given. I may subjoin a characteristic note from Baillie's letters. "At the end, he made such a pathetic oration for half an hour as ever comedian did on the stage. The matter and expression was exceeding brave. Doubtless, if he had grace and civil goodness, he is a most eloquent man. One passage is most spoken of—his breaking off in weeping and silence when he spoke of his first wife. Some took it for a true defect in his memory, others for a notable part of his rhetoric; some that true grief and remorse at that remembrance had stopt his mouth; for they say that his first lady, being with child, and finding one of his mistress's letters, brought it to him, and chiding him therefore, he struck her on the breast, whereof she shortly died."—Letters, p. 291. The latter statement is only one of a thousand horrible and disgusting falsehoods which, notwithstanding the abundance of true accusatory matter, were circulated at the time against Strafford, and one or two specimens of which may be found in the fourth volume of Lord Somers's Collection of Tracts. His friends, however, it is to be remarked, were not less forward in getting up all sorts of fictitious points of sympathy (in some respects, also, unnecessary, since they had plenty of true resources in that regard) around him and his memory; and as an instance I may mention that an extremely pathetic letter of Sir Walter Raleigh to his wife (the most pathetic, probably, in the language), written while he expected execution, was printed with Strafford's signature, and with the alteration of words to meet the circumstances of Strafford's death. The writers of the Biog. Brit. do not seem to have been aware of this. But see Somers's Tracts, vol. iv., p. 249, 250; and compare with Biog. Brit., vol. v., p. 3478.

defence of the accusers, if they are indeed to be put upon their defence before a posterity for whose rights they hazarded all things, rests upon a principle which was implanted in man when he was born, and which no age can deaden or obscure. "My lords," said Pym, "we charge him with nothing but what the 'law' in every man's breast condemns, the light of nature, the light of common reason, the rules of common society."* Nor can it be doubted that occasions must ever be recognised by the philosopher and the statesman when the community may be reinvested in those rights which were theirs before a particular law was established. If ever such an occasion had arisen, surely, looking back upon the occurrences of the past, and forward upon the prospects of the future, it had arisen here. It was time that outraged humanity should appeal, as Pym afterward urged, to "the element of all laws, out of which they are derived, the end of all laws, to which they are designed, and in which they are perfected."† The public liberty was in danger from the life of Strafford, and the question of justice reared itself above the narrow limits of the law; for yet, again Pym urged, the law itself can be no other than that "which puts a difference betwixt good and evil, betwixt just and unjust. It is God alone who subsists by himself; all other things subsist in a mutual dependance and relation."‡ Nor can it be alleged, even by the legal opponents of this impeachment, that the proofs advanced under the fifteenth article, which had charged Strafford with raising money by his own authority, and quartering troops upon the people of Ireland, did not advance far more nearly to a substantive treason, within the statute of Edward III., than many of the recognised precedents that were offered. "Neither will this," Pym contended on that ground with a terrible earnestness, "be a new way of blood. There are marks enough to trace this law to the very original of this kingdom; and if it hath not been put in execution, as he allegeth, this 240 years, it was not for want of a law, but that all that time hath not bred a man bold enough to commit such crimes as these!"

At this moment, it is said, Strafford had been closely and earnestly watching Pym, when the latter, suddenly turning, met the fixed and wasted features of his early associate. A rush of other feelings crowding into that look for a moment dispossessed him. "His papers he looked on," says Bailie, "but they could not help him to a point or two, so he beehooded to pass them." But a moment, and Pym's eloquence and dignified command returned. He had thoroughly contemplated his commission, and had resolved on its fulfilment. The occasion was not let slip; the energies, wound up to this feat through years of hard endurance, were not frozen, and the cause of the people was gained. In the condemnation of Strafford they resumed an alienated power, and were reinstated in an ancient freedom.

He was condemned. The judges themselves, on a solemn reference by the House of Lords for their opinion whether some of the articles amounted to treason, answered unanimously, that upon all which their lordships had voted to be proved, it was their opinion the Earl of Strafford did deserve to undergo the pains and penalties of high treason by law.

Meanwhile, before this opinion was taken, the Commons had changed their course, and introduced a bill of attainder. This has been sorely reproached to them, and one or two of the men who had acted with them up to this point now receded. Lord Digby was the principal of these. "Truly, sir," he said, on the discussion of the bill, "I am still the same in my opinions and affections as unto the Earl of Strafford. I confidently believe him to be the most dangerous minister, the most insupportable to free subjects, that can be characterized. I believe his practices in themselves as high, as tyrannical, as any subject ever ventured on, and the malignity of them hugely aggravated by those rare abilities of his, whereof God had given him the use, but the devil the application. In a word, I believe him to be still that grand apostate to the Commonwealth, who must not expect to be pardoned in this world till he be despatched to the other; and yet, let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, my hand must not be to that despatch. I protest, as my conscience stands informed, I had rather it were off!"* The authority of Digby in this affair, however, may well be questioned, since it has been proved that he had at this time entered into an intrigue to save the life of the prisoner, and though he spoke against the bill with extreme earnestness, he at the same time no less earnestly offered to swear that he knew nothing of a certain copy of important notes which had been lost, though they were afterward found in his handwriting in the royal cabinet taken at Naseby, and it turned out that, having access to them as a member of the impeachment committee, he had stolen them.†

The bill of attainder was passed on the 21st of April. While on its way to the Lords, the king went to that house and addressed them. "I am sure," he said, "you all know that I have been present at the hearing of this great case from the one end to the other, and I must tell you that I cannot in my conscience condemn him of high treason: it is not fit for me to argue the business; I am sure you will not expect that; a positive doctrine best becomes the mouth of a prince." After beseeching them not to treat the earl with severity, he thus concluded: "I must confess, for matter of misdemeanors, I am so clear in that, that though I will not chalk out the way, yet let me tell you that I do think my Lord Strafford is not fit hereafter to serve me or the Commonwealth in any place of trust, no, not so much as that of a constable; therefore I leave it to you, my lords, to find some such way as to bring me out of this great strait, and keep ourselves and the kingdom from such inconveniences. Certainly he that thinks him guilty of high treason in his conscience may condemn him of misdemeanor."

When Strafford heard in his prison of this intended interference, he had earnestly pro-

* [This speech of Digby's is one of the most beautiful specimens of eloquence which we have received from the many great speakers of that day. The whole may be found in Sir R. Baker's Chronicles of England.—C.]

† See Whitelocke, p. 43.

* Rushworth, vol. viii., p. 108, 109. † Ibid., p. 661.

‡ Ibid., p. 663.

tested against it, and on learning that the step was actually taken, he gave himself up for lost.* He had judged truly. The leaders of the Commons took advantage of the occasion it offered. The Presbyterian pulpits of the following day, which happened to be Sunday, sent forth into every quarter of London cries of "justice upon the great delinquent;" and on the succeeding morning, furious multitudes, variously armed, thronged the approaches to the House of Lords; placarded as "Straffordians, or betrayers of their country," the names of those commoners who had voted against the attainder; and shouted openly for the blood of Strafford.

Pym, meanwhile, had discovered and crushed a conspiracy for his release, which had originated in the court, and was disclosed by the inviolable fidelity of the governor of the Tower.

No hope remained. The lords, proceeding upon the judicial opinion I have named, passed the bill of attainder, voting upon the articles judicially, and not as if they were enacting a legislative measure.

The Earl of Strafford, with a generosity worthy of his intellect, now wrote to the king and released him from his pledged word. "To say, sir," he wrote in the course of this memorable letter, "that there hath not been a strife in me, were to make me less man than, God knoweth, my infirmities make me; and to call a destruction upon myself and my young children (where the intentions of my heart at least have been innocent of this great offence), may be believed, will find no easy consent from flesh and blood." Its concluding passages ran thus: "So now, to set your majesty's conscience at liberty, I do most humbly beseech your majesty, for prevention of evils which may happen by your refusal, to pass this bill, and by this means to remove, praised be God (I cannot say this accursed, but, I confess), this unfortunate thing forth of the way towards that blessed agreement which God, I trust, shall ever establish between you and your subjects. Sir, my consent shall more acquit you herein to God than all the world can do besides. To a willing man there is no injury done. And as, by God's grace, I forgive all the world with a calmness and meekness of infinite contentment to my dislodging soul, so, sir, to you I can give the life of this world, with all the cheerfulness imaginable, in the just acknowledgment of your exceeding favours, and only beg that in your goodness you would vouchsafe to cast your gracious regard upon my poor son and his three sisters, less or more, and no otherwise, than as their (in present) unfortunate father may hereafter appear more or less guilty of this death."

The singular note which has been preserved by Burnet, and which relates circumstances taken from the lips of Hollis himself, continues the deep interest of this tragic history: "The Earl of Strafford had married his sister: so, though in the Parliament he was one of the hottest men of the party, yet when that matter was before them he always withdrew. When the bill of attainder was passed, the king sent for him to know what he could do to save the Earl of Strafford. Hollis answered that, if the king pleased, since the execution of the law was in him, he might legally grant him a reprieve, which must be good in law; but he would not advise it. That which he proposed was, that Lord Strafford should send him a petition for a short respite, to settle his affairs and to prepare for death, upon which he advised the king to come next day with the petition in his hands, and lay it before the two houses, with a speech which he drew for the king, and Hollis said to him, he would try his interest among his friends to get them to consent to it. He prepared a great many by assuring them that, if they would save Lord Strafford, he would become wholly theirs in consequence of his first principles, and that he might do them much more service by being preserved than he could do if made an example upon such new and doubtful points. In this he had wrought on so many, that he believed if the king's party had struck into it he might have saved him."*

While the party thus prepared to second Hollis waited their time, the king suddenly resorted to a different scheme, and, having with tears in his eyes signed the commission for giving assent to the bill, declaring at the same time that Strafford's condition was happier, than his own, sent the Lords a letter, written by his own hand, and, as a farther proof of his deep interest, with the young Prince of Wales as its messenger. "I did yesterday," ran this letter, "satisfy the justice of the kingdom by passing the bill of attainder against the Earl of Strafford; but mercy being as inherent and inseparable to a king as justice, I desire at this time, in some measure, to show that likewise, by suffering that unfortunate man to fulfil the natural course of his life in a close imprisonment; yet so, if ever he make the least offer to escape, or offer directly or indirectly to meddle in any sort of public business, especially with me, either by message or letter, it shall cost him his life without farther process. This, if it may be done without the discontentment of my people, will be an unspeakable contentment to me. To which end, as in the first place, I by this letter do earnestly desire your approbation, and to endear it more, have chose him to carry it that of all your House is most dear to me. So I desire, that by a conference you will endeavour to give the House of Commons contentment, assuring you that the exercise of mercy is no more pleasing to me than to see both houses of Parliament consent, for my sake, that I should moderate the severity of the law in so important a case. I will not say that your complying with me in this my intended mercy shall make me more willing, but certainly 'twill make me more cheerful in granting your just grievances. But if no less than his life can satisfy my people, I must say—flat justitia. Thus, again recommending the consideration of my intention to you, I rest." The following was added as a postscript: "If he must die, it were charity to reprieve him until Saturday."

Hollis's scheme was now thoroughly defeated, and death secured to Strafford. This pitiable letter ended all. It is a sorry office to plant the foot on a worm so crushed and writhing as the wretched king who signed it, for it was one of the few crimes of which he was in the event thoroughly sensible, and friend has for once co-operated with foe in the steady application to it of the branding iron. There is, in truth, hardly any way of relieving the "damned spot" of its intensity of hue, even by distributing the concentrated infamy over other portions of Charles's character. The reader who has gone through the preceding details of Strafford's life can surely not suggest any; for when we have convinced ourselves that this "unthankful king" never really loved Strafford; that, as much as in him lay, he kept the dead Buckingham in his old privilege of mischief, by adopting his aversions and abiding by his spleenful purposes; that, in his refusals to award those increased honours for which his minister was a petitioner, on the avowed ground of the royal interest, may be discerned the petty triumph of one who dares not dispense with the services thrust upon him, but revenges himself by withholding their well-earned reward—still does the blackness accumulate to baffle our efforts. The paltry tears he is said to have shed only burn that blackness in. If his after conduct indeed had been different, he might have availed himself of one excuse; but that the man who, in a few short months, proved that he could make so resolute a stand somewhere, should have judged this event no occasion for attempting it, is either a crowning infamy or an infinite consolation, according as we may judge wickedness or weakness to have preponderated in the constitution of Charles I.*

* Clarendon and Radcliffe.

* Own Time, book i.

Sufficient has been said to vindicate these remarks from any, the remotest, intention of throwing doubt on the perfect justice of that bill of attainder. Bills of attainder had not been uncommon in England; are the same in principle as the ordinary bills of pains and penalties; and the resort to that principle in the present case arose from no failure of the impeachment, as has been frequently alleged,† but because, in the course of that impeachment, circumstances arose which suggested to the great leader of the popular cause the greater safety of fixing this case upon wider and more special grounds. Without stretching to the slightest extent the boundaries of any statute, they thought it better at once to bring Strafford's treason to the condemnation of the sources of all law. In this view it is one of their wisest achievements that has been brought within the most hasty and ill-considered censure—their famous proviso that the attainder should not be acted upon by the judges as a precedent in determining the crime of treason. As to Strafford's death, the remark that the people had no alternative includes all that it is necessary to urge. The king's assurances of his intention to afford him no farther opportunity of crime, could surely weigh nothing with men who had observed how an infinitely more disgusting minister of his will had only seemed to rise the higher in his master's estimation for the accumulated curses of the nation. Nothing but the knife of Felton could sever in that case the weak head and the wicked instrument, and it is to the honour of the adversaries of Strafford that they were earnest that their cause should vindicate itself completely, and look for no adventitious redress. Strafford had outraged the people: this was not denied. He was defended on the ground of those outrages not amounting to a treason-against the king. For my own part, this defence appears to me decisive, looking at it in a technical view, and with our present settlement of evidence and treason. But to concede that point, after the advances they had made, would have been in that day to concede all. It was to be shown that another power had claim to the loyalty and the service of Strafford; and if a claim, then a vengeance to exact for its neglect. And this was done.

Nor should the subject be left without the remark that the main principle contended for by Pym and his associates was, at the last, fully submitted to by Strafford. He allowed the full power of the people's assembly to take cognizance of his deeds and to dispose of his life, while most earnestly engaged in defending the former and preserving the latter. Now the calm and magnanimous patience of Strafford was very compatible with a fixed denial of the authority of his judges, had that appeared contestable in his eyes; but we find no intimation of such a disposition. He would not have the Parliament's "punishment precede promulgation of a law;" he pleads that "to be punished by a law subsequent to the fact is extreme hard;" and that "it is hard that there should be no token set by which we should know this offence, no admonition by which we should avoid it;" and he is desirous that "a precedent may not be derived from one so disadvantageous as this;" but, in the mean time, the cause is gained, the main and essential point is given up! The old boasts of the lord-lieutenant's being accountable to the king alone, of the king's will being the one and the only law of his service, are no longer heard. It may be said that a motive of prudence withheld Strafford from indignantly appealing to the king in his lurking-place from the unrecognised array of questioners and self-constituted inquisitors who had taken upon themselves to supersede him; but when the sentence was passed and its execution at hand, when hope was gone and the end rapidly hastening, we still find Strafford offering nothing against the right.

One momentary emotion, not inconsistent with his letter to the king, escaped him when he was told to prepare for death. He asked if the king had indeed assented to the bill. Secretary Carleton answered in the affirmative; and Strafford, laying his hand on his heart, and raising his eyes to heaven, uttered the memorable words, "Put not your trust in princes, nor in the sons of men, for in them there is no salvation." Charles's conduct was indeed incredibly monstrous.

Three days more of existence were granted to Strafford, which he employed calmly in the arrangement of his affairs. He wrote a petition to the House of Lords to have compassion on his innocent children; addressed a letter to his wife, bidding her affectionately to support her courage, and accompanied it with a letter of final instruction and advice to his eldest son.* This is in all respects deeply touching: "MY DEAREST WILL," he wrote, "these are the last lines that you are to receive from a father that tenderly loves you. I wish there were a greater leisure to impart my mind unto you, but our merciful God will supply all things by his grace, and guide and protect you in all your ways—to whose infinite goodness I bequeath you. And therefore be not discouraged, but serve him, and trust in him, and he will preserve and prosper you in all things. Be sure you give all respect to my wife, that hath ever had a great love unto you, and therefore will be well becoming you. Never be awanting in your love and care to your sisters, but let them ever be most dear unto you; for this will give others cause to esteem and respect you for it, and is a duty that you owe them in the memory of your excellent mother and myself, therefore your care and affection to them must be the very same that you are to have of yourself; and the like regard must you have to your youngest sister, for indeed you owe it her also, both for her father and mother's sake. Sweet Will, be careful to take the advice of those friends which are by me desired to advise you for your education." And so the tenderness of the father proceeds through many fond and affectionate charges: With characteristic hope he says, "The king, I trust, will deal graciously with you, and restore you those honours and that fortune which a distempered time hath deprived you of, together with the life of your father." Advice is next given to meet the occurrence of such a chance. "Be sure to avoid as much as you can to inquire after those that have been sharp in their judgments towards me, and I charge you never to suffer thought of revenge to enter your heart, but be careful to be informed who were my friends in this prosecution, and to them apply yourself to make them your friends also; and on such you may rely, and bestow much of your conversation amongst them." And God Almighty of his infinite goodness bless you and your children's children; and his same goodness bless your sisters in like manner, perfect you in ever good work, and give you right understandings in all things. Amen. Your most loving father, THOMAS WENTWORTH.†

* (The world will more readily forgive the faults of Strafford than they will acquit Charles for having consented to his death.—See Jesse's Court of England under the Stuarts, vol. iii., p. 370.—C.)

† The judges and peers voted judicially even on the bill, as has been already stated.

At one time, probably, a deeper pang would have been involved to Strafford in this affecting surrender of his cherished title than in that of existence itself. But this was not the time. Nothing but concern for his family and friends disturbed the composure of his remaining hours. He wrote kind and encouraging letters to "dear George," as he called Sir George Radcliffe; shed tears for the death of Wandesford, whom he had intrusted with the care of his government and family, but who broke his heart on hearing of the sad events that had fallen on his patron; and requested of the Primate of Ireland (Usher), who attended him, to desire "my lord's Grace of Canterbury," his old friend, the now imprisoned and afflicted Laud, "to lend me his prayers this night, and to give me his blessing when I go abroad to-morrow, and to be in his window, that, by my last farewell, I may give him thanks for this, and all other, his former favours." He had previously asked the Lieutenant of the Tower if it were possible to have an interview with Laud, adding, with playful sarcasm, "You shall hear what passes betwixt us. It is not a time either for him to plot heresy, or me to plot treason." The lieutenant, in reply, suggested a petition to the Parliament. "No," was the quiet rejoinder. "I have gotten my despatch from them, and will trouble them no more. I am now petitioning a higher court, where neither partiality can be expected nor error feared."

Laud, old and feeble, staggered to the window of his cell as Strafford passed on the following morning, and, as he lifted his hands to bestow the blessing his lips were unable to utter, fell back and fainted in the arms of his attendant.

Strafford moved on to the scaffold with undisturbed composure. His body, so soon to be released, had given him a respite of its infirmities for that trying hour. Rushworth, the clerk of the Parliament, was one of the spectators, and has minutely described the scene. "When he arrived outside the Tower, the lieutenant desired him to take coach at the gate, lest the enraged mob should tear him in pieces. 'No,' said he, 'Mr. Lieutenant, I dare look death in the face, and the people too; have you a care I do not escape; 'tis equal to me how I die, whether by the stroke of the executioner, or by the madness and fury of the people, if that may give them better content.'" Not less than 100,000 persons, who had crowded in from all parts, were visible on Tower Hill, in a long and dark perspective. Strafford, in his walk, took off his hat frequently, and saluted them, and received not a word of insult or reproach. His step and manner are described by Rushworth to have been those of "a general marching at the head of an army, to breathe victory, rather than those of a condemned man, to undergo the sentence of death." At his side, upon the scaffold, stood his brother, Sir George Wentworth, the Bishop of Armagh, the Earl of Cleveland, and others of his friends, and behind them the indefatigable collector Rushworth, who "being then there on the scaffold with him," as he says, took down the speech which, having asked their patience first, Strafford at some length addressed to the people. He declared the innocence of his intentions, whatever might have been the construction of his acts, and said that the prosperity of his country was his fondest wish. But it augured ill, he told them, for the people's happiness, to write the commencement of a reformation in letters of blood. "One thing I desire to be heard in," he added, "and do hope that for Christian charity's sake I shall be believed. I was so far from being

* [He also wrote a beautiful letter to Guildford Slingsby, his secretary; this is the finest effort of his pen.—C.]

† Strafford Papers, vol. ii., p. 416. The letter bears date the 11th of May, 1641, and has the following postscript: "You must not fail to behave yourself towards my Lady Clare, your grandmother, with all duty and observance; for most tenderly doth she love you, and hath been passing kind unto me. God reward her charity for it! And both in this and all the rest, the same that I counsel you, the same do I direct also to your sisters, that so the same may be observed by you all. And once more do I, from my very soul, beseech our gracious God to bless and govern you in all, to the saving you in the day of his visitation, and join us again in the communion of his blessed saints, where is fulness of joy and bliss for evermore. Amen, Amen." The "youngest sister" was the infant of Lady Strafford.

against Parliaments, that I did always think Parliaments in England to be the happy constitution of the kingdom and nation, and the best means, under God, to make the king and his people happy."*

He then turned to take leave of the friends who had accompanied him to the scaffold. He beheld his brother weeping excessively. "Brother," he said, "what do you see in me to cause these tears? Does any innocent fear betray in me—guilt? or my innocent boldness—atheism? Think that you are now accompanying me the fourth time to my marriage bed. That block must be my pillow, and here I shall rest from all my labours. No thoughts of envy, no dreams of treason, nor jealousies, nor cares for the king, the state, or myself, shall interrupt this easy sleep. Remember me to my sister and to my wife; and carry my blessing to my eldest son, and to Ann, and Arabella, not forgetting my little infant, that knows neither good nor evil, and cannot speak for itself. God speak for it, and bless it!" While undressing himself, and winding his hair under a cap, he said, looking on the block, "I do as cheerfully put off my doublet at this time as ever I did when I went to bed."

"Then," proceeds Rushworth, closing this memorable scene, "then he called, 'Where is the man that shall do this last office? (meaning the executioner). Call him to me.' When he came and asked him forgiveness, he told him he forgave him and all the world. Then kneeling down by the block, he went to prayer again by himself, the Bishop of Armagh kneeling on the one side, and the minister on the other; to the which minister after prayer he turned himself, and spoke some few words softly; having his hands lifted up, the minister closed his hands with his. Then bowing himself to the earth, to lay down his head on the block, he told the executioner that he would first lay down his head to try the fitness of the block, and take it up again, before he laid it down for good and all; and so he did; and before he laid it down again, he told the executioner that he would give him warning when to strike by stretching forth his hands; and then he laid down his neck on the block, stretching out his hands; the executioner struck off his head at one blow, then took the head up in his hand, and showed it to all the people, and said, 'God save the king!'"

Thus, on Wednesday, the 12th of May, 1641, died Thomas Wentworth, the first Earl of Strafford. Within a few weeks of his death the Parliament mitigated the most severe consequences of their punishment to his children, and in the succeeding reign the attainder was reversed, the proceedings obliterated, and his son restored to the earldom.*

A great lesson is written in the life of this truly extraordinary person. In the career of Strafford is to be sought the justification of the world's "appeal from tyranny to God." In him Despotism had at length obtained an instrument with mind to comprehend, and resolution to act upon her principles in their length and breadth, and enough of her purposes were effected by him to enable mankind to see "as from a tower the end of all." I cannot discern one false step in Strafford's public conduct, one glimpse of a recognition of an alien principle, one instance of a dereliction of the law of his being, which can come in to dispute the decisive result of the experiment, or explain away its failure. The least vivid fancy will have no difficulty in taking up the interrupted design, and by wholly enfeebling or materially imboldening the insignificant nature of Charles, and by according some half dozen years of immaturity to the "fretted tenement" of Strafford's "fiery soul," contemplate then, for itself, the perfect realization of the scheme of "making the prince the most absolute lord in Christendom." That done, let it pursue the same course with respect to Eliot's noble imaginings, or to young Vane's dreamy aspirings, and apply in like manner a fit machinery to the working out of the projects which made the dungeon of the one a holy place, and sustained the other in his self-imposed exile. The result is great and decisive! It establishes, in renewed force, those principles of political conduct which have endured, and must continue to endure, "like truth from age to age."

* The paper of minutes from which he had spoken this speech was afterward found lying on the scaffold, and was printed by Rushworth, vol. viii., p. 761. See Appendix to this Memoir.

* [The eulogy of his enemy Whitelocke deserves to be his epitaph: "Thus," he says, "fell this noble earl, who for natural parts and ability, and for improvement of knowledge by experience in the greatest affairs; for wisdom, faithfulness, and gallantry of mind, hath left few behind him that can be ranked as his equals."—C.]

APPENDIX

TO THE

LIFE OF THE EARL OF STRAFFORD.

MY HUMBLE OPINION CONCERNING A PARLIAMENT IN THIS YOUR MAJESTY'S KINGDOM OF IRELAND.

CHARLES R. 1. Albeit the calling of a Parliament in this kingdom is at no time of so much hazard, where nothing is propounded as a law before it first borrow motion from your majesty's immediate allowance under your great seal, as it is in England, where there is a liberty assumed to offer everything in their own time and order; and this subordination, wherunto they have been led by the wisdom of former times, is ever to be held as a sacred prerogative, not to be departed from, in no piece to be broken or infringed. Yet is the proposition always weighty—very necessary to be considered with great deliberation—whether the present conjuncture of affairs doth now advise a Parliament or no? And, after a serious discourse with myself, my reason persuades me for the assembling thereof.

2. For, the contribution from the country towards the army ending in December next, your majesty's revenue falls short twenty thousand pounds sterling by the year of the present charge it is burdened withal, besides the vast debt of fourscore thousand pounds Irish upon the crown, which yearly payments alone are impossible by any other ordinary way to be in time supplied but by the subject in Parliament; and to pass to the extraordinary before there be at least an attempt first to effect it with ease, were to love difficulties too well, rather voluntarily to seek them, than unwillingly to meet them, and might seem as well vanity in the first respect so to affect them, as faintness to bow under them when they are not to be avoided.

3. The next inclination thereunto ariseth in me from the condition of this country, grown very much more civil and rich since the access of your royal father of blessed memory, and your majesty to the crown; that all you have here is issued out again amongst them for their protection and safety, without any considerable reservation, for other the great affairs and expenses abroad; that this great charge is sustained, and this great debt contracted through employments for a public good, whereof the benefit hitherto hath been entirely theirs; that there hath been but one subsidy granted in all this time, nor any other supply but this contribution; in exchange whereof, your princely bounty returned them graces as beneficial to the subject as their money was to your majesty; so as their substance having been so increased under the guard of your wisdom and justice, so little issued hence from them, the crown so pressed only for their good, and so modest a calling upon them now for a supply, which in all wisdom, good nature, and conscience they are not to deny—should they not conform themselves to your gracious will, their unthankfulness to God and the best of kings becomes inexcusable before all the world, and the regal power more warrantably to be at after extended for redeeming and recovering your majesty's revenues thus lost, and justly to punish so great a forfeit as this must needs be judged to be in them.

4. Next, the frightful apprehension, which at this time makes their hearts beat, lest the quarterly payments towards the army, continued now almost ten years, might in fine turn to an hereditary charge upon their lands, inclines them to give any reasonable thing in present to secure themselves of that fear for the future; and therefore, according to the wholesome counsel of the physician, Dum dolet accipe.

5. And, lastly, if they should meanly east from them these mighty obligations, which indeed I cannot fear, your majesty's affairs can never suffer less by their starting aside, when the general peace abroad admits a more united power in your majesty, and less distracted thoughts in your ministers, to chastise such a forgetfulness, to call to their remembrance, and to enforce from them other and better duties than these.

Sect. 6, 7, 8, 9. We appoint the time of the meeting to be in Trinity term next, for the reasons you here allege.

I should advise might not be longer put off than Easter, or Trinity term at farthest; and I shall crave leave to offer my reasons.

7. The improvements mentioned in my despatch to the lord-treasurer, from which I no ways recede, would not be fore-slowed, wherein we lose much by deferring this meeting, a circumstance very considerable in these streights, wherein, if surprised, might be of much disadvantage, in case the Parliament answer not expectation; and to enter upon that work before would be an argument for them to scant their supply to your majesty.

8. Again, a breach of Parliament would prejudice less than in winter, having at the worst six months to turn our eyes about, and many helps to be gained in that space; where, in the other case, the contribution ending in December next, we should be put upon an instant of time, to read over our lesson at first sight.

9. Then the calling of a Parliament and determining of the quarterly payments falling out much upon one, might make them apprehend there was a necessity enforcing a present agreement, if not the good one we would, yet the best we could get, and so imbolden them to make and flatter themselves to gain their own conditions, and conditions are not to be admitted with any subjects, less with this people, where your majesty's absolute sovereignty goes much higher than it is taken, perhaps, to do in England.

Sect. 10. We will approve and require the making of two sessions, as you propose. The first to be held in summer for our own supplies, and the second in winter, for passing such laws and graces only as shall be allowed by us. But this intimation of two sessions we think not fit to be imparted to any till the Parliament be set. And farther, we will admit no capitulations nor demands of any assurance under our broad seal, nor of sending over deputies or committees to treat here with us, nor of any restraint in our bill of subsidies, nor of any condition of not maintaining the army; but in case any of these be insisted upon, and that they will not otherwise proceed or be satisfied with our royal promise for the second session, or shall deny or delay the passing of our bills, we require you thereupon to dissolve the Parliament, and forthwith to take order to continue the contributions for our army, and withhold to proceed to such improvements of our revenue as are already in proposition, or may hereafter be thought upon for the advantage of our crown.

Sect. 11. Concerning the short law to preserve the utmost benefit of the compositions upon concealments, and the plantations of Connaught and Ormond, we like it well, if you can obtain it, for confirmation of what you have done, or shall hereafter do about those businesses. But your promising of such a law, we doubt, may hinder the service, and cause them to be satisfied with nothing but a special statute.

Sect. 12, 13, 14, 15. For demands to be made for us, we

6. In the second place, the time your majesty shall in your wisdom appoint for this meeting imports very much; which, with all submission, which, with all submission, I should advise might not be longer put off than Easter, or Trinity term at farthest; and I shall crave leave to offer my reasons.

7. The improvements mentioned in my despatch to the lord-treasurer, from which I no ways recede, would not be fore-slowed, wherein we lose much by deferring this meeting, a circumstance very considerable in these streights, wherein, if surprised, might be of much disadvantage, in case the Parliament answer not expectation; and to enter upon that work before would be an argument for them to scant their supply to your majesty.

8. Again, a breach of Parliament would prejudice less than in winter, having at the worst six months to turn our eyes about, and many helps to be gained in that space; where, in the other case, the contribution ending in December next, we should be put upon an instant of time, to read over our lesson at first sight.

9. Then the calling of a Parliament and determining of the quarterly payments falling out much upon one, might make them apprehend there was a necessity enforcing a present agreement, if not the good one we would, yet the best we could get, and so imbolden them to make and flatter themselves to gain their own conditions, and conditions are not to be admitted with any subjects, less with this people, where your majesty's absolute sovereignty goes much higher than it is taken, perhaps, to do in England.

Sect. 10. We will approve and require the making of two sessions, as you propose. The first to be held in summer for our own supplies, and the second in winter, for passing such laws and graces only as shall be allowed by us. But this intimation of two sessions we think not fit to be imparted to any till the Parliament be set. And farther, we will admit no capitulations nor demands of any assurance under our broad seal, nor of sending over deputies or committees to treat here with us, nor of any restraint in our bill of subsidies, nor of any condition of not maintaining the army; but in case any of these be insisted upon, and that they will not otherwise proceed or be satisfied with our royal promise for the second session, or shall deny or delay the passing of our bills, we require you thereupon to dissolve the Parliament, and forthwith to take order to continue the contributions for our army, and withhold to proceed to such improvements of our revenue as are already in proposition, or may hereafter be thought upon for the advantage of our crown.

Sect. 11. Concerning the short law to preserve the utmost benefit of the compositions upon concealments, and the plantations of Connaught and Ormond, we like it well, if you can obtain it, for confirmation of what you have done, or shall hereafter do about those businesses. But your promising of such a law, we doubt, may hinder the service, and cause them to be satisfied with nothing but a special statute.

Sect. 12, 13, 14, 15. For demands to be made for us, we

6. In the second place, the time your majesty shall in your wisdom appoint for this meeting imports very much; which, with all submission, which, with all submission, I should advise might not be longer put off than Easter, or Trinity term at farthest; and I shall crave leave to offer my reasons.

7. The improvements mentioned in my despatch to the lord-treasurer, from which I no ways recede, would not be fore-slowed, wherein we lose much by deferring this meeting, a circumstance very considerable in these streights, wherein, if surprised, might be of much disadvantage, in case the Parliament answer not expectation; and to enter upon that work before would be an argument for them to scant their supply to your majesty.

8. Again, a breach of Parliament would prejudice less than in winter, having at the worst six months to turn our eyes about, and many helps to be gained in that space; where, in the other case, the contribution ending in December next, we should be put upon an instant of time, to read over our lesson at first sight.

9. Then the calling of a Parliament and determining of the quarterly payments falling out much upon one, might make them apprehend there was a necessity enforcing a present agreement, if not the good one we would, yet the best we could get, and so imbolden them to make and flatter themselves to gain their own conditions, and conditions are not to be admitted with any subjects, less with this people, where your majesty's absolute sovereignty goes much higher than it is taken, perhaps, to do in England.

Sect. 10. We will approve and require the making of two sessions, as you propose. The first to be held in summer for our own supplies, and the second in winter, for passing such laws and graces only as shall be allowed by us. But this intimation of two sessions we think not fit to be imparted to any till the Parliament be set. And farther, we will admit no capitulations nor demands of any assurance under our broad seal, nor of sending over deputies or committees to treat here with us, nor of any restraint in our bill of subsidies, nor of any condition of not maintaining the army; but in case any of these be insisted upon, and that they will not otherwise proceed or be satisfied with our royal promise for the second session, or shall deny or delay the passing of our bills, we require you thereupon to dissolve the Parliament, and forthwith to take order to continue the contributions for our army, and withhold to proceed to such improvements of our revenue as are already in proposition, or may hereafter be thought upon for the advantage of our crown.

Sect. 11. Concerning the short law to preserve the utmost benefit of the compositions upon concealments, and the plantations of Connaught and Ormond, we like it well, if you can obtain it, for confirmation of what you have done, or shall hereafter do about those businesses. But your promising of such a law, we doubt, may hinder the service, and cause them to be satisfied with nothing but a special statute.

Sect. 12, 13, 14, 15. For demands to be made for us, we allow your propositions in these sections, both in the matter and in the form; only the last clause, which giveth hope to maintain the army afterward without farther charge to them at all, we conceive may be drawn to a binding assumption; and besides, it is not necessary, the very proposition being sufficient to that effect.

ments of your army, and to strike off the debts of your crown; that, for the enacting of all such profitable and wholesome laws as a moderate and good people may expect from a wise and gracious king.

14. That, this being the order of nature, reason, and civility, your majesty expects it should be entirely observed, and yourself wholly intrusted by them; which they are not only to grant to be fit in the general case of king and subjects, but ought indeed to acknowledge it with thankfulness due to your majesty in particular, when they look back, and call to mind how, for their ease, you were content to take the sixscore thousand pounds (which their agents gave to be paid in three) in six years; and not barely so neither, but to double your graces towards them the while, which they have enjoyed accordingly, much to their advantage and greatly to the loss of the crown.

15. And that, considering the army hath been represented over to your majesty from this council, and in a manner from the body of this whole kingdom, to be of absolute necessity, to give comfort to the quiet minds in their honest labours, to contain the licentious spirits within the modest bounds of sobriety, it consists not with your majesty's wisdom to give unto the world, no, not the appearance of so much improvidence in your own counsels, of so much forgetfulness in a case of their safety, as to leave that pillar of your authority and their peace unset for continuance, at least one six months before the wearing forth of their contribution.

Sect. 16, 17, 18. We do not conceive that hereby you purpose easily to relinquish any of our demands, for all which you have laid so fair and solid grounds. And considering the payment of the army is absolutely necessary to be borne by the country, they cannot pretend by their three subsidies to make a fitting recognition of respect for our coming to the crown without that last addition to buy in rents and pensions.

farther charge to them at all; which law past, they should have as much leisure to enact for themselves at after as they could desire, either now or in winter. Nay, your majesty would be graciously pleased, with the assistance of your council, to advise seriously with them, that nothing might remain either unthought of or deny'd conducting to the public good of this kingdom; but if they made difficulty to proceed with your majesty in this manner, other counsels must be thought of, and little to be rely'd or expected for from them.

17. I am not to flatter your majesty so far as to raise any hope on that side that all this should be granted but by pressing both, and especially the continuance of the quarterly payments to the army, which they dread above any earthly thing. I conceive it probable that, to determine and lay asleep (as they think) the contribution, and in acknowledgment of your majesty's happy access to the crown, they may be drawn to a present gift of three subsidies, payable in three years, which alone would keep the army on foot during that time, and if my calculation hold, almost discharge the debt of the crown besides.

18. For thus I make my estimate: the contribution from the country is now but twenty thousand pounds sterling by the year, whereas I have good reason to trust each subsidy will raise thirty thousand pounds sterling, and so there will be ten thousand pounds for three years over and above the establishment; which thirty thousand pounds sterling, well and profitably issued, will, I trust, with honour to your majesty, and moderate satisfaction of the parties, strike off the whole fourscore thousand pounds Irish which in present presseth so sore upon this crown.

Sect. 19, 20, 21, 22. We like well the appointing of such a committee, and we refer the nomination to yourself. We have also given order to some of our council here, with demand, how induce and pursue the same, for the happy settlement of the regal rights and powers in this more subordinate kingdom.

13. My humble advice is, to declare, at the first opening of the meeting, that your majesty intends and promises two sessions; this former for yourself, that latter, in Michaelmas term next, for them; this to ascertain the payments of your army, and to strike off the debts of your crown; that, for the enacting of all such profitable and wholesome laws as a moderate and good people may expect from a wise and gracious king.

14. That, this being the order of nature, reason, and civility, your majesty expects it should be entirely observed, and yourself wholly intrusted by them; which they are not only to grant to be fit in the general case of king and subjects, but ought indeed to acknowledge it with thankfulness due to your majesty in particular, when they look back, and call to mind how, for their ease, you were content to take the sixscore thousand pounds (which their agents gave to be paid in three) in six years; and not barely so neither, but to double your graces towards them the while, which they have enjoyed accordingly, much to their advantage and greatly to the loss of the crown.

15. And that, considering the army hath been represented over to your majesty from this council, and in a manner from the body of this whole kingdom, to be of absolute necessity, to give comfort to the quiet minds in their honest labours, to contain the licentious spirits within the modest bounds of sobriety, it consists not with your majesty's wisdom to give unto the world, no, not the appearance of so much improvidence in your own counsels, of so much forgetfulness in a case of their safety, as to leave that pillar of your authority and their peace unset for continuance, at least one six months before the wearing forth of their contribution.

16. Therefore your majesty was well assured, in conformity to the rules of reason any of our demands, for all which you have laid so fair and solid grounds. And considering the payment of the army is absolutely necessary to be borne by the country, they cannot pretend by their three subsidies to make a fitting recognition of respect for our coming to the crown without that last addition to buy in rents and pensions.

17. I am not to flatter your majesty so far as to raise any hope on that side that all this should be granted but by pressing both, and especially the continuance of the quarterly payments to the army, which they dread above any earthly thing. I conceive it probable that, to determine and lay asleep (as they think) the contribution, and in acknowledgment of your majesty's happy access to the crown, they may be drawn to a present gift of three subsidies, payable in three years, which alone would keep the army on foot during that time, and if my calculation hold, almost discharge the debt of the crown besides.

18. For thus I make my estimate: the contribution from the country is now but twenty thousand pounds sterling by the year, whereas I have good reason to trust each subsidy will raise thirty thousand pounds sterling, and so there will be ten thousand pounds for three years over and above the establishment; which thirty thousand pounds sterling, well and profitably issued, will, I trust, with honour to your majesty, and moderate satisfaction of the parties, strike off the whole fourscore thousand pounds Irish which in present presseth so sore upon this crown.

Sect. 19, 20, 21, 22. We like well the appointing of such a committee, and we refer the nomination to yourself. We have also given order to some of our council here, with

19. And then, sir, after that in Michaelmas term all beneficial acts for the subject be thought of, as many, no fewer nor no more, enacted, than were fit in honour and wisdom to be granted; if, for a conclusion to this Parliament, we could gain from them other two subsidies, to buy in rents and pensions, to ten thousand pounds yearly value (a thing they are inclinable unto, as is mention'd in my despatch to the lord-treasurer). I judge there were a happy issue of this meeting; and that it should, through God's blessing, appear to the world in a few years you had, without charge, made a more absolute conquest of this nation by your wisdom than all your royal progenitors have been able to accomplish by their armies, and vast expense of treasure and blood.

20. These being the ends, in my poor opinion, which are to be desired and attained, the best means to dispose of and fit all concurring causes thereunto are not to be forgotten; and therefore, as preparatives, I make bold to offer these ensuing particulars:

21. It seems to be very convenient a committee be forthwith appointed of some few of us here, to take into consideration all the bills intended when there was a Parliament to have been called in the time of my Lord Falkland; such as shall be judged beneficial, to make them ready; such as may be of too much prejudice to the crown, to lay them aside; and to draw up others, which may chance to have been then omitted. This work may be by the committees either quickened or foreslowen, as the Parliament proceeds either warmer or cooler in your majesty's supplies.

22. Next, that your majesty's acts of grace, directed to my Lord Falkland the 24th of May, 1628, may be considered by such of your council in England as shall please your majesty to appoint, there being many matters therein contained which in a law would not fitly so well sort with the power requisite to be upheld in this kingdom, nor yet with your majesty's present profit; which hath persuaded me to except against such as I hold best to be silently passed over, and to transmit a paper thereof to my lord-treasurer.

Sect. 23. We approve the reformation of these pressures and extortions by examples and by commissions, by our own authority, but by no means to be done by Parliament.

23. It is to be feared the meaner sort of subjects here live under the pressures of the great men, and there is a general complaint that officers exact much larger fees than of right they ought to do. To help the former, if it be possible, I will find out two or three to make examples of; and to remedy the latter, grant out a commission for examining, regulating, and setting down tables of fees in all your courts, so as they shall find your majesty's goodness and justice watching and caring for their protection and ease both in private and public respects.

Sect. 24. We allow of this course. 24. I shall endeavour the lower House may be so composed as that neither the recusants, nor yet the Protestants, shall appear considerably more one than the other, holding them as much as may be upon an equal balance; for they will prove thus easier to govern than if either party were absolute. Then would I, in private discourse, show the recusant that, the contribution ending in December next, if your majesty's army were not supply'd some other way before, the twelve pence a Sunday must of necessity be exacted upon them; and show the Protestant that your majesty must not let go the twenty thousand pounds contribution, nor yet discount the other in matters of religion, till the army were some way else certainly provided for; and convince them both that the present quarterly payments are not so burdensome as they pretend them to be, and that by the graces they have had already more benefit than their money came to: thus pointing one by the other, which single might perchance prove more unhappy to deal with.

Sect. 25. To make captains and officers burgesses we altogether dislike, because it is fitter they attend their charges at that time. Make your choice rather by particular knowledge of men's interests and good affections to our service.

Sect. 26. In the higher House, for the Prelates, we have written our special letter to the Primate of Armagh, addressing him therein to be directed by himself.

26. In the higher House, your majesty will have, I trust, the bishops wholly for you. The titular lords, rather than come over themselves, will put their proxies into such safe hands as may be thought of on this side; and in the rest, your majesty hath such interest, what out of duty to the crown, and obnoxiousness in themselves, as I do not apprehend much any difficulty among them.

Sect. 27. For the Peers, 27. To these, or to any-dom to be granted; if, for a conclusion to this Parliament, we could gain from them other two subsidies, to buy in rents and pensions, to ten thousand pounds yearly value (a thing they are inclinable unto, as is mention'd in my despatch to the lord-treasurer). I judge there were a happy issue of this meeting; and that it should, through God's blessing, appear to the world in a few years you had, without charge, made a more absolute conquest of this nation by your wisdom than all your royal progenitors have been able to accomplish by their armies, and vast expense of treasure and blood.

20. These being the ends, in my poor opinion, which are to be desired and attained, the best means to dispose of and fit all concurring causes thereunto are not to be forgotten; and therefore, as preparatives, I make bold to offer these ensuing particulars:

21. It seems to be very convenient a committee be forthwith appointed of some few of us here, to take into consideration all the bills intended when there was a Parliament to have been called in the time of my Lord Falkland; such as shall be judged beneficial, to make them ready; such as may be of too much prejudice to the crown, to lay them aside; and to draw up others, which may chance to have been then omitted. This work may be by the committees either quickened or foreslowen, as the Parliament proceeds either warmer or cooler in your majesty's supplies.

22. Next, that your majesty's acts of grace, directed to my Lord Falkland the 24th of May, 1628, may be considered by such of your council in England as shall please your majesty to appoint, there being many matters therein contained which in a law would not fitly so well sort with the power requisite to be upheld in this kingdom, nor yet with your majesty's present profit; which hath persuaded me to except against such as I hold best to be silently passed over, and to transmit a paper thereof to my lord-treasurer.

Sect. 23. We approve the reformation of these pressures and extortions by examples and by commissions, by our own authority, but by no means to be done by Parliament.

23. It is to be feared the meaner sort of subjects here live under the pressures of the great men, and there is a general complaint that officers exact much larger fees than of right they ought to do. To help the former, if it be possible, I will find out two or three to make examples of; and to remedy the latter, grant out a commission for examining, regulating, and setting down tables of fees in all your courts, so as they shall find your majesty's goodness and justice watching and caring for their protection and ease both in private and public respects.

Sect. 24. We allow of this course. 24. I shall endeavour the lower House may be so composed as that neither the recusants, nor yet the Protestants, shall appear considerably more one than the other, holding them as much as may be upon an equal balance; for they will prove thus easier to govern than if either party were absolute. Then would I, in private discourse, show the recusant that, the contribution ending in December next, if your majesty's army were not supply'd some other way before, the twelve pence a Sunday must of necessity be exacted upon them; and show the Protestant that your majesty must not let go the twenty thousand pounds contribution, nor yet discount the other in matters of religion, till the army were some way else certainly provided for; and convince them both that the present quarterly payments are not so burdensome as they pretend them to be, and that by the graces they have had already more benefit than their money came to: thus pointing one by the other, which single might perchance prove more unhappy to deal with.

Sect. 25. To make captains and officers burgesses we altogether dislike, because it is fitter they attend their charges at that time. Make your choice rather by particular knowledge of men's interests and good affections to our service.

Sect. 26. In the higher House, for the Prelates, we have written our special letter to the Primate of Armagh, addressing him therein to be directed by himself.

26. In the higher House, your majesty will have, I trust, the bishops wholly for you. The titular lords, rather than come over themselves, will put their proxies into such safe hands as may be thought of on this side; and in the rest, your majesty hath such interest, what out of duty to the crown, and obnoxiousness in themselves, as I do not apprehend much any difficulty among them.

Sect. 27. For the Peers, 27. To these, or to any-that their proxies may be well disposed, we wou'd have you send with speed the names of those there in whom you repose special trust. And in case your list cannot be here in time, we will give order that all the proxies be sent to you with blanks to be assigned there. In general, for the better preventing of practices and disorders, you shall suffer no meetings during the setting of the houses, save only in public, and for the service of the houses by appointment, and for no other ends.

1634, April 12.

The answers contained in the apostiles are made by his majesty, and by his commandment set down in this manner.

JOHN COKE.

A COPY OF THE PAPER CONTAINING THE HEADS OF THE LORD STRAFFORD'S LAST SPEECH, WRITTEN BY HIS OWN HAND, AS IT WAS LEFT UPON THE SCAFFOLD.

- | | |
|--|---|
| <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. I come to pay the last debt we owe to sin. 2. Rise to righteousness. 3. Die willingly. 4. Forgive all. 5. Submit to what is voted justice, but my intentions innocent from subverting, &c. 6. Wishing nothing more than great prosperity to king and people. | <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 7. Acquit the king constrained. 8. Beseech to repent. 9. Strange way to write the beginning of reformation and settlement of a kingdom in blood on themselves. 10. Beseech that demand may rest there. 11. Call not blood on themselves. 12. Die in the faith of the Church. 13. Pray for it, and desire their prayers with me. |
|--|---|

John Syme

HARPER & BROTHERS.

JOHN PYM.—1584-1643.

JOHN PYM, the son of a Somersetshire "esquire," was born at Brymore, in his father's county, in the year 1584. His family, though described by Clarendon as of a "private quality and condition of life,"* were rich and of very old descent; his mother was afterward Lady Rous;† and this boy, the only issue of her first marriage,‡ was sent, in the beginning of the year 1599, to Broadgate's Hall, now Pembroke College, Oxford, where he entered as a gentleman commoner.§ Here he made himself remarkable, not only by quick natural talents, but by a sleepless and unwearied pursuit of every study he took in hand. Lord Clarendon has indulged a sneer at his "parts," as having been "rather acquired by industry than supplied by nature or adorned by art;"|| but we have it on the better authority of Anthony à Wood, that Pym's lighter accomplishments of literature, no less than his great learning and "pregnant parts," were admired in the University. "Charles Fitz-Geoffry, the poet, styled the said Pym, in 1601, Phæbi delicia—Lepos pueli."¶

It is stated in some of the histories that, on leaving Oxford, Pym entered one of the inns of court with a view to the bar; but it is difficult to find good authority for this. He was throughout life, however, remarkable for his thorough knowledge of the laws; and no doubt he studied them, at this time, with the almost certain expectation of being called upon, at no distant day, to serve in Parliament by the side of that great party who had already, by no unequivocal signs of their power and resolution, startled the misgoverned people into hope. He had certainly, even thus early, attracted the attention of the great Whig nobleman of the day, the Earl of Bedford; and to his influence, it is probable, he owed that appointment to a responsible office in the Exchequer, in which, according to Lord Clarendon, many after years of his youth were passed, and where, it is to be supposed, he acquired the knowledge and habits of business, and great financial skill, which, scarcely less than his genius for popular government, distinguished him through the long course of his public life.

In the Parliamentary returns of the year 1614, the name of "John Pym" is to be found as member for the borough of Calne.†† These were the returns of that "addle" Parliament which has been before described,* and which, "meeting according to their summons, such faces appeared there as made the court droop;"‡ among the new faces were those of Pym and Wentworth.

Upon the precipitate dissolution of this Parliament, after a sitting of two months, several of the more forward members were called before the council and committed to the Tower. If Rushworth is correct in saying that Pym was twice imprisoned in the reign of James, it may reasonably be supposed that he was one of those committed on the present occasion.‡ It is certain that he at once took an active share§ in the measures of the opposition, and the "maiden speech" of such an accession to the popular party is not unlikely to have been rewarded by a warrant from the council-table.

About this time Pym married Anna, the daughter of John Hooker, Esquire, a country gentleman of Somersetshire. For the next six years his name is not to be found in connexion with public affairs. These years were probably passed in retirement, where the mind does not find it difficult to imagine him, strengthening himself, in the calmness of domestic quiet, for the absolute devotion of his great faculties and deep affections to that old cause which was now again, not dimly, dawning upon the world.

In the year 1620 the wife of Pym died. The private memorials of this great man are too rare, and obtained with the cost of too much labour, to be thought unworthy of the reader's attention, however scanty they may be. What I shall now quote gives a grateful sketch of the character of this lady, on the authority of an excellent and accomplished man. The year in which she died witnessed also the death of Philippa, Lady Rous, Pym's mother; and on the occasion of the funeral of Lady Rous, a sermon was delivered by the famous Charles Fitz-Geoffry,|| which, on its subsequent publication, he dedicated to Pym.

* Life of Strafford, p. 61.

† Wilson—in Kennet, vol. ii., p. 696.

‡ In the Reliquie Wottonianæ (p. 443) some of the "refractory" members so committed are characteristically described: 1st, Sir Walter Chute, "who, to get the opinion of a bold man after he had lost that of a wise, fell one morning into an insipid and unseasonable declamation against the times;" 2d, John Hoskins, who "is in for more wit, and for licentiousness baptized freedom;" 3d, Wentworth, a lawyer, "whose fault was the application of certain texts in Ezekiel and Daniel to the matter of impositions;" and, 4th, Christopher Nevil, "a young gentleman fresh from the schools, who, having gathered together divers Latin sentences against kings, bound them up in a long speech." These are the only names specified, but it is known that upward of ten men were committed.

§ See the Journals.

|| For curious notices of this writer, see Wood's Ath. Oxon., vol. ii., p. 607; Mere's Wit's Commonwealth, part ii., and Censura Literaria. He was thought a "high-flying falcon" in poetry, on the strength of a really fine and loftily-written account, in Latin verse, of the life and actions of Sir Francis Drake. His minor compositions are touched with grace and feeling. I cannot resist concluding this note with the following quaint lines by Hayman, ingeniously descriptive of a personal defect of Fitz-Geoffry's:

"Blind poet Homer you do equalize,
Though he saw more with none than with most eyes:
Our Geoffry Chaucer, who wrote quaintly neat,
In verse you match, equal him in conceit:

* Clarendon's Hist., vol. iv. (Oxford ed. of 1826), p. 437.

† See the dedication to the sermon delivered at the funeral of this lady, among the pamphlets at the British Museum.

‡ The dedication in the sermon I have just referred to evidently restricts her issue by Mr. Pym to the great subject of this memoir.

§ "In the year of his age," says Anthony à Wood, "fifteen, being then, or soon after, put under the tuition of Degory Whear."

|| Clarendon's Hist., vol. iv. (Oxford ed. of 1826), p. 437.

¶ Wood's Ath. Oxon., ed. Bliss, vol. iii., p. 73.

 Anthony à Wood merely says, "Before he (Pym) took a degree, he left the University, and went, as I conceive, to one of the inns of court."

†† It has been incorrectly stated that Pym first sat as member for Tavistock; he did not sit for the latter borough till some years after. It was the same influence, however, which returned him for both places.

"I present you here," he writes in this dedication, "with that whereat you could not be present, your dearest mother's funeral—a labour I could willingly have spared, if God had been so pleased. But, seeing the great Disposer hath otherwise decreed, I gladly publish what I sorrowfully preached. Neither will I use that trivial apology for this publication—the importunity of friends. I confess mine ambition to divulge my observance of that house to which I owe my best endeavours. . . . What the religious cares of others received with some comfort, I here offer to your judicious eye; that as you are interested in the same sorrows, so you may be partaker of the same comforts. Poor, I confesse, are these of mine to those rich ones which the rare gifts of nature and grace afford to yourself; yet herein I would have you symbolize with the great ones of this world, who, although they possess whole cities and kingdoms, will yet accept an offer of a few acres."

"You may well take up," Fitz-Geoffry continues to Pym, "the complaint of the pathetic prophet—'I am the man that have seen affliction:' a great affliction, first, in being deprived of a most loving, holy, helpful wife; whose learning rare in that sex, whose virtues rarer in this age, whose religion the rarest ornament of all the rest, could not choose but level the sorrow of losing her with the former comfort of enjoying her. This crosse is now seconded with the losse of a dear mother, and such a mother as was worthy that sonne, who was worthy such a wife. With the prophet's complain't I doubt not but you also take up his comfort: 'It is good for a man that he beare the yoke in his youth.'"

"I have fairly gayned by this publication," the writer concludes, "if hereby you take notice of my thankfulness to yourself, the world of my serviceableness to my patron. If God shall conferre a farther blessing (as commonly he doth in all good attempts), that as some received comfort in hearing, so many may be edified by reading these my weake endeavours, this I shall esteeme my happinesse. In this hope, bequeathing the successe to him who is able to doe above all that we can doe or thinke, yourselfe to his chiefe blessing, my best affections to your worthy selfe, remaineth yours in all love and duty, CHARLES FITZ-GEOFFRY."*

Featured you are like Homer in one eye, Rightly surnamed the son of Geoffry."

* Death's Sermon unto the Living, delivered at the funeral of the religious Lady Philippa, 4to, 1630. From the sermon itself one or two points, touching on the personal characteristics of Pym's mother, will be thought worth extracting. "Expect not," says the preacher, "that I should speake of her ancestors, and make that the beginning of her prayse, which is rather the prayse of others." From the following it is evident that the first husband of Lady Philippa, the father of Pym, must have died very soon after Pym's birth. She is spoken of as "A comfortable helper to her loving husband (her second husband), and no small support of so great a house for more than thirtie years' continuance—and an especial ornament unto hospitalitie, the long-continued praise of that house." One of the concluding passages of the sermon is eloquently descriptive of this excellent woman: "She who not long since came cheerfully into this place on the Lord's day (as her godly manner was), hath caused us mournfully to repayreither on this day. She who used to come in her coach, is now carried in a coffin. She who used to heare attentively and look steadfastly on the preacher, is here now (so much of her as remaineth), but can neither see nor hear the preacher; but in silence preacheth to the preacher himself, and to every Pym was now left with five young children, two sons and three daughters;* and he did not marry again. "What he was from that moment," says a learned contemporary divine, Dr. Stephen Marshall, "was only for the public good: in and for this he lived—in and by this he died. It was his meat and drink; his work, his exercise, his recreation, his pleasure, his ambition—his ALL." Such enthusiastic expressions may justly describe his general course of life thenceforward, though the reader will be careful not to construe them too literally. Pym never was a candidate for the honours of asceticism: he required something besides an impeachment to dine upon, and was not content with supping off a religious committee: nor ever, it must be added, did the heavy distraction of public affairs bewilder him from that affectionate care towards his children, which is observed upon by many of those who were about him, and which was afterward richly recompensed. In this respect he was more fortunate than his friend Eliot. His second son, Charles, afterward sat with him,† a fellow-labourer, in the Long Parliament; and the name of his eldest son, John, appears in the returns of the Short Parliament,‡ and also in the list of those gallant Parliamentarians who were severely wounded at the battle of Newbury.

On the assembling of the Parliament of 1620–21, Pym again took his seat for Calne. A series of truly disgraceful events§ had filled hearer and beholder, that this is the end of all men. And by her own example (which is the life of preaching) she confirmeth the doctrine, that neither arms nor scutcheons, nor greatness of state, nor godliness of life, nor gifts of mind, nor sobriety of diet, nor art of physicke, nor husband's care, cost, nor diligence of attendants, nor children's tears, nor sighs of servants, nor prayers of the Church, can except us from that common condition; for if they could, we had not seen this great and sad assembly here this day."

Worthily, from the bosom of such a mother, can we imagine young Pym instructed to the great achievements of his after life! "The boy," says our great poet Wordsworth, "is father to the man;" so also, anticipating Wordsworth, Charles Fitz-Geoffry said in this very sermon. The passage is quaint and curious, but pregnant with meaning. Speaking from the text of death, he suddenly breaks forth thus: "For that is the end of all men. Man is, as it were, a book; his birth is the title-page; his baptism, the epistle dedicatory; his groans and crying, the epistle to the reader; his infancy and childhood, the argument or contents of the whole ensuing treatise; his life and actions, the subject; his crimes and errors, the faults escaped; his repentance, the connexion." Now there are some large volumes in folio, some little ones in sixteens; some are fayer bound, some playner; some in strong vellum, some in thin paper; some whose subject is piety and godliness, some (and too many such) pamphlets of wantonnesse and folly; but in the last page of every one there stands a word which is finis, and this is the last word in every book. Such is the life of man: some longer, some shorter, some stronger, some weaker, some fairer, some coarser, some holy, some profane; but death comes in, like finis at the last, to close up the whole; for that is the end of all men."

* See the Perfect Diurnall, No. 21, from 11th Dec. to the 18th of Dec., 1643.

† For the Devonshire borough of Bernalstone. See the returns.

‡ Which met in April, 1640. He sat for Pool, in Dorsetshire.

§ See Life of Strafford, p. 69, 63. Let an intelligent foreigner describe the state of the public mind during the progress of these events. "Consider, for pity's sake," runs one of Count Harley de Beaumont's reports, "what must be the state and condition of a prince, whom the preachers publicly from the pulpit assail; whom the comedians of the metropolis covertly bring upon the stage; whose wife attends these representations in order to enjoy the laugh against her husband; whom the Parliament braves and despises, and who is universally hated by the whole people." Let me complete the picture by referring the reader to authorities at p. 63, note 7, col. I up the interval since the last dissolution, but one of these events had been attended with a great result in attaching Sir Edward Coke to the popular party. Hampden also, in this year, first entered the House of Commons, and in the preparations for the session we observe the first formation of the system of Parliamentary party which has wrought such great results, for good and ill, in England. The men who were foremost in opposition to the court, whether in or out of the House of Commons, held constant meetings at the house of the great antiquary, Sir Robert Cotton, in Westminster. Here assembled, for a common purpose, the men of learning and of action—the intellectual and moral power of England. Here were the Pym and Seldens leagued; Camden, Coke, Noy, Stowe, Spelman, Philips, Mallory, Digges, Usher, Holland, Carew, Fleetwood, and Hakewell, acknowledged a common object here. The famous library of Sir Robert Cotton, now the priceless property of the nation, furnished to these meetings the precedents from which their memorable resolutions were taken; and from within its walls the statutes of the great days of England were, one by one, unrolled, and launched in succession upon the popular mind. May we not, with slight alteration, apply to it the matchless language of Milton! "Behold now that mansion-house of liberty, encompassed and surrounded with God's protection; behold that shop of war, with its anvils and hammers working, to fashion out the plates and instruments of armed justice in defence of beleaguered truth; behold the pens and heads there, sitting by studious lamps, musing, searching, revolving new notions and ideas, wherewith to present, as with their homage and their fealty, the approaching reformation!"

If the courtiers drooped, then, at the last Parliament, how much more reason had they to sink down at this!* It required all the energy and intellect of Lord Bacon—who had then, just on the eve of his terrible fall, attained to the highest summit of official rank, power, and fame—to reassure and strengthen them. Never, he told the king, would he have a better chance of success with a Parliament than now, if, taking advantage of the universal depression of the Protestant interest abroad, he humoured the anti-Catholic zeal of the popular party by asking money from them in support of a crusade to be undertaken in behalf of the interests of Protestantism.† James could only half understand his chancellor's purpose; and in the speech to the Commons on their day of meeting, having substituted his own jargon for Bacon's grave and cautious periods,* he managed to foil it completely. What he said to them was meant to be conciliatory, but it was a feeble mixture of threats and supplications.

The Commons listened coldly, and, on its conclusion, turned to the consideration of their privileges. They complained, in strong terms, of the imprisonment of the members at the close of the last Parliament for their conduct in that house, and broadly asserted that to the House itself belonged alone the right of judging and punishing every breach of decorum committed within its walls. The king in vain attempted to parry this remonstrance, and was at last obliged to defer to it by a solemn assurance that as he had already granted, so it was his intention thenceforward to maintain, that liberty of speech which was demanded by his faithful Commons. Upon receiving this message, they voted two subsidies, but without tenths or fifteenths; so small a sum, in fact, that it only left the king more completely at their feet. James hereupon, with his usual clever folly, returned them thanks in the most grateful terms.† Though the supply was small, he preferred it, he told them, to millions, because it was so freely given; lastly, he exhorted them, in the exuberance of his cunning, to apply to the redress of the national grievances, assuring them that they would always find him ready "to more than meet them half way."‡

Avoiding, with quiet indifference, the royal snare thus set for them, the leaders of the House at once proposed to restrict their literal acceptance of his majesty's speech to the latter half of it only. They sent him back resolutions from their committees of inquiry, levelled against certain notorious monopolists, who had long crippled the freedom of English trade,§

* This expression may startle those who are acquainted with the schoolmaster tone of Bacon in addressing Parliaments generally, yet a glance at his "reasons for assembling the Parliament," which is drawn up with very great eloquence, will show that it is not misplaced. He observes, at its conclusion, "that in respect of so long intermission of a Parliament, the times may have introduced some things fit to be reformed, either by new laws or by the moderate desires of our loving subjects dutifully intimated to us, wherein we shall ever be no less ready to give them all gracious satisfaction than their own hearts can desire." Bacon's subsequent arrogant speech to this very Parliament—the haughty spirit going before a fall!—is not for an instant to be weighed against this cautious and elaborate composition.

† See Roger Coke's Detection, part i., p. 111.

‡ See the Journals of the House of Commons, p. 523. Parl. Hist., vol. v., p. 328, &c.

§ Three patent monopolies had been the especial subject of discussion in the meetings of the opposition, as abuses of the highest degree of enormity: they were those for the licensing of inns, the licensing of hosteleries, and the manufacture of gold thread; in which two notorious projectors, Mompeyson and Michel, were pretty generally known to be only the agents of Buckingham and his family. By virtue of the first two, the patentees were enabled to exact for their licenses whatever sums they pleased; and on the refusal of innkeepers or publicans to comply with their arbitrary extortions, they fined or threw them into prison at their discretion. The knaveries and oppressions practised under the authority of the third patent were manifold. The monopolists manufactured thread so scandalously debased with copper that it was said to corrode the hands of the artificers and the flesh of those who wore it. This adulterated article they vended at an arbitrary and exorbitant price; and if they detected any persons in making or selling a better and cheaper article, they were empowered to fine and imprison such interlopers, without law; while a clause in their patent protected themselves from all actions to which they would otherwise have been liable in consequence of these attacks upon the liberty and property of their fellow-subjects, and of the right of search, even in private houses, which they assumed. (Aikin's James the First, vol. ii., p.

* The Count Harley de Beaumont, writing from England a month before this Parliament met, observes: "Audacious language, offensive pictures, calumnious pamphlets, these usual forerunners of civil war, are common here, and are symptoms doubly strong of the bitter temper of men's minds, because in this country men are in general better regulated, or by the good administration of justice are more kept within the sphere of their duties. Yet I doubt that any great action will come of it, inasmuch as the king will, in case of need, surely join the stronger party." This was correctly guessed; for most certainly, had James been in the place of Charles, the civil war would not have been. A little blustering, and he would have yielded.

† See Bacon's works, vol. v., p. 531, 532. Aikin's Life of James I., vol. ii., p. 194-198. Rushworth, vol. i., p. 20, 21. Parl. History, vol. v., p. 309-319. Lingard, vol. ix. (Svo ed.), p. 243-245.

and against some officers of the king's courts, by whom the administration of justice had been for some time openly polluted.* Of the committees from which these several charges emanated, Pym was an active and zealous promoter.†

The king, with every mean desire to wheedle money from the Commons,‡ was by this bold course startled into his old attitude of blustering arrogance; and at his elbow stood Buckingham, who, knowing too well that his brother, Sir Edward Villiers, would be struck down along with the other state criminals now plainly aimed at by the Commons, urged him at once to a dissolution; when, from a little distance, was heard the voice of the wily Williams, then creeping slowly but very surely up the state ladder, "Swim with the tide, and you cannot be drowned. If you assist to break up this Parliament, being now in pursuit of justice, only to save some cormorants who have devoured that which must be regorged, you will pluck up a sluice which will overwhelm yourself. Delay not one day before you give Sir Edward Villiers a commission for an embassy to some of the princes of Germany, or the Northlands, and despatch him over the sea before he be missed. Those empty fellows, Sir Giles Mompesson and Sir Francis Michel, let them be made victims to the public wrath, and cast all monopolies and patents of griping projectors into the Dead Sea after them. I have searched the signet office, and have collected almost forty, which I have hung in one bracelet, and are fit for revocation. Damn all these by one proclamation, that the world may see that the king, who is the pilot that sits at the helm, is ready to play the pump to eject such filth as grew noisome in the nostrils of his people."§ Ultimately this was accepted as a piece of wise counsel, and, observes Hackett, "out of this bud the dean's advancement very shortly spread out into a blown flower."

Sir Edward Villiers fled; Sir Giles Mompesson—the original of Massinger's Overreach—and his creature Sir Francis Michel were impeached and degraded; and many minor offenders were swept down in the same righteous storm of popular indignation, above which, moving and directing, Pym was seen pre-eminent. So especially active was he about those affairs at this time, that the king, as we learn from the authority of Anthony à Wood, singled him out from the rest of the members as a man of "a very ill-tempered spirit."*

The most melancholy duty of this famous Parliament remained to be performed, to the world's wonder and its lasting loss. On the 15th of March, Sir Robert Philips reported to the House, as chairman of one of its committees of inquiry, that they had received information respecting a case of bribery which "touched the honour of so great a man, so endowed with all parts both of nature and art, as that he would say no more of him, not being able to say enough."† We turn aside, with deep regret and self-humiliation, at the thought of the disgrace of Lord Bacon; but, careless of the influence of Pope's worthless and senseless distich,‡ it is only just that we should remember, in some reassurance of the goodness as well as greatness of the intellect, that Bacon's submission was wrung from him by the mean and paltry spite of Buckingham; § that he was not confronted with his accusers; never cross-examined any of the witnesses against him; never adduced any on his own behalf. It becomes us, therefore, using his own most affecting appeal, to give to that submission "a benign interpretation; for words that come from wasted spirits and an oppressed mind are more safe in being deposited in a noble construction than in being circled with any reserved caution. When the book of hearts shall be opened, I hope I shall not be found to have the troubled fountain of a corrupt heart, in a depraved habit of taking rewards to pervert justice, howsoever

* Ath. Oxon., vol. iii., p. 73. Wood adds, as some set-off to the king's opinion, that Pym was not without great esteem at the time, as a "person of good language, voluble tongue, and considerable knowledge in the common law."

† See the Commons' Journals, p. 530-563. Parl. Hist., vol. v., p. 350. Rushworth, vol. i., p. 28. State Trials, vol. ii., p. 1088. Clarendon and Carte have striven to represent the impeachment of Bacon as the result of private pique and resentment—in the one case, on the part of Coke; in the other, on that of Buckingham. Whatever may have been the truth in either case, the Commons, having had the charges submitted to them, had no resource but that which they adopted; and the deference and tenderness exhibited by them, during the whole of the proceedings, towards the illustrious accused, was truly remarkable. I should add that, though Coke did not appear prominently, his conduct in endeavouring to implicate Bacon in Mompesson's crimes favours the supposition of his having done his best to move the original committee of inquiry. See the Journals of March 9th, and Carte, iv., 74.

‡ "If parts allure thee, think how Bacon shined

§ "The wisest, greatest, meaneest of mankind!" One of these superlatives must be questioned—let the common sense of the reader determine which.

¶ It will probably be in the reader's recollection that a servant of Bacon's subsequently said very distinctly, that his lord was absolutely prohibited by the king from making his defence. This may be questioned; but can it be questioned that, had Bacon not been restrained either by a positive command of James, or, at least, by a knowledge of what must be the royal wish, he might have palliated his offence in a very great degree? Many of the alleged bribes were, in reality, the customary compliments to chancellors; and of the worst of his delinquencies Buckingham was the sole instigator—the great cause and origin, as any one who reads the now published correspondence of Bacon and Buckingham will see to be established beyond a doubt. To this, indeed, Lord Bacon alludes, in this memorial of access to the king in 1622. "Of my offences, far be it from me to say, Dut veniam corvis, vezat censura columbas, but I will say that I have good warrant, for 'they were not the greatest offenders in Israel on whom the wall of Shilo fell.'"

207. Lingard, vol. ix., p. 247, 248.) "Others," says Hackett, "remonstrated against a pack of cheaters, who procured the monopoly of gold thread, which, with their spinning, was palpably corrupted and embased. These gilt flies were the bolder, because Sir Edward Villiers was in their indenture of association, though not named in their patent."—Scrinia Reserata, p. 49.

* Among these were Field, bishop of Llandaff; Sir John Bennet, judge of the prerogative court; and Sir Henry Yelverton, the king's attorney-general.—See Bacon, vi., 383.

† In the unjustifiable proceedings against Floyd, into which the House were shortly after betrayed, I cannot discover that Pym took any active share. No doubt, however, in the melancholy religious excitement that prevailed at the time, and which was the natural result of the then invariable appearance of popery, both at home and abroad, in affinity and alliance with despotism, Pym did not resist the general feeling. I shall have many opportunities for showing, however, that he was not an intolerant man. For the circumstances of Floyd's case, see the State Trials, vol. ii., p. 1159. Carte, vol. iv., p. 78-80.

‡ In one of the despatches of Tilliers, then French ambassador in London, I find a shrewd reason given for the anxiety of the court to secure, by any expedient, a supply of money from Parliament. By that, the Frenchman argues, the opposition will be "kept in check;" for, he continues, "however ill inclined they appear, these grants of money, which give a claim on their property, compel them to proceed with more gentleness and reverence."

§ See Hackett's Scrinia Reserata, p. 49, 50.

¶ Williams was at this time Dean of Westminster.

I may be frail, and partake of the abuses of the times." It was with this feeling the manly and earnest mind of Jonson contemplated Bacon's fall; for he had celebrated his prosperity, and would not shrink from him in his years of adversity and sorrow. "My conceit of his person was never increased towards him by his place or honours; but I have and do reverence him for the greatness that was only proper to himself, in that he seemed to me ever, by his words, one of the greatest men, and most worthy of admiration, that had been in many ages. In his adversity, I ever prayed that God would give him strength, for greatness he could not want. Neither could I condole in a word or syllable for him, as knowing no accident could do harm to virtue, but rather help to make it manifest."

Strengthened by the great good they had already achieved, Pym and the other leaders of the country party in this famous Parliament now addressed themselves to subjects which, while they deeply interested the religious feelings of the people, involved, as they well knew, some of the most dearly-cherished prejudices of the king. A war for the recovery of the Protestant cause in the Palatinate; some repeal of the indulgence granted to Catholics in the non-execution of the penal laws; destruction of those treaties that had been concluded with the King of Spain and the Emperor, to the heavy discouragement, as it was generally felt, of Protestantism; and, finally, arrest of the negotiations now carrying on for the marriage of the Prince of Wales with the Spanish Infanta: these questions day by day gathered formidable influence in the House, and at last, in the utter absence of any signs of immediate supply, effectually alarmed James. He lost temper and patience, and, suddenly dropping the mask he had worn so ill, sent an intimation to the House of Commons that he expected them to adjourn over the summer. This was received with extreme dissatisfaction; much angry parleying followed; but after some days' delay both houses were adjourned by royal commission. The Commons, however, before separating, voted a solemn declaration of their resolve to spend their lives and fortunes in defence of the Protestant cause* (the reader will keep in view what has been already urged† respecting the inseparable connexion of this cause in that day with civil freedom); and this declaration was "sounded forth," says a person who was present, "with the voices of them all, withal lifting up their hats in their hands so high as they could hold them, as a visible testimony of their unanimous consent, in such sort that the like had scarce ever been seen in Parliament."

A recess of five months followed, in the course of which the whole Church was thrown into confusion, and the king's theology suffered a great eclipse. The cause is worth adverting to, in illustration of the personal positions of the dignitaries of the Church; for it was against this class of men, according to Lord Clarendon, that Pym first showed himself "concerned and passionate."‡

The good, easy Archbishop Abbot happened to have joined the Lord Zouch on a hunting-party at Bramzhill Park, in Hampshire. Here his grace, having singled out a buck one morning, "and warned the company to be on their guard," took his aim, and, as the accounts say, "through mistake or want of skill," shot the keeper of the park, who was passing over the ground on horseback. A verdict of unintentional homicide was returned; but the opportunity was too happy to be lost, wherefore a pack of his grace's reverend opponents set in full cry after him, urging that by the canon law he had become incapable of holding any ecclesiastical preferment, or exercising any ecclesiastical function. His leading opponents were no less than four bishops elect, all of whom, under the circumstances, refused to receive consecration at his hands, and took their stand, very pathetically, upon impassable scruples of conscience, to which it would, of course, be a gross insult to suggest that, with two at least of these four reverend men, the hope of succeeding to the dignity of the disabled archbishop must have been strongly present. It was, in fact, notorious, that Williams and Laud* entertained this hope. The sober and religious people of England were, meanwhile, attentively listening, and from the high places in Church and State nothing was to be heard but an agitation of the momentous question of whether the amusements of hunting and shooting were allowable in a bishop. James suffered all the throes of the strongest theological conceptions, but brought nothing forth. In despair of his own delivery, he at last appointed a commission of prelates and canonists: they could not agree; but, by way of a compromise, the majority proposed that Abbot should be absolved from all irregularity ad majorem cautelam. An agonizing question followed: Where was the ecclesiastical superior to absolve the metropolitan? A brilliant thought at last relieved the unprecedented difficulty. It was suggested that the king, as head of the Church, possessed exactly that plenitude of power which in Roman Catholic countries resided in the pope. Whereupon James issued his triumphant commands to the eight consecrated bishops, and Abbot was pardoned forthwith, upon the issue of a solemn declaration from the conclave that "the hunting aforesaid was decent, modest, and peaceable."†

* Laud had a quarrel of twenty years' standing with Abbot, who had, on several occasions, at Oxford, opposed and censured him on account of the Roman Catholic tendencies of doctrines maintained by him in his academical exercises.

† This will probably be pronounced to have been, upon the whole, a wise as well as important decision, and is certainly not without even present application to affairs of this sort. There is a kind of hunting nowadays indulged occasionally by clergymen and archdeacons which is anything but decent and peaceable. Buck-shooting, even at the occasional risk of an accidental loss of life, as in his grace of Canterbury's case, is in reality nothing to it. It may be very much the fashion, therefore, when we see a minister of the Gospel partridge-shooting or fox-hunting, to pull forth our Bibles, and make a parade of our acquaintance with Paul and Timothy; but the propriety of the practice is really more than doubtful, since the consequences may be such as to put society under serious disobligation to the rash hinderer of clerical pastimes. A pheasant is more allowable game than a peasant. When Domitian left off fly-killing, he took to killing Roman citizens; and our times have witnessed less innocent amusements, on the part of the clergy, than the sports of the field. As for the silence of Holy Writ about detonators, it is not more silent about detonators than about lawn sleeves and mitres; and, ba-

* Parl. Hist., vol. v., p. 472, 473.

† See Life of Eliot, p. 6.

‡ Hist. of Rebel., vol. iv., p. 437.

The Parliament assembled in November, and in some anger at the imprisonment of one of their members, Sir Edwin Sandys,* during the recess. Some few days after their meeting, Pym seconded Sir Edward Coke in moving, as one of their first resolutions, that they should remonstrate with the king on the causes of the public discontent then prevailing, and point out the remedies. A petition was accordingly prepared, suggesting, among other things, Prince Charles's marriage with a Protestant; and that the king should direct his efforts against that power (Spain) which first maintained the war against the Protestant cause in the Palatinate.† This petition was opposed by the court party as utterly without precedent; the chancellor of the duchy said that "it was of so high and transcendent a nature, he had never known the like within those walls." Privately, meanwhile, a copy of it had been sent to the king, on whom it took sudden and desperate effect. Calvert and Weston, according to Wilson, "had aggravated the matter to him, with all the acrimony they could, so far as to reflect upon particular persons that were the most active instruments in it."‡ Foremost among the persons so named were Pym, Coke, and Philips. Accordingly, from Newmarket, whither he had gone at the sides, if it says nothing for them, it certainly says nothing against. "If you must drink," says the ordinary of Newgate to Mr. Jonathan Wild, "if you must drink, let us have a bowl of punch; a liquor I the rather prefer, as it is nowhere spoken against in Scripture." The same reason holds for an archbishop's or archdeacon's dog and gun, with precisely the same force.

* Sandys had been placed under arrest with Selden, not then a member of the House; also Lords Oxford and Southampton, Sutcliffe, dean of Exeter, the Bishop of Bangor, Sir Christopher Neville, Sir G. Leeds, and Brise, a Puritan minister; after examination before the council, and a short confinement, they were restored to liberty. See Camden's Annals of James, 1621. Kennet's History, vol. ii., p. 657. Their offences are not assigned, but it would seem they had indulged in talking "arcana imperii" against a royal proclamation. Secretary Calvert was commissioned by the king to declare that Sandys, the only member committed, had not been committed for any Parliamentary matter, and Sir Thomas Wentworth even disavowed the resenting it as a breach of privilege. But it is difficult to doubt the cause of Sandys' commitment. See Debates and Journals.

† See Rushworth, vol. i., p. 40. This remonstrance, it has been truly said, was fitted to discredit all the projects of James: it penetrated without reserve into the deepest recesses of those arcana imperii which he held so dear and so sacred; it proclaimed the futility of those negotiations in which he had exposed himself to become the dupe of Spain and the laughing-stock of Europe; it warned him that his arbitrary suspension of laws would be no longer borne with; it taught him that the darling project of alliance which had prompted all these sacrifices of dignity and principle was contemplated with abhorrence; and, above all, that the purses of the English people would never be opened to him but in the cause of Protestantism and the liberties of Germany against the great Catholic league, the emperor, and especially the King of Spain. The following passage closed the petition: "This is the sum and effect of our humble declaration, which we (noways intending to press upon your majesty's undoubted and regal prerogative) do with the fulness of our duty and allegiance humbly submit to your most princely consideration: the glory of God, whose cause it is; the zeal of our true religion, to which we have been born, and wherein, by God's grace, we are resolved to die; the safety of your majesty's person, who is the very life of your people; the happiness of your children and posterity, the honour and good of the Church and State, dearer unto us than our own lives—having kindled these affections, truly devoted to your majesty." The words in italics were not in the petition as first proposed to the House, but were inserted in the course of the debate on it to meet some scruples of the time. See Journals, Parl. Hist., vol. v., p. 489, and Aikin's James, vol. iii., p. 275-7.

‡ See Wilson, in Kennet's History, vol. ii., p. 740.

time, "to be farther from the sound of that noise of the discontent of the Commons," James instantly despatched a letter to the speaker complaining of the influence possessed by some certain* "fiery, popular, and turbulent spirits" in the lower House, forbidding them to inquire into the mysteries of state, or to concern themselves about the marriage of his son, or to touch the character of any prince, his friend or ally, or to intermeddle with causes which were submitted to the decision of the courts of law, or even to send to him their petition, if they wished him to hear or answer it; and, finally, to recollect that he (King James) thought himself "very free and able to punish any man's misdemeanours in Parliament as well during their sitting as after, which we mean not to spare hereafter, upon any occasion of any man's insolent behaviour there that shall be ministered unto us; and if they have already touched any of these points which we have forbidden in any petition of theirs which is to be sent unto us, it is our pleasure that you shall tell them that, except they reform it before it come to our hands, we will not deign the hearing nor answering of it."†

From the date of this letter—the 3d of December, 1621—may be dated the commencement of the kind of open warfare of antagonist principles which ended in the destruction of the Stuart race. The historian Hume confesses that it was "rash and indiscreet" in the king thus to risk the "tearing off that sacred veil which had hitherto covered the English Constitution, and which threw an obscurity upon it so advantageous to royal prerogative: every man began to indulge himself in political reasonings and inquiries; and the same factions which commenced in Parliament, were propagated through the nation."‡ Would the philosopher have thought James rash and indiscreet if his letter had proved successful? The truth was, that, backed by all the power of the executive, and with all the prisons of the Tower at his command, James's venture was perfectly in accordance with Hume's principles. He had, however, miscalculated the characters of the men opposed to him, the great majority of whom were already, for life or death, devoted to the achievement of a popular and responsible government in England.

In the spirit of men so leagued their reply to this letter was framed. The greatest respect tempered the most resolute firmness. Some abstract of this document will find a fitting place here, since Pym was one of the most active members of the committee appointed to draw it up, and it is, besides, of the last importance that the reader should distinctly understand the exact ground that was occupied by the opposing parties in this, the first open

* The following, which stands upon the journals immediately after the king's letter, is an evidence of Pym's quick resolution and high courage: "Mr. Pym saith that the words of 'fiery, popular, and turbulent' are laid by his majesty on the whole House; for since we have not punished or questioned any such, but (as the letter saith) been led by their propositions, it is the act of the whole House. He desireth a petition may be from us to the king, to know who his majesty hath been informed those fiery, turbulent spirits are, that we may justify ourselves, and clear the House of the taint of those words."

† Parl. Hist., vol. v., p. 492. Roger Coke's Declaration, vol. i., p. 119, ed. 1694.

‡ Hist., vol. v., p. 82, quarto ed.

§ See Journals.

contest between the English Parliament and the English king.

They began by professing their sorrow at the displeasure shown by his majesty's letter to the speaker, while they took comfort to themselves in the assurance of his grace and goodness, and of their own faithfulness and loyalty. They entreated that their good intentions might "not undeservedly suffer by the misinformation of partial and uncertain reports, which are ever unfaithful intelligencers," but that his majesty would vouchsafe to understand from themselves, and not from others, what their humble petition and declaration, resolved upon by the universal voice of the House, did contain. They beseeched, also, that his majesty would not henceforth give credit to private reports against all or any of the members of that House, on whom they themselves should not have inflicted a censure, but that they might ever "stand upright" in his royal judgment. Adverting, then, to the cause of their assembling in Parliament, and to the particulars of information laid before them by his majesty's command, they inferred that they "were called to a war," and certainly with the King of Spain, who had five armies on foot, and who was known to have occupied the lower Palatinate; and hence they took credit for the unprecedented celerity and alacrity with which their zeal for his majesty and his posterity had prompted them to proceed in voting the necessary supplies, and considering of the mode of conducting hostilities. To this they added, that although they could not conceive that the honour and safety of his majesty and his posterity; the patrimony of his children, invaded and possessed by their enemies; the welfare of religion and the state of the kingdom, were matters at any time unfit for their deepest consideration in time of Parliament, yet that, at this time, they were clearly invited to it; and that the mention of Popish recusants, and whatever said touching the honour of the King of Spain—in which, however, they contended that they had observed due bounds—had necessarily arisen out of the subject. Next they disclaimed all intention of invading his majesty's undoubted prerogative in disposing of his son in marriage, but maintained that, as the representatives of the whole commons of England, who have a large interest in the prosperity of the king and royal family, and of the State and Commonwealth, it became them to offer their opinion respecting this matter. On these considerations, they hoped that his majesty would now be pleased to receive their petition and declaration at the hands of their messengers, to read and favourably to interpret it, and to give answer to as much of it as relates to Popish priests and recusants, to the passing of bills, and to pardons. The declaration ended thus: "And whereas your majesty doth seem to abridge us of the ancient liberty of Parliament for freedom of speech, jurisdiction, and just liberty of the House, and other proceedings there (wherein we trust in God we shall never transgress the bounds of loyal and dutiful subjects); a liberty which we assure ourselves so wise and so just a king will not infringe, the same being our ancient and undoubted right, and an inheri-ance received from our ancestors; without which we cannot freely debate, nor clearly discern of things in question before us, nor truly inform your majesty; in which we have been confirmed by your majesty's most gracious former speeches and messages: we are, therefore, now again enforced, in all humbleness, to pray your majesty to allow the same, and thereby to take away the doubts and scruples your majesty's late letter to our speaker hath wrought upon us."

This declaration, with the original petition, was carried to the king at Newmarket by Pym and eleven other members deputed by the House. "Chairs!" cried the king, as they entered the presence chamber; "chairs! here be twal kynes comin'!" In the interview which followed he refused to receive the original petition; and, as Roger Coke expresses it, after reading the second declaration, "furled all his sails, and resolved to ride out this storm of the Commons." In other words, he set to work, and ended, with his own hand, an enormously long rejoinder, which may be thus translated and abridged from the rich Scotch dialect of the original.

He began by applying to the case some words of Queen Elizabeth, addressed to an insolent ambassador: "We looked for an ambassador—we have received a herald." So, he asserted, he had looked for thanksgiving from the Commons for all the "points of grace" he had conceded to them. "But not only," he continues, "have we heard no news of all this, but contrary, great complaints of the danger of religion within this kingdom, tacitly implying our ill-government in this point. And we leave you to judge whether it be your duties, that are the representative body of our people, so to distaste them with our government; whereas, by the contrary, it is your duty; with all your endeavours, to kindle more and more a dutiful and thankful love in the people's hearts towards us, for our just and gracious government." In respect to their taxing him with trusting uncertain reports and partial informations, he proceeded thus: "We wish you to remember that we are an old and experienced king, needing no such lessons, being in our conscience freest of any king alive from hearing or trusting idle reports;" and as to their petition in particular, he went on to say, that he had made their own messengers compare the copy of it which they brought with that which he had received before, which corresponded exactly, excepting a concluding sentence added by them afterward. Having thus satisfied himself with a reason which did not even glance at the gross breach of privilege complained of, he next told them, that if, in ignorance of the contents of their petition, he had received it, to his own great dishonour, he could have returned nothing to their messengers but that he judged it unlawful and unworthy of an answer. "For," he observes, "as to your conclusion thereof, it is nothing but protestatio contraria facto; for in the body of your petition you usurp upon our prerogative royal, and meddle with things far above your reach, and then, in the conclusion, you protest the contrary; as if a robber would take a man's purse, and then protest he meant not to rob him." He denied that the communications made by him to the House could in any manner authorize their proceedings. He had, indeed, made known that he was resolved by war to regain the Palatinate, if otherwise he could not; and had invited them to advise upon a supply for keeping the forces there from disbanding, and raising an army in the spring. "Now what inference," he continues, "can be made upon this, that therefore we must presently denounce war against the King of Spain, break our dearest son's match, and match him to one of our religion, let the world judge. The difference is no greater than if we would tell a merchant that we had great need to borrow money from him for raising an army; that thereupon it would follow that we were bound to follow his advice in the direction of the war, and all things depending thereupon. But yet, not contenting yourselves with this excuse of yours, which indeed cannot hold water, you come after to a direct contradiction, saying that the honour and safety of us and our posterity, the patrimony of our children, invaded and possessed by their enemies, and the welfare of religion and state of our kingdom, are matters at any time not unfit for your deepest considerations in Parliament. To this generality we answer, with the logicians, that where all things are contained nothing is omitted. So this plenipotency of yours invests you with all power upon earth, lacking nothing but the Pope's, to have the keys, also, both of heaven and purgatory. And to this vast generality of yours we can give no other answer, for it will trouble all the best lawyers in the House to make a good commentary upon it. For so did the Puritan ministers in Scotland bring all kind of causes within the compass of their jurisdiction, saying that it was the Church's office to judge of slander, and there could be no kind of crime or fault committed but there was a slander in it, either against God, the king, or their neighbour: or like Bellarmine's distinction of the Pope's power over kings, in ordine ad spiritualia, whereby he gives them all temporal jurisdiction over them." With respect to the war, he then professed in general terms that he would suffer no consideration, not even the marriage of his son, to interfere with the restitution of the Palatinate; and boasted that by his intervention with the King of Spain and the archduchess in Flanders, he had already preserved it from farther conquest for a whole year. "But," he added, "because we conceive that ye couple this war of the Palatinate with the cause of religion, we must a little unfold your eyes therein." And he proceeded, in defiance of all historic truth, to lay the whole blame of the war of Bohemia, and the consequent oppression of the Protestants in Germany, on the ambition of his son-in-law, and his unjust usurpation of the crown of another. He severely reprimanded the Parliament, next, for the terms in which the King of Spain and his inordinate ambition were spoken of in their petition, not to allude to "the particular ejaculations of some foul-mouthed orators in your house against the honour of that king's crown and state." Respecting the prince's marriage, he professed himself indignant that the House should not place so much confidence in his religion and wisdom as to rely on his former declaration, that religion should receive no injury by it; and then informed them that he was already too much advanced in the treaty to retract with honour. After much more obnoxious language respecting what he treats as their unpardonable presumption, quoting the proverb, Ne sutor ultra crepidam, he condescends—ungraciously enough, but yet out of a sort of ungainly desire of seeming to conciliate—to explain away, in some degree, his general prohibition of their meddling with matters of government and mysteries of state, accusing them, at the same time, of misplacing and misjudging his sentences, as "a scholar would be ashamed so to misplace and misjudge any sentences in another man's book." With the following very startling passage he at last concludes: "And although we cannot allow of the style, calling it your ancient and undoubted right and inheritance, but could rather have wished that ye had said that your privileges were derived from the grace and permission of our ancestors and us (for most of them grow from precedents, which shows rather a toleration than inheritance), yet we are pleased to give you our royal assurance that, as long as you contain yourselves within the limits of your duty, we will be as careful to maintain and preserve your lawful liberties and privileges as ever any of our predecessors were—nay, as to preserve our own royal prerogative; so as your house shall only have need to beware to trench upon the prerogative of the crown, which would enforce us, or any just king, to retrench them of their privileges that would pare his prerogative and flowers of the crown. But of this we hope there never shall be cause given."

* Rushworth, vol. i., p. 46. Parl. Hist., vol. v., p. 495.
Aikin's James the First, vol. ii., p. 232, 234.
† Roger Coke, vol. i., p. 121.

This letter had not been long despatched, when symptoms of alarm broke out at the court. Williams recommended the qualification of its terms "with some mild and noble exposition;"† and the king prepared to adopt this suggestion, after he was told that the Commons, on receiving his letter, had on the instant appointed a committee to prepare a protest. Secretary Calvert accordingly went down to the House with an explanatory message from the king, wherein, while he reiterated his assurances respecting their privileges, and tacitly withdrew the menace that rendered them precarious, he said that he could not with patience endure his subjects to use such anti-monarchical words to him concerning their liberties as "ancient and undoubted right and inheritance," without subjoining that they were granted by the grace and favour of his predecessors. The house heard this coldly. Calvert and the other ministers, seeing the coming storm, made a still more desperate effort to avert it by admitting the king's closing expressions in the original letter to be incapable of defence, and calling them a slip of the pen at the close of a long answer.‡ This availed as little as the former. The last and worst expedient was then resorted to, and the clerk of the House received notice of instant adjournment till the ensuing February.

* Parl. Hist., vol. v., p. 497, 507.

† See his curious letter in the Cabala, p. 65. Miss Aikin is in error in supposing that this was written before the despatch of the king's letter.

‡ See Hallam's Const. Hist., vol. ii., p. 500.

In this extremity the leaders of this great Parliament acquitted themselves with memorable courage. Nothing, they said, should separate them till they had placed on record a protest against the monstrous pretensions of James. The time that remained to them was indeed short, but they proved it long enough for the accomplishment of an act which exerted a sensible influence on the contest between the people and the king up to its very close. All that was done in the most celebrated Parliaments of Charles followed, as a natural consequence, from what was done now.

Instantly upon the receipt of this notice of adjournment, a message was sent to the committee to whom the king's letter had been referred; some time passed in debate meanwhile, and it was not, as it would seem by the king's subsequent proclamation,* until "six o'clock at night, by candle-light," a thing unprecedented in those days, "that the said committee brought into the House a protestation (to whom made appears not) concerning their liberties." This assertion of ignorance on the king's part, as to whom the protestation was made, emphatically points out the nobler quarter to which it addressed itself—the great mass of the English people. To them it was made, and, sinking into their hearts, met with a fruitful and congenial soil. After a long and earnest debate, advancing to a very late hour, the protestation was entered "as of record" upon the journals in the following ever-memorable words:

"The Commons now assembled in Parliament, being justly occasioned thereunto, concerning sundry liberties, franchises, and privileges of Parliament, do make this protestation following: That the liberties, franchises, privileges, and jurisdictions of Parliament are the ancient and undoubted birthright and inheritance of the people of England: and that the arduous and urgent affairs concerning the king, state, and defence of the realm, and of the Church of England, and the maintenance and making of laws, and redress of mischiefs and grievances which daily happen within this realm, are proper subjects and matter of council and debate in Parliament: and that in the handling and proceeding of those businesses, every member of the House of Parliament hath, and of right ought to have, freedom of speech to propound, treat, reason, and bring to conclusion the same: and that the Commons in Parliament have like liberty and freedom to treat of these matters in such order as in their judgments shall seem fittest: and that every member of the said House hath like freedom from all impeachment, imprisonment, and molestation (other than by censure of the House itself) for or concerning any speaking, or reasoning, or declaring of any matter or matters touching the Parliament, or Parliament business: and that if any of the said members be complained of and questioned for anything done or said in Parliament, the same is to be showed to the king by the advice and assent of all the Commons assembled in Parliament, before the king give credence to any private information."

No time was lost by the courtiers, it may be supposed, in communicating intelligence of this act to the king, who instantly, frantic with spite and outraged imbecility, hurried up to London from Newmarket; hastily assembled around him at Whitehall the privy council and six of the judges who happened to be in town, sent for the clerk of the House of Commons, and commanding him to produce his journal-book, tore out the protestation with his own hand, and ordered the deed to be registered by an act of council. His next exploit was to dissolve the Parliament.† This he did by proclamation, assigning as the necessity which had driven him to it, the "inordinate liberty" assumed by some "particular members of the House"—"evil-tempered spirits" who sowed tares among the corn.‡ Finally, he summoned these "evil-tempered spirits" before the council-table in the persons of Coke, Philips, Pym, and Mallory, and, having in vain endeavoured to exact submission from them, committed them to separate prisons.

I have found, and will here quote, a curious letter in illustration of the nature of these imprisonments, which have been sometimes spoken of by writers of the court party as though they spoke of matters comparatively trifling—a sort of temporary detention or honourable arrest. What follows will show the full extent of the dangers to which men of high birth and fortune were now content to expose themselves, in the hope, by such means, of still more quickening the sympathies and strengthening the purposes of the mass of the common people. It describes the capture and imprisonment of Sir Robert Philips, Pym's intimate friend on the occasion now in question; and describes, also, there can be little doubt, the course adopted, at the same time and for the same reason, towards Pym himself. It is in the shape of a petition from Francis Philips to King James, praying for the release of his brother, Sir Robert.

"It is not for myself," he writes, "I thus implore your majesty's grace, but for one that is far more worthy, and in whom all that I am consists—my dear brother; who, I know not by what misfortune, hath fallen, or rather been pushed, into your majesty's displeasure; not in dark and crooked ways, as corrupt and ill-affected subjects use to walk, and neer to break their necks in, but even in the great road, which both himself and all good Englishmen that know not the paths of the court, would have sworn would have led most safely and

* Rushworth, vol. i., p. 53.

† A ludicrous anecdote of what very ominously befell the king on the same day is given in a manuscript letter of the time. "The Parliament was, on Wednesday, cleanly dissolved by proclamation. The same day his majesty rode by coach to Theobald's to dinner, not intending, as the speech is, to return till towards Easter. After dinner, riding on horseback abroad, his horse stumbled and cast his majesty into the New River, where the ice brake: he fell in, so that nothing but his boots were seen. Sir Richard Yong was next, who alighted, went into the water, and lifted him out. There came much water out of his mouth and bodie; his majesty rode back to Theobald's, went into a warme bed, and, as we heare, is well, which God continue."

—Harl. MSS., 399.

‡ Rushworth, vol. i., p. 55.

* See Parl. Hist., vol. v., p. 514-16. Memorial of the King's Reasons for destroying the Protestation of the Commons.

most directly to your majesty's service from your majesty's displeasure. There needs no other invention to crucifie a generous and honest-minded suppliant, upon whom hath issued and been derived a whole torrent of exemplary punishment, wherein his reputation, his person, and his estate grievously suffered; for, having (upon the last process of Parliament) retired himself to his poor house in the country, with hope a while to breathe after these troublesome affairs, and still breathing nothing but your majesty's service, he was sent for, ere he had finished his Christmas, by a sergeant at arms, who arrested him in his own house, with as much terror as belongs to the apprehending of treason itself; but (thanks be to God) his conscience never started, and his obedience herein showed it was not in the power of any authority to surprisè it; for at the instant, without asking one minute's time of resolution, he rendered himself to the officer's discretion, who (according to his directions) brought him up captive, and presented him at the council-table as a delinquent, from whence he was as soon committed to the Tower, where he ever since hath been kept close prisoner, and that with so strict a hand, as his own-beloved wife and myself, having some time since urgent and unfeigned occasion to speak with him about some private business of his family, and hereupon making humble petition to the lords of your majesty's most honourable privy council for the favour of access, we were, to our great discomforts, denied it; by reason, as their lordships were pleased to declare unto us, that he had not satisfied your majesty fully in some points, which is so far from being his fault, as, I dare say, it is the greatest part of his affliction, that he sees himself debarred from the means of doing it. The lords commissioners that were appointed by your majesty to examine his offence, since the first week of his imprisonment have not done him the honour to be with him, by which means not only his body, but (the most part of his mind) his humble intentions to your majesty, are kept in restraint. May it please, therefore, your most excellent majesty, now at length, after five months' imprisonment and extreme durance, to ordain such expedition in this cause as may stand with your justice, and yet not avert your mercy—either of them will serve our turns—but that which is most agreeable to your royal and gracious inclination will best accomplish our desire. To live still in close prison is all one as to be buried alive; and for a man that hath any hope of salvation, it were better to pray for the day of judgment than to lie languishing in such wailing misery; yet not ours, but your majesty's will be done."

A subsequent passage of the petition runs thus: "If (I say) it be not yet time to have mercy, but that he must still remain within the walls of bondage to expiate that which he did in these privileged ones, my hope is that he will die at any time for your majesty's service, and will find patience to live anywhere for your majesty's pleasure; only thus much let me beseech your majesty's grace, again and again, not to deny your humble and most obedient suppliant, that you will, at least, be pleased to mitigate the rigour of his sufferings so far as to grant him the liberty of the Tower, that he may no longer groan under the burthen of those in-commodities which daily prejudice his health and fortune in a higher degree (I believe) than either your majesty knows or intends."

No answer was returned by the king; and under this kind of restraint Pym and his friends were all, with one exception,* kept close prisoners,† until, as Roger Coke states, the breaking of the Spanish match necessitated the king to call another Parliament. Such sufferings, however, while they excite all the sympathies of the heart and mind, are much too high for pity. "I had rather," said Pym‡ on more than one occasion, "I had rather suffer for speaking the truth, than that the truth should suffer for want of my speaking." The prisons of such men are the sanctuaries of philosophy and patriotism.

The last Parliament of James was summoned, and Pym, having obtained his release, again sat for Calne. The proceedings of this Parliament have been followed so minutely in the biography of Eliot,§ that it is not necessary to say more here than that Pym's exertions, during its continuance, were chiefly employed upon the declaratory statute against monopolies, and against the delinquencies of the Lord-treasurer Middlesex.

James died, and Charles ascended the throne. The precise condition of affairs at this juncture has been already placed before the reader;|| and it will be only necessary to remind him, that the bitter distrust awakened in the English people towards their young king by the Earl of Bristol's exposure of the circumstances attending the breach of the Spanish treaties at the close of the reign of James, was aggravated by ostentatious and ill-timed indulgences granted to the professors of the Roman Catholic religion immediately upon Charles's accession. Under the influence of these feelings, the first Parliament of the new reign met, when Pym took his seat, for the first time, as member for the borough of Tavistock, in Devonshire, which he represented in all succeeding Parliaments till his death.

The first matter we find him engaged in here¶ was the case of the king's chaplain, Doc-

* This exception was in the case of Selden, who, though not a member of the Parliament, had been consulted by it, and given very decisive opinions respecting questions of privilege. He was released in consequence of the earnest intercession of the subtle Lord-keeper Williams, an extract from whose letter on this subject, addressed to Buckingham, supplies us with one or two curious hints of character. "Now," says our artful bishop, "poor Mr. Selden petitions your lordship's mediation and favour. He and the world take knowledge of that favour your lordship hath ever afforded my motions; and myself, without the motion of any; and so draweth me along to entreat for him, the which I do the more boldly, because, by his letter enclosed, he hath absolutely denied that ever he gave the least approbation of that power of judicature lately usurped by the House of Commons. My lord, the man hath excellent parts, which may be diverted from an affectation of applause of idle people to do some good and useful service to his majesty. He is but young, and it is the first offence that ever he committed against the king. I presume, therefore, to leave him to your lordship's mercy and charity."—Hacket's Scrinia Reserata, part i., p. 60. Doctor Hacket proceeds, after giving this letter, in his characteristic style: "These soft words mollified anger, and Mr. Selden was released by the next packet that came from the court in progress."

† Detention, vol. i., p. 130.

‡ See speech on the journals of the last Parliament of James; also on the 17th March, 1641. § P. 6, 9.

§ Life of Eliot, p. 9, 10.

¶ I should mention, also, that Pym was a very active member of the celebrated committee known by the name of its chairman, Mr. Sergeant Glanville. This was that grand for Montague, which may be very briefly explained. The then inseparable connexion, in the minds of the English people, between Popery and despotism, has been very frequently touched on. The effect of the Reformation—the sense of emancipated intellect which had naturally flowed from it—had been such as to imbue men's minds generally with the deepest sense of the paramount importance of a pure system of religious ethics in matters of political government. This sense struck still more deeply into the heart of England, when in every quarter of the Continent the Romish cause appeared as the cause of the oppressor, while the Protestant was that of the oppressed; and nowhere was a struggle for good government to be seen, that had not instantly arrayed against it all the powers and influences of the Roman Catholic Church. If anything was wanting to strengthen a consequent necessity, on the part of the men who now enjoyed the confidence of the great masses of the people, of a bitter opposition to the doctrines of Popery, it was furnished by the conduct of those High Church court divines who were known to be most favourable to the despotic system in politics. They made every effort to introduce, under the cover of the Arminian tenets, a sort of bastard Popery into the Church of England. Their design was plainly to secure a safe retreat for absolute monarchy under a timely alliance of prerogative with priestcraft and Church power.

Foremost in support of this design was Montague, one of the king's chaplains; and upon this divine Pym fastened with inveterate purpose. He had republished, on Charles's accession, a book which Archbishop Abbot had censured, at the request of the House of Commons, in the preceding year. Encouraged by Laud, he composed also a defence of this book, called it an appeal to Cæsar, and inscribed it to Charles. Here he asserted the Romish Church to be a true church, resting on the same authority and foundation as the English, and differing from it only in some points of lesser importance; defended the use of images; affirmed that the saints had knowledge and memory of human things, and exercised peculiar patronage over certain places and persons; maintained the real presence; numbered ordination among the sacraments; and approved confession and absolution, and the use of the sign of the cross. In the same work, as a contrast to all this, much bitterness was indulged against the Puritans; lecturing and preaching were decried; even the reading of the Scriptures was alluded to with a sneer; and, finally, by way of gratifying the despotic propensities of the king, a prerogative was claimed for him, founded on divine right, and paramount to the English laws.*

Pym was the author of the report upon this book presented to the House of Commons.

committee of privileges, whose report is still referred to as an eminent achievement of "Parliamentary reform." Advancing from their decisions on certain contested returns, they drew out a general outline and system of the legal right of voting, and issued new writs to several places, to three Buckinghamshire boroughs among them, where the custom of returning members had fallen into disuse. Hampden was also an active member of this famous committee.

* See Montague's works, entitled "A new Gag for an old Goose," and "Appello Cæsarem."

Montague was ordered immediately after into the custody of the sergeant at arms, and brought, for submission, before the bar of the House. A vehement intercession was then made for him by Laud, who so far betrayed himself, in a letter to the Duke of Buckingham, as to declare that it was impossible to conceive how any civil government could be supported, if the contrary of Montague's doctrines were to be maintained; and urged him to engage the king to reclaim to himself the judgment of the cause, as a branch of his prerogative.* Upon this Charles interfered, but with no other effect than to expose himself still more to the distrust of his people. Notwithstanding his request that, since Montague was his servant, the punishment might be referred to himself, the prisoner was obliged to give bail for his appearance before the House when called on, in the sum of £2000.

After the first ill-advised dissolution, and on the eve of the issue of writs for Charles's second Parliament, Rushworth tells us that "Bishop Laud procured the Duke of Buckingham to sound the king concerning the cause, books, and tenets of Doctor Richard Montague; and understanding by what the duke collected that the king had determined within himself to leave him to a trial in Parliament, he said, 'I seem to see a cloud arising and threatening the Church of England: God for his mercy dissipate it!'"†

But this Parliament, guided by the energy and intellect of Eliot, had higher game in hand; and Pym found himself, some few days after its assembling, appointed one of the secret managers of an impeachment against the Duke of Buckingham. This impeachment has been already described at some length,‡ but one or two characteristic extracts from the speech with which Pym presented the eleventh and twelfth articles to the judgment of the House of Lords will find a proper place here. Those articles, it will be recollected, charged the duke with procuring titles of honour and grants of land for poor and unworthy creatures of his own, and also with embezzling the king's money, and securing to himself grants of crown property of enormous value on dishonest conditions, to the gross prejudice of the crown no less than of the subject.§

Pym began his task by observing that "want of oratory" would be no disadvantage to his cause, since the "proportion of matter" he had to deliver was such that their lordships would not be likely to criticise his "art or expression." Having read the eleventh article, he proceeded to point out the fatal consequences to the well-being of the state, no less than to the morals of the subject, which must result from the continuance of such practices as those of the duke. A grave, deliberative, and weighty style will

* See Heylin's Life of Laud, p. 137. Cabala, p. 156.

† Rushworth, Coll., vol. i., p. 199.

‡ Eliot's Life, p. 13-16.

§ Anthony Wood observes, "Pym was a great enemy to the favourite of King Charles I., called George Villiers, duke of Buckingham, and very active in aggravating some of the articles that were put up against him; viz., that he forced Sir Richard Roberts, Bart., knowing him to be rich, to take the title of Lord Roberts of Truro upon him, and that, in consideration thereof, to make him pay for it to him the said duke £10,000. Farther, also, that he sold the office of lord-treasurer to the Earl of Manchester for £20,000, and the office of master of the wards to the Earl of Middlesex for £6000," &c., &c.—Ath. Ox., vol. ii., p. 73.

arrest the reader's attention in the extracts which follow; and let him think what a masterly and effective foil this must have been to the quick and impassioned eloquence of Eliot.

"There are some laws," he said, alluding to the tampering of the duke with grants and honours, "peculiar, according to the temper of several states; but there are other laws that are co-essential and co-natural with government, which being broken, all things run unto confusion; and such is that law of suppressing vice and encouraging virtue by apt punishments and rewards. Whosoever moves the king to give honour, which is a double reward, binds himself to make good a double proportion of merit in that party that is to receive it—the first of value and excellency, the second of continuance; for as this honour lifts them above others, so should they have virtue beyond others; and as it is also perpetual, not ending with their persons, but depending upon their posterity, so there ought to be, in the first root of this honour, some such active merit to the Commonwealth as may transmit a vigorous example to their successors, to raise them to an imitation of the like." Waving, then, with great dignity, any reflections "on those persons to whom this article collaterally relates, since the commands I have received from the Commons concern the Duke of Buckingham only," the speaker proceeded to urge, from the facts stated in the article itself, the heavy nature of the grievance charged. "It is prejudicial," he said, "first, to the noble barons; secondly, to the king, by disabling him from rewarding extraordinary virtue; thirdly, to the kingdom, which comprehends all. It is prejudicial to this high Court of Peers. I will not trouble your lordships with recital how ancient, how famous this degree of barons hath been in the western monarchies; I will only say, the baronage of England hath upheld that dignity, and doth conceive it in a greater height than any other nation. The lords are great judges—a court of the last resort; they are great commanders of state, not only for the present, but as law-makers and counsellors for the time to come; and this, not by delegacy and commission, but by birth and inheritance. If any be brought to be a member of this great body who is not qualified to the performance of such state functions, it must needs prejudice the whole body; as a little water put into a great vessel of wine, which, as it receives spirits from the wine, so doth it leave therein some degrees of its own infirmities and coldness. It is prejudicial to the king. Not that it can disable him from giving honour, for that is a power inseparable from the crown; but, by making honour ordinary, it becomes an incompetent reward for extraordinary virtue. When men are made noble, they are taken out of the press of the common sort; and how can it choose but fall in estimation when honour itself is made a press? It is prejudicial to the kingdom. Histories and records are full of the great assistance which the crown has received from the barons on foreign and domestic occasions; and not only by their own persons, but their retinue and tenants; and therefore they are called by Bracton, ROBUR BELLI. How can the crown expect the like from those who have no tenants, and are hardly able to maintain themselves! Besides, this is not all; for the prejudice goes not only privatively from thence, in that they cannot give the assistance they ought, but positively, in that they have been a greater burden to the kingdom since, by the gifts and pensions they have received—nay, they will even stand in need to receive more for the future support of their dignities. This makes the duke's offence greater, that in this weakness and consumption of the state he hath not been content alone to consume the public treasure, which is the blood and nourishment of the state, but hath brought in others to help him in this work of destruction; and, that they might do it the more eagerly by enlarging their honour, he hath likewise enlarged their necessities and appetites." With several precedents from early reigns, clearly and forcibly urged to the House, in proof that "when men are called to honour, and have not livelihood to support it, it induceth great poverty, and causeth bribes, extortions, embraceries, and maintenance," Pym concluded his "aggravation" of this article.

He now desired the twelfth article to be read, embodying various charges of embezzlement in various ways, both of money and land; and then, having subdivided these charges into separate branches, he presented each to the attention of the House with such popular clearness and brevity, and in such a natural and lucid order, that what must otherwise have been confused and unintelligible to all save those peers who were thoroughly versed in the nicest distinctions of property and technicalities of law, took, from the style of Pym, a remarkable simplicity and plainness. In speaking of the lands which the duke had procured, with unusual conditions of favour, from the crown, and urging the monstrous grievance, "that in a time of necessity, so much land should be conveyed to a private man," the orator interposed thus: "And because the Commons aim not at judgment only, but at reformation, they wish that, when the king bestows any lands for support of honours, those ancient cautions might be revived of annexing the land to the dignity (lest, being wasted, the party returns to the crown for a new support); by which provision the crown will reap this benefit, that as some lands go out by new grants, others will come in by extinct entails." Observing next upon the unusual clauses inserted in these grants for the duke, Pym directed their lordships' attention more especially to "the surrender of divers parcels of those lands back to the king, after he had held them some years, and taking others from the king in exchange. Hence," continued he, "the best of the king's lands, by this course, being passed away, the worst remained upon his hand; so that, having occasion to raise money, such lands could not supply him. Opportunity was also hereby left to the duke to cut down woods, to enfranchise copyholders, to make long leases; and yet, the old rent remaining still, the land might be surrendered at the same value. Whether this be done I am uncertain, not having time to examine; but I recommend it to your lordships to inquire after it; and the rather, for that the manor of Coughill, in Lincolnshire, was so dismembered, and by a surrender turned back to the king."

In the next branch of his subject, a favourite style of embezzlement with Buckingham was admirably handled—that of selling the king's lands, and causing tallies to be struck for the money paid, as if it had really gone into the Exchequer, whereas it had notoriously been received by the duke. "Divers parcels of land were sold and contracted for by his own agents, and the money received to his own use; and yet tallies struck as if the moneys had come into the Exchequer. This is to be proved by his own officers, by the officers of the Exchequer, and by the tallies themselves, which tallies amount to £44,090 5s. Whence I observe, 1. That there ran one thread of falsehood towards the king through all his dealings. 2. That it was a device to prevent the wisdom of Parliament, if it should be thought fit, from making a resumption; for by these means these grants seem to have the face of a valuable consideration, whereas they were free gifts. 3. If the title of these lands prove questionable, yet, it appearing by record as if the king had received the money, he was bound in honour to make the estate good, and yet the duke had the profit."

Alluding afterward to Buckingham's gross practice of procuring, under pretence of secret service, great sums to be issued by privy seals to sundry of his creatures, Pym thus, with earnest gravity—in a speaker whose style was less steady and deliberative it would have passed for severity or passion—hinted at the punishment which such practices might require. "The quality of the fault," he said, "I leave to your lordships. I leave to your lordships the proportion of judgment in which you will rate it—whether to that crime which in the civil law is called crimen peculatus, which was when any man did unjustly turn to his own use that money which was either sacra, dedicated to God's service, or religiosa, used about funerals or monuments of the dead, or publica, as the business now in question is; the rather, because the public treasure was held in the same reputation with that which was dedicated to God and religion. This offence—crimen peculatus—by that law, was death and confiscation. Or whether your lordships will think it to carry proportion with that crime which is called in the civil law crimen falsi, and is defined to be when any shall simulatione veri suum compendium, alieno dispendio, facere, viz., by semblance of truth make gain to himself out of others' losses; which, in the case of a bondman, was death, and in the case of other men was banishment and confiscation, as the nature of the fact required. Or whether your lordships will esteem it according to the sentence of the Star Chamber ordinary in cases of fraud, or according to the common law, which so much detests this dealing, which they term covin, as it doth vitiate ordinary and lawful actions. Or, lastly, whether your lordships will estimate it according to the duke's own judgment, in his own conscience; for direct actions are not afraid to appear open-faced, but ill dealings desire to be masked with subtlety and closeness; and therefore it were even offence sufficient, were there no more than a cunning concealing of what he received from the king, since that argues either guilt of unthankfulness, in hiding his master's bounty; guilt of unworthiness, as if he durst not avow the receipt of that which he had not merited; or guilt from fear of punishment, by these inquisitions into his actions which now are come to pass."

One extract more—in reference to the great danger that had been done to the state in the confusion between the king's estate and Buckingham's, by the duke's practices of falsifying the records and entries—will illustrate the quarter from which Pym doubtless derived his admirable habits of business and order. "By the wisdom of the law, in the constitution of the Exchequer, there be three guards set upon the king's treasurer and accompts. The first is a legal impignoration, whereby the estates, personal and real, of the accountants, are made liable to be sold for the satisfaction of their debts. The second is an act of controlment, that the king relies not upon the industry nor sincerity of any one man; but, if he fail in either, it may be discovered by the duty of some other officer, sworn to take notice of it. The third is an evidence and certainty, not for the present time only, but of perpetuity, because the king can neither receive nor pay anything but by record. All these ways have been broken by the Duke of Buckingham, both in the case next before recited, and in these that follow. The custom of the Exchequer, my lords, is the law of the kingdom for as much as concerneth the revenue. Now every breach of that law, by particular offence, is punishable; but such an offence, as is the destruction of the law itself, is of a far higher nature." Pym next alluded to "two privy seals of release—the one the 16th, the other the 20th Jac.—concerning divers sums secretly received to his majesty's use, but by virtue of these releases to be converted to the Duke of Buckingham's own profit, the proof whereof is referred to the privy seals themselves;" and thus continued: "Hence, my lords, appear the duke's subtilties, by which he used to wind himself into the possession of the king's money, and to get that by cunning steps and degrees, which, peradventure, he could not have obtained at once. A good master will trust a good servant with a greater sum than he would give him; yet after, when it is out of his possession, will be drawn the more easily to release him from accounting for it, than to have made it a free gift at first."

Having gone through the various charges in detail, Pym now presented to the House in one mass the gross amount in money and land absorbed from the public estate by Buckingham, and afterward summed up his share of the great duty that had been assigned to him by the House of Commons in this grave and deliberate manner. "This is a great sum in itself, but much greater by many circumstances. If you look upon the time past, never so much came into any one private man's hands out of the public purse. If you respect the time present, the king had never so much want, never so many occasions, foreign, important, and expensive. The subjects have never given greater supplies, and yet those supplies are unable to furnish those expenses. But as such circumstances make that sum the greater, so there are other circumstances which make the sum little, if it be compared with the inestimable gain the duke hath made by the sale of honours and offices, and projects hurtful to the states both of England and Ireland, or if it be compared with his own profuseness. Witness, notwithstanding this gift, his confession before both Houses of Parliament to be indebted £100,000 and above. If this be true, how can we hope to satisfy his immense prodigality? if false, how can we hope to satisfy his covetousness? And, therefore, no wonder the Commons so earnestly desire to be delivered from such a grievance. I shall now produce the precedents of your lordship's predecessors. Precedents they are in kind, but not in proportion, for in that view there are no precedents. The first is the 10th Rich. II., which was in the complaint against Michael de la Pole, earl of Suffolk, out of which I shall take three articles. The first, that being chancellor, and sworn to the king's profit, he had purchased divers lands from the king, more than he had deserved, and at an under rate. The second, that he had bought an annuity of £50 per annum, which grant was void, and yet he procured the king to make it good. The third, whereas the master of St. Anthony's, being a schismatic, had forfeited his estate into the king's hands, this earl took it in farm at 20 marks the year, converting the overplus, which was 1000 marks, to his own benefit, which should have come to the king. The next precedent is one of the 11th Rich. II., out of the judgment against Robert de Vere and others, out of which I shall take two articles, the fifth and seventh. The fifth was for taking lands and manors annexed to the crown, whereby they themselves were enriched, and the king made poor. The seventh was intercepting the subsidies granted for the defence of the kingdom. The third precedent is 28 Hen. VI., in the Parliament roll, out of the complaint against William, duke of Suffolk, to the effect that, being next and priviest of council to the king, he had procured him to grant great possessions to divers persons, whereby the king was much impoverished, the expense of his house unpaid, wages, the wardrobe, castles, navy debts unsatisfied; and so, by his subtle counsel and unprofitable labour, the revenues of the crown, of the Duchy of Lancaster, and of other the king's inheritances, so diminished, and the commons of the realm so extremely charged, that it was near a final destruction; and, moreover, that the king's treasure was so mischievously diminished to himself, his friends, and well-wishers, that, for lack of money, no armour nor ordnance could be provided in time. These precedents, my lords, the Commons produce as precedents in kind, but not in proportion; and, since these great persons were not brought to judgment upon these articles alone, you will observe this as a just conclusion, that ravaging upon the king's estate is always accompanied with other great vices. All these considerations I humbly submit to your lordship's great wisdom, and conclude with hoping that, as this great duke has so far exceeded all others in his offences, he may not fall short of them in punishment."*

* See the Old Parliamentary History, vol. vii., p. 123-129. The recent editors of the Parl. Hist. have entirely omitted this striking speech. I cannot resist adjoining, in

The result of this great movement against Buckingham, the abrupt dissolution of the second Parliament, and the disastrous events that followed, have been sufficiently placed before the reader. Pym was thrown into prison, and only again released on his return to the third Parliament for Tavistock. In that memorable third Parliament, his exertions were only second to those of Eliot. With that great patriot and statesman, indeed, Pym went hand in hand;* and his deference to Eliot's powers was only less admirable than the extent and capacity of his own.

When, after the first debate on grievances, in which the member for Tavistock did not fail to distinguish himself, the motion for granting five subsidies was brought forward, in accordance with the noble plan of operations determined upon by Eliot, and already fully described in my account of his exertions, it was Pym who urged most emphatically upon the House the necessity of the immediate grant. "In business of weight," he said, "despatch is better than discourse. We came not hither without all motives that can be towards his majesty. We must add expedition to expedition: let us forbear particulars. A man in a journey is hindered by asking too many questions. To give speedily is that which the king calls for. 'A word spoken in season is like an apple of gold set in pictures of silver;' and actions are more precious than words. Let us hasten our resolutions to supply his majesty."† Now it might really have been upon this note, a very remarkable list of precedents similar to those urged by Pym, which were furnished by Sir Robert Cotton, when sitting in the previous Parliament at Oxford. "I will tell you what I have found, since this assembly at Oxford, written by a reverend man, twice vice-chancellor of this place: his name was Gascoigne—a man that saw the tragedy of De la Pole. He tells you that the revenues of the crown were so rent away by ill counsel, that the king was enforced to live de tallagis populi, and was grown in debt quinque centena milia librarum; that his great favourite, in treating a foreign marriage, had lost his master a foreign duchy; that, to work his ends, he had caused the king to adjourn the Parliament in villis et partibus remotis regni, where few people, propter defectum hospitii et victualium, could attend, and by the shifting that assembly from place to place, to enforce (I use the author's own words) illos paucos qui remanebant de communitate regni concedere regi quavis pessima. It was," says he, in conclusion, "a speeding article against the Bishop of Winchester and his brother, in the time of Edward III., that they engrossed the person of the king from his other lords. It was not forgotten against Gaveston and the Spencers in the time of Edward II. The unhappy ministers of Richard II., Henry VI., and Edward VI., felt the weight, to their ruin, of the like errors. I hope we shall not complain in Parliament again of such. I am glad we have neither just cause nor undutiful dispositions to appoint the king a council to redress those errors in Parliament, as those 42 Henry III. We do not desire, as 5 Henry IV. or 29 Henry VI., the removing from about the king any evil counsellors. We do not request a choice by name, as 14 Edward II., 3, 5, 11 Richard II., 8 Henry IV., 31 Henry VI.; nor to swear them in Parliament, as 35 Edward I., 9 Edward II., 5 Richard II.; or to line them out their directions of rule, 43 Henry III. and 8 Henry VI." This sort of display of learning has a wonderful significance of meaning beneath it. See History 15, from Mackintosh, vol. v., p. 10, 11.

* Pym was the only man in the House of Commons who seemed to have a perfect understanding with Eliot as to the course of his intentions towards Buckingham, and, in prosecuting the matter in such a way as to give the greatest possible effect to Eliot's policy, he showed himself master of the same large ulterior views. When the news of the arrest of Eliot was carried to the House of Commons, Pym was the only person present who did not seem startled out of his self-possession. In the midst of tumultuous shouting and cries for instant adjournment, his voice was heard counselling judgment and temper. See Journals, May 12, 1626.

† Parl. Hist., vol. vii., p. 430.

such words as these, spoken with a view to give effect to the noble and temperate policy which was thought necessary for the achievement of the petition of right, that Lord Clarendon afterward ventured,* in his indulgence of revengeful spleen against the memory of Pym, to ground his famous accusation, that, at a particular time, "Mr. Pym made some overtures to provide for the glory and splendour of the crown, in which he had so ill success that his interest and reputation visibly abated." The time named by the historian is indeed much later; but the speech which has just been quoted is about the best semblance of authority for such a charge that can be found on the debates or journals of the House of Commons;† and it will scarcely be maintained that, in the absence of such corroborative authority, Lord Clarendon's assertion upon such a matter is entitled to the smallest weight.‡

Certainly the court was soon fated to be undeceived, if it had ever persuaded itself to construe these words of the patriot leader into a shrinking or relenting from the popular cause. Pym's activity in searching every possible quarter for precedents during the preparation of the petition of rights was marked and incessant; he was said by Sir Edward Coke to have examined every state paper in the manuscript collections at Lambeth. Equally indefatigable were his exertions during the progress of that great measure through the houses; and many of the wretched expedients§ vainly resorted to by Charles, day by day, and week by week, to elude the purpose or weary out the perseverance of his opponents, were defeated by Pym's address and courage. When Secretary Cooke carried down Charles's brief and peremptory message to the House, desiring to know whether they would or would not rest upon his royal word,|| it was Pym's voice which broke the long silence that followed the startling question. He rose and said, with consummate presence of mind and admirable temper, "We have his majesty's coronation oath to maintain the laws of England—what need we then to take his word?" and afterward quietly proposed to move "whether we should take the king's word or no." Old Cooke, upon this, started from his seat with the indignant question, "What would they say in foreign parts if the people of England refused to trust their king?" "Truly," rejoined Pym, quickly, "truly, Mr. Speaker, I am just of the same opinion I was, namely, that the king's oath is as powerful as his word." Eliot then came to the assistance of Pym, and the dishonest message was rejected.¶ So, when the petition of rights itself was sent down from the House of Lords with the addition of the saving clause proposed by Williams, to the effect that "they would leave entire the SOVEREIGN POWER with which his majesty was trusted, for the protection, safety, and happiness of the people," Pym rose from his seat, and uttered these remarkable words: "I am not able to speak to this question. I know not what it is. All our petition is for the laws of England, and this 'power' seems to be another distinct power from the power of the law. I know how to add sovereign to the king's person, but not to his power. We cannot 'leave' to him a sovereign power, for we never were possessed of it."* The issue has been fully described.

Great as Pym's exertions were, however, during the progress of the petition of right, we do not find that they in any way served to abate his attendance on the various religious committees of this famous session, at all of which he sat as chairman. An ingenious admirer of Charles I. has, in allusion to this, observed: "The profound politicians among the patriots, as Pym and Hampden, now allied themselves to the religionists. The factions at first amalgamated, for each seemed to assist the other, and, while the contest was doubtful, their zeal, as their labours, was in common. Religion, under the most religious of monarchs, was the ostensible motive by which the patriots moved the people. When, on one occasion, it was observed that the affairs of religion seemed not so desperate that they should wholly engross their days, Pym replied, that they must not abate their ardour for the true religion, that being the most certain end to obtain their purpose and maintain their influence."‡ This is not correctly stated, since no such alliance, except in so far as the objects of both parties could not be kept apart, was at this time formed. Pym was never, at any period of his life, a Nonconformist; he died, as he had lived, in the discipline, no less than in the faith, of the pure English Church, "a faithful son of the Protestant religion."† It is true that he was the means of exacting from the country party in the House of Commons a greater attention than they had before been used to pay to matters of religious faith and doctrine, but with what aim? not, most surely, to inflame the religious passions of the people, or to strengthen any set of dissenters from the Church, but to assault, through the sides of court divines, the strongest holds of absolute power. The sect of the Puritans was not increased by Pym's exertions. It was the good work of Laud, and of such as Laud, to enlist upon their side the deepest sympathies of even the most sober sections of the English people, who thought it hard indeed that vast numbers of high-minded, industrious, and conscientious men, firmly attached to the laws of England, should be driven from their native soil, or harassed in property and estate, or mutilated in person, only for scrupling to comply with a few indifferent ceremonies that had no relation to the favour of God or to the practice of virtue, Laud Puritanized England. Pym's share in the work, as well as his general principle of Parliamentary interference in religious affairs,

* See Hist. of Rebellion, vol. iv., p. 438.

† I have carefully examined them all with this view, and may here remark, that were I to give only the names of the numberless committees of which Pym was the leading member through all the Parliaments of Charles, I might fill half this volume with such details alone. His habits of business must have been wonderful indeed!

‡ See post, p. 183, note. The speech there referred to is not upon the journals.

§ They are all described in the Life of Eliot.

|| "Upon this there was silence for a good space."—See Rushworth, vol. i., p. 553; Parl. Hist., vol. xviii., p. 95; Life of Eliot, p. 22.

¶ Sloane MSS., 4177.

* Parl. Hist., vol. viii., p. 118.

† D'Israeli's Commentaries on the Life of Charles the First, vol. iii., p. 296, 297.

‡ His own words. See Rushworth's Collections, vol. v., p. 377.

will be best explained by his speech in the case of Doctor Mainwaring.

While the House of Commons were deliberating, in distrust and resentment, on the king's first answer to the petition of right, which had just been presented to them, Pym seized the occasion of carrying up to the House of Lords a "declaration" against Mainwaring. During the last interval of Parliament, this divine, one of the royal chaplains, had rendered himself notorious by the slavish doctrines of his sermons. In obedience to Laud's instructions* to the clergy to "preach the loan," he had delivered two infamously servile discourses, with a view to show that "the king could make laws and do whatsoever pleased him; that he was not bound by any pre-existing law respecting the rights of the subject; and that his sole will in imposing taxes without the consent of Parliament obliged the subjects' conscience, on pain of eternal damnation."† One extract from these effusions will show their style and character. "Of all relations, the first and original is between the Creator and the creatures; the next between husband and wife; the third between parents and children; the fourth between lord and servants; from all which forenamed respects there doth arise that most high, sacred, and transcendent relation between king and subject."

On Wednesday, the 4th of June, Pym presented himself to the Lords as the accuser of Mainwaring. He began by saying that he should speak to this cause with more confidence, because he saw nothing to discourage him. "If I consider the matter," he continued, "the offences are of a high nature and of easy proof; if I consider your lordships, who are the judges, your own interest, your own honour, the examples of your ancestors, the care of your posterity, all will be advocates with me in this cause on the behalf of the commonwealth. And when I consider the king our sovereign—the pretence of whose service and prerogative might, perchance, be sought unto as a defence and shelter for this delinquent—I cannot but remember that part of the king's answer to the petition of right of both houses, 'that his majesty held himself bound in conscience to preserve their liberties,' which this man would persuade him to impeach. Nor, my lords, can I but remember his majesty's love to piety and justice, manifested upon all occasions; and I know Love to be the root and spring of all other passions and affections. A man therefore hates, because he sees somewhat in that which he hates contrary to that which he loves; a man therefore is angry, because he sees somewhat in that wherewith he is angry that gives impediment and interruption to the accomplishment of that which he loves.* If this be so, by the same act of apprehension by which I believe his majesty's love to piety and justice, I must needs believe his hate and detestation of this man, who went about to withdraw him from the exercise of both."

After this very striking commencement, Pym proceeded to that which he said was the task enjoined him, "To make good every clause of that which had been read unto them; which, that he might the more clearly perform, he proposed to observe that order of parts into which the said declaration was naturally dissolved.

1. Of the preamble.
2. The body of the charge.
3. The conclusion, or prayer of the Commons.

"The preamble consisted altogether of recital—first, of the inducements upon which the Commons undertook this complaint; second, of those laws and liberties against which the offence was committed; third, of the violation of those laws which have relation to that offence. Now," he continued, "from the connexion of all these recitals, it was to be observed that there did result three positions, which he was to maintain as the groundwork and foundation of the whole cause. The first, that the form of government in any state could not be altered without apparent danger of ruin to that state. The second, that the law of England, whereby the subject is exempted from taxes and loans not granted by common consent of Parliament, was not introduced by any statute, or by any charter or sanction of princes, but was the ancient and fundamental law, issuing from the first frame and constitution of the kingdom. The third, that this liberty of the subject is not only most convenient and profitable for the people, but most honourable and necessary for the king; yea, in that very point of supply for which it was endeavoured to be broken.

"As for the first position, the best form of government is that which doth actuate and dispose every part and member of a state to the common good; and as those parts give strength and ornament to the whole, so they receive from it again strength and protection in their several stations and degrees. If this mutual relation and intercourse be broken, the whole frame will quickly be dissolved and fall in pieces; for while, instead of this concord and interchange of support, one part seeks to

* Mr. Browning has worked upon the same noble thought in his poem:

* * * "All love renders wise
In its degree; from love which blends with love—Heart answering heart—to that which spends itself
In silent mad idolatry of some
Pre-eminent mortal—some great soul of souls—
Which ne'er will know how well it is adored!
* * * Love is never blind, but rather Alive to every the minutest spot
That mars its object, and which hate (supposed So vigilant and searching) dreams not of.

* * * Trust me,
If there be friends who seek to work our hurt,
To ruin and drag down earth's mightiest spirits,
Even at God's foot, 'twill be from such as love—
Their zeal will gather most to serve their cause—
And least from those who hate."—Paracelsus, part 2.

* These instructions commenced thus. They were drawn up by Laud in the name of the king: "We have observed that the Church and the State are so nearly united and knit together, that, though they may seem two bodies, yet, indeed, in some relation they may be accounted but as one, inasmuch as they are both made up of the same men, which are differentiated only in relation to spiritual or civil ends. This nearness makes the Church call in the help of the State to succour and support her whensoever she is pressed beyond her strength. And the same nearness makes the State call in for the service of the Church, both to teach that duty which her members know not, and to exhort them to, and encourage them in, that duty which they know. It is not long since we ordered the State to serve the Church, and, by a timely proclamation, settled the peace of it; and now the State looks for the like assistance from the Church, that she and all her ministers may serve God and us by preaching peace and unity at home, that it may be the better able to resist foreign force uniting and multiplying against it." Who can doubt the design so plainly intimated in this passage, of a crusade of Church and State against the people's liberties?

† Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 8-10.

uphold the old form of government, and the other part to introduce a new, they will miserably consume and devour one another. Histories are full of the calamities of whole states and nations in such cases. But it is equally true that time must needs bring about some alterations, and every alteration is a step and degree towards a dissolution: those things only are eternal which are constant and uniform. Therefore it is observed by the best writers on this subject, that those common-wealths have been most durable and perpetual which have often reformed and recomposed themselves according to their first institution and ordinance; for by this means they repair the breaches, and counterwork the ordinary and natural effects of time.

"The second is as manifest. There are plain footsteps of those laws in the government of the Saxons: they were of that vigour and force as to overlive the Conquest—nay, to give bounds and limits to the Conqueror, whose victory only gave him hope, but the assurance and possession of the crown he obtained by composition, in which he bound himself to observe these and the other ancient laws and liberties of the kingdom, and which afterward he likewise confirmed by oath at his coronation; and from him the said obligation descended to his successors. It is true they have been often broken, and they have been often confirmed by charters of kings and by acts of Parliaments; but the petitions of the subjects, upon which those charters and acts were founded, were ever PETITIONS OF RIGHT, demanding their ancient and due liberties, not suing for any new.

"To clear the third position may seem to some men more a paradox, that those liberties of the subject should be so convenient and profitable to the people, and yet most necessary for the supply of his majesty. But surely," he said, "if those liberties were taken away, there would remain no more industry, no more justice, no more courage; for who will contend, who will endanger himself for that which is not his own? And yet," he added, "he would not insist upon any of those points, nor upon others equally important; but only observe, that if those liberties were taken away, there would remain no means for the subjects, by any act of bounty or benevolence, to ingratiate themselves with their sovereign." And, in reference to this point, he desired their lordships to remember "what profitable prerogatives the laws had at various times appointed for the support of sovereignty, as wardships, treasures-trove, felons' goods, fines, amercements, and other issues of courts, wrecks, escheats, and many more, too long to be enumerated; which, for the most part, are now, by charters and grants of several princes, dispersed into the hands of private persons; and that, besides the ancient demesnes of the crown of England, William the Conqueror did annex to the crown, for the better maintenance of his estate, great proportions of those lands which were confiscate from those English who persisted to withstand him, of which, notwithstanding, very few remain at this day in the king's possession; yet also, since that time, the revenue of the crown hath been supplied and augmented by attainders and other casualties, and in the age of our fathers by the dissolution of monasteries and chantries, of which near a third part of the whole land came into the king's possession." He remembered farther that constant and profitable grant of the subjects in the act of tonnage and poundage. "But of what avail," he added, "have all these grants and prerogatives been? They were now so alienated, anticipated, or overcharged with annuities and assignments, that no means were left for the pressing and important occasions of the time but one, and that one the voluntary and free gift of the subjects in Parliament. It is that which is now assailed; but trust me, my lords," Pym exclaimed, "the hearts of the people, and their bounty in Parliament, are the only constant treasure and revenue of the crown which cannot be exhausted, alienated, anticipated, or otherwise charged and encumbered!"

There is nothing more remarkable in the speeches of Pym than what may be emphatically termed their wisdom. This will have frequent and abundant illustration in the course of this memoir. Never, in the most excited moments of even his latter life, did he seem other than far removed above the idle clamours of party, and the little views of the "ignorant present," while with this he could combine, at will, the most immediate and most practical resources of the orator; for the wisdom I have spoken of was, as it always is with the greatest men, a junction of the plain and practical with the profound and contemplative; to such an extent, however, in his case, and in such perfection, as may not be equalled in that of any other speaker of ancient or modern time, with the single exception of Burke. Hence his speeches were not simply a present achievement of the matters he had in hand, but a grand appeal, on their behalf, to the enlightened judgment of the future; and the presenting the more prominent passages of them thus, for the first time, to the attention and admiration of his fellow-countrymen, is no less to discharge a very tardy act of justice to his memory, than to furnish the most striking, and, as it were, living materials for a judgment on the great times in which he lived.

After a farther homiletic subdivision of his subject, a practice of which he was extremely fond, and which gave a certain weight and scholastic formality to the commonest point he touched on, Pym proceeded at great length through the second grand division of his speech, step by step—to "show the state of the case as it stood both in the charge and the proof;" to "take away the pretensions of mitigation and limitation of his opinions urged by the doctor in defence;" to "observe circumstances of aggravation;" and "to propound some precedents of former times, wherein, though he could not match the offence now in question, yet he should produce such as should sufficiently declare how forward our ancestors would have been in the prosecution and condemning of such offences, if they had been then committed." The materials of the charge, he observed, were contrived into three distinct articles. The first of these comprehended two clauses: "First. That his majesty is not bound to keep and observe the good laws and customs of the realm concerning the right and liberty of the subject to be exempted from all loans, taxes, and other aids laid upon them without common consent in Parliament. Second. That his majesty's will and command, in imposing any charges upon his subjects without such consent, doth so far bind them in their consciences that they cannot refuse the same without peril of eternal damnation!" Two kinds of proof were produced upon this article: "The first was from assertions of the doctor's, concerning the power of kings in general, but, by necessary consequence, to be applied to the kings of England. The next was from his Censures and Determinations upon the particular case of the late loan, which, by necessity and parity of reason, were likewise applicable to all cases of a like nature; and lest, by frailty of nature, he might mistake the words or invert the sense, he desired leave to resort to a paper, wherein the places were carefully extracted out of the book itself."

And then he read each particular clause, pointing to the page for proof, and afterward proceeded and said, that from this evidence of the fact doth issue a clear evidence of his wicked intention to misguide and seduce the king's conscience, touching the observations of the laws and liberties of the kingdom, and to scandalize and impeach the good laws and government of the realm, and the authority of Parliaments. "Now, my lords," continued Mr. Pym, "if to give the king ill counsel in one particular action hath heretofore been heavily punished in this high court, how much more heinous must it needs be thought to pervert and seduce, by ill counsel, his majesty's conscience—that sovereign principle of all moral actions in man, from which they are to receive warrant for their direction before they be acted, and judgment for their reformation afterward! If scandalum magnatum—slander and infamy cast upon great lords and officers of the kingdom—has been always most severely censured, how much more tender ought we to be of that slander and infamy which is here cast upon the laws and government, from whence are derived all the honour and reverence due to those great lords and magistrates! All men, my lords, and so the greatest and highest magistrates, are subject to passions and partialities, whereby they may be transported into over-hard injurious crosses; and though these considerations can never justify, they may sometimes excuse, the railing and evil speeches of men who have been so provoked; it being a true rule, that whatsoever gives strength and enforcement to the temptation in any sin, doth necessarily imply an abatement and diminution of guilt in that sin. But to slander and disgrace the laws and government is without possibility of any such excuse, it being a simple act of a malignant will, not induced nor excited by any outward provocation; for the laws, carrying an equal and constant respect to all, ought to be revered equally by all." And thus he derived the proofs and enforcements upon the first article of the charge.

In the same strain of grave and lofty eloquence Pym urged the second and third articles of the impeachment, and then observed, with conclusive effect, upon Mainwaring's attempted limitations of his doctrines. The doctor had pleaded, for instance, among other things, that "he did not attribute to the king any such absolute power as might be exercised at all times or upon all occasions, but only upon necessity extreme and urgent;" and to this Pym answered, "That it is all one to leave the power absolute, and to leave the judgment arbitrary when to execute that power; for, although these limitations should be admitted, yet it is left to the king alone to determine what is an urgent and pressing necessity, and what is a just proportion, both in respect of the ability and of the use and occasion; and what shall be said to be a circumstance, and what the substance of the law. Thus the subject is left without remedy; and, the legal bounds being taken away, no private person shall be allowed to oppose his own particular opinion, in any of these points, to the king's resolution; so that all these limitations, though specious in show, are in effect fruitless and vain."

Having answered, in the same easy strain, all Mainwaring's flimsy defence, he now took up some "circumstances of aggravation," and presented them to the Lords. The remark he makes on the fact of some of these sermons having been preached before the "king and court at Whitehall," is very singular and significant.

"The first," he said, alluding to the circumstances of aggravation, "was from the place where these sermons were preached—the court, the king's own family, where such doctrine was before so well believed that no man need to be converted. Of this there could be no end but either simoniacal, by flattery and soothing to make way for his own preferment, or else extremely malicious, to add new afflictions to those who lay under his majesty's wrath, disgraced and imprisoned, and thus to enlarge the wound which had been given to the laws and liberties of the kingdom. The second was from the consideration of his holy function. He is a preacher of God's word, and yet he had endeavoured to make that, which was the only rule of justice and goodness, to be the warrant for violence and oppression. He is a messenger of peace, but he had endeavoured to sow strife and dissension, not only among private persons, but even betwixt the king and his people, to the disturbance and danger of the whole state. He is a spiritual father; but, like that evil father in the Gospel, he hath given his children stones instead of bread; instead of flesh he hath given them scorpions. Lastly, he is a minister of the Church of England, but he hath acted the part of a Romish Jesuit: they labour our destruction, by dissolving the oath of allegiance taken by the people; he doth the same work, by dissolving the oath of protection and justice taken by the king."

With the same eloquent boldness he next observed, as a circumstance of aggravation, that the authors quoted by Mainwaring in support of his doctrines were "for the most part friars and Jesuits;" and, worse than this, that he had been guilty of "fraud and shifting in citing even those authors to purposes quite different from their own meanings." In this portion of his great task, Pym gave some memorable illustrations of the labour and learning he had applied to it, only one very short specimen of which may be given here. "In the twenty-seventh page of his first sermon," Mr. Pym continued, "he cites these words, Suarez de Legibus, lib. v., cap. 17: Acceptationem populi non esse conditionem necessariam, ex vi juris naturalis aut gentium, neque ex jure communi. Now the Jesuit adds, Neque ex antiquo jure Hispaniæ, which words are left out by the doctor, lest the reader might be invited to inquire what was antiquum jus Hispaniæ; though it might have been learned from the same author, in another place of that work, that about two hundred years since this liberty was granted to the people by one of the kings, that no tribute should be imposed without their consent; and this author adds farther, that after the law is introduced, and confirmed by custom, the king is bound to observe it." From this place Pym took occasion to make this short digression: "That the kings of Spain, being powerful and wise princes, would never have parted with such a mark of absolute royalty if they had not found in this course more advantage than in the other; and the success and prosperity of that kingdom, through the valour and industry of the Spanish nation, so much advanced since that time, do manifest the wisdom of the change." It would be scarcely possible to illustrate Pym's courage and high-minded indifference to popular prejudice better than by these few words in praise of the Spanish nation, at that time the object of universal execration with the English people.

As a concluding point of aggravation, Pym now mentioned the circumstance of Mainwaring's having repeated, "in his own parish church of St. Giles," the very offensive doctrines originally charged against him, "even since the sitting of Parliament and his being questioned in Parliament;" and then "desired the Lords that this circumstance might be carefully considered, because the Commons held it to be a great contempt offered to the Parliament for him to maintain that so publicly which was here questioned. A great presumption, they held it, for a private divine to debate the right and power of the king, which is a matter of such a nature as to be handled only in this high court, and that with moderation and tenderness."

Pym now, in conclusion, produced some such precedents as might testify what the opinion of our ancestors would have been, if this case had fallen out in their time; and herein, he said, "he would confine himself to the reigns of the first three Edwards, two of them princes of great glory." He began with the eldest—West. I., cap. 34: "By this statute, 3 Edw. I., provision was made against those who should tell any false news or device, by which any discord or scandal may arise betwixt the king, his people, and great men of the kingdom. By 27 Edward I. (Rot. Parl., n. 20), it was declared by the king's proclamation, sent into all the counties of England, that they that reported that he would not observe the great charter were malicious people, who desired to put trouble and debate betwixt the king and his subjects, and to disturb the peace and good estate of the king, the people, and the realm. In 5 Edward II. (Inter novas Ordinationes), Henry de Beaumont, for giving the king ill counsel against his oath, was put from the council, and restrained from coming into the presence of the king under pain of confiscation and banishment. By 19 Edward II. (Clause, Mem. 26, indors.), commissions were granted to inquire upon the statute of West. I. touching the spreading of news, whereby discord and scandal might grow betwixt the king and his people. In 10 Edw. III. (Clause, M. 26), proclamation went out to arrest all of those who had presumed to report that the king would lay upon the woods certain sums, besides the ancient and due customs; where the king calls these reports 'exquisita mendacia, &c., quæ non tantum in publicam læsionem, sed in nostrum cedunt damnum, et dedecus manifestum.' In 12 Edward III. (Rot. Almanicæ), the king writes to the Archbishop of Canterbury, excusing himself for some impositions which he had laid, professing his great sorrow for it; desires the archbishop, by indulgences and other ways, to stir up the people to pray for him; hoping that God would enable him, by some satisfactory benefit, to make amends, and comfort his subjects for those pressures." Having added to these temporal precedents one or two from ecclesiastical records, Pym presented to their lordships the following result to be collected from them: "If former Parliaments were careful of false rumours and news, they would have been much more tender of such doctrines as these, which might produce great occasions of discord betwixt the king and his people. If those who reported the king would lay impositions and break his laws were thought such heinous offenders, how much more should the man be condemned who persuaded the king he is not bound to keep those laws! If that great king Edward was so far from challenging any right in this kind, that he professed his own sorrow and repentance for grieving his subjects with unlawful charges—if confessors were enjoined to frame the conscience of the people to the observances of these laws, certainly such doctrines as those of Mainwaring, and such a preacher as this, would have been held most strange and abominable in all those great times of England!"

Then, having recited the prayer of the Commons, desiring Mainwaring to be brought to examination and judgment, Pym concluded, "That, seeing the cause had strength enough to maintain itself, his humble suit to their lordships was, that they would not observe his infirmities and defects, to the diminution or prejudice of that strength."*

Laud trembled at the effects of this speech, and even expressed to the king his alarm for an impeachment against himself; but Charles told him to be under no uneasiness till he saw him forsake his other friends.† Yet even Charles winced from an open defiance of the manifest feeling excited by Pym, and for a time pretended to yield up Mainwaring to the judgment of Parliament. "Truly," says Sanderson,‡ "I remember the king's answer to all: 'He that will preach other than he can prove, let him suffer; I give them no thanks to give me my due ;" and so, being a Parliament business, he (Mainwaring) was left by the king and Church to their sentence." Immediately after the passing of the petition of right, that sentence was pronounced by the upper House ; and, in spite of Mainwaring's tears and affected penitence, to say nothing of his impudent hypocrisy, he was condemned to imprisonment during the pleasure of Parliament ; to be fined a thousand pounds to the king ; to make a submission, both in writing and personally, at the bar of the House, and also at the bar of the Commons ; to be suspended from the ministry for three years ; and to be incapable of ever holding an ecclesiastical dignity or secular office, or of preaching at court. Lastly, the peers ordered his sermons to be burned.* "A heavy sentence, I confess," observes Heylin,† "but such as did rather affright than hurt him ; for his majesty, looking on him in that conjuncture as one that suffered in his cause, preferred him first to the parsonage of Stamford-Rivers in Essex (void not long after by the promotion of Montague to the see of Chichester), afterward to the deanery of Worcester, and, finally, to the bishopric of St. David's. This was indeed the way to have his majesty well served, but such as created him some ill thoughts towards the Commons for his majesty's indulgence to him."

* I have collected this speech from various documents; but a fair report will be found in the Old Parliamentary History, vol. iii., p. 171-189.

† Heylin's Life of Laud, p. 171. See, also, Laud's Diary.

‡ Life of Charles the First, p. 115.

These disgraceful promotions, strengthened by the translation of Laud himself to the see of London, took place during the prorogation of Parliament, and the feelings with which the Commons reassembled in consequence have already been described.‡ Pym took an active part in their debates on the spread of Arminianism, and spoke with bitterness of the recent promotions. "Who," he asked, "could pretend to ignorance of the articles of the true Protestant religion? Had they not been settled by the Articles set forth in 1552; by the Catechism set forth in King Edward the Sixth's days; by the writings of Peter Martyr, Martin Bucer, Wicliffe, and others; by the constant profession, sealed by the blood of so many martyrs, as Cranmer, Ridley, and others; by the Thirty-nine Articles set forth in Queen Elizabeth's time; and by the Articles set forth at Lambeth as the doctrine of the Church of England, which King James sent to Dort and to Ireland as the truth professed here? Lastly, had they not been set forth by his majesty's own declaration and proclamation to maintain unity in the settled religion? Yet these are now perverted and abused, to the ruin and subversion of religion! Consider the preferments which such have received since the last Parliament who have heretofore taught contrary to the truth! Then consider again for what overt acts these men have been countenanced and advanced! what pardons they have had for false doctrines! what manner of preaching hath been lately before the king's majesty! what suppression of books that have been written against their doctrines, and what permitting of such books as have been written for them!" Subsequently Pym propounded certain remedial measures, which he urged it to be the duty of the Parliament in general, and of each Christian in particular, to follow, "For," he continued, "howsoever it is alleged that the Parliament are not judges in matters of faith, yet ought they to know the established and fundamental truths, and the contrary to them;"* for Parliaments have confirmed acts of general councils, which have not been received until they have been so authorized; and Parliaments have enacted laws for trial of heretics by juries. The Parliament punished the Earl of Essex for countenancing of heretics; and there is no court can meet with these mischiefs but the court of Parliament. The convocation cannot, because it is but a provincial synod, only of the jurisdiction of Canterbury, and the power thereof is not adequate to the whole kingdom; while the convocation of York may, perhaps, not agree with that of Canterbury. The High Commission cannot, for it hath its authority derived from Parliament, and the derivative cannot prejudice the original. It is, in short, reserved for the judgment of the Parliament, that being the judgment of the king and of the three estates of the kingdom.†

The result of these debates was the famous vow or declaration‡ respecting religion, which, as Carte takes upon himself to inform us, "Mr. Pym, having the more time to take care of other people's religion because he had very little of his own, drew up, and presented to the House."§ This was the last great act of that most celebrated Parliament, in which Pym had achieved for himself, almost equally with Eliot, the pursuing hatred of the court. Fortunately, however, he was not an actor in the stormy and tempestuous scene of its dissolution, and therefore escaped that vengeance by which the popular cause lost so formidable a champion, and himself so dear a friend.

But another friend had fallen from his side some few months before, alienated by a worse stroke, in the thought of Pym, than that of imprisonment or death. Sir Thomas Wentworth had gone over to the court; and Pym, who is described to have been the only one of the leading popular men, besides Hollis, really intimate with Wentworth, is said to have felt this desertion with singular acuteness. Vainly imagining that

"Mutual league,
United thoughts and counsels, equal hope,
And hazard in the glorious enterprise," had joined them inseparably, it was probably Pym who, whenever Eliot impugned the trust-

* In Aikin's Life of Charles, and also in the history from Mackintosh, the following words are attributed to Pym in this debate: "It belongs to Parliament to establish true religion and to punish false." But the passage in the text is the original from which that truly sweeping apophthegm of Parliamentary supremacy and persecution has been taken; and, it is scarcely necessary to add, it does not by any means authorize such a violent and absurd construction. I had before observed (Life of Eliot, p. 30) that Rushworth's reports of this session are very incorrect, and the words in question are taken from Rushworth. But for the correct speech, see Old Parl. Hist., vol. viii., p. 262-263.

† Oliver Cromwell's first reported speech in Parliament was made on this occasion, and is worth subjoining. He said "that he heard by relation from one Dr. Beard, that Dr. Alabaster had preached flat popery at St. Paul's Cross, and that the Bishop of Winchester (Dr. Neile) commanded him, as he was his diocesan, he should preach nothing to the contrary. He said that Mainwaring, so justly censured for his sermons in this House, was, by this bishop's means, preferred to a rich living. If these are steps to Church preferments, what may we not expect?"

‡ See the Life of Eliot, p. 32.

§ Carte, History, vol. iv., p. 200.

* Parl. Hist., vol. viii., p. 151, &c. Rushworth, vol. i., p. 585-593.

† Life of Laud, p. 180.

‡ Life of Eliot, p. 20.

worthiness of Wentworth, pledged his own faith for him, and so increased for himself the bitterness of the present desertion. Feeling, therefore, in all its force, the truth of one of his own favourite thoughts, hatred now sprang into the place of his former love. The anecdote which dates the first terrible dawning of the change rests on the cautious authority of Doctor Welwood.* "There had been a long and intimate friendship," he says, "between Mr. Pym and Sir Thomas Wentworth, and they had gone hand and hand in the House of Commons. But when Sir Thomas Wentworth was upon making his peace with the court, he sent to Pym to meet him alone at Greenwich, where he began in a set speech to sound Mr. Pym about the dangers they were like to run by the courses they were in, and what advantages they might have if they would but listen to some offers which would probably be made them from the court. Pym, understanding his drift, stopped him short with this expression: You need not use all this art to tell me that you have a mind to leave us; but remember what I tell you: You are going to be undone; and remember also, that though you leave us now, I will never leave you while your head is upon your shoulders." Pym kept his word.

The desperate course of government by prerogative now began. Charles, while disrobing himself on the day of the Parliament's dissolution, passionately vowed that he would never put on those robes again; and, not content with a violent declaration of his reasons for the dissolution, issued a proclamation which forbade even the word Parliament to cross the lips of his people, since he who alone had the power of calling, continuing, and dissolving Parliaments, was the best judge when to assemble them, and now declared that though such an event might happen, it would only be after the country had evinced a better disposition, and the "vipers of the Commonwealth" had received their condign punishment, and "those who are misled by them had come to a better understanding of his majesty and themselves." With deep sorrow for the miseries which now, for a time, impended over England, and afflicted to the soul by the personal sufferings of many of his dearest friends, it may be yet supposed that Pym looked forward deliberately and undespairingly, since, if for no reason else, he had to keep the appointment he had made with Wentworth.

It will be necessary to sketch very briefly the measures by which the executive now sought to enslave the people.

The duties of tonnage and poundage, which Charles had solemnly pledged himself never to take but as a gift from his people, were rigorously extorted; warrants were issued by the council to seize the goods of all who attempted to land them without authority, and to detain them till the customs were paid; and orders were despatched to imprison all who attempted to recover their property by replevin. Richard Chambers—a name ever memorable among London citizens—courageously appealed from the vengeance of the council; but he was dragged into the Star Chamber, fined £2000, and doomed to imprisonment till he made various abject submissions: these he refused to make, and for twelve years he languished in prison, from which he was released a beggar. Various merchants made attempts to elude these measures by sending their goods beyond the seas; but nothing is so vigilant as tyranny, and the goods were seized in England, while unlimited orders were issued in consequence to search warehouses, and prevent what was denominated a fraud on the revenue.

Equally disgraceful were the taxes imposed for the support of muster-masters of the militia; coat and conduct money was also exacted, while soldiers were billeted as of old. But the grievance which out-Heroded all the rest was the revival of monopolies. This was carried to an extent which was truly appalling. Under the pretext, for instance, that certain persons had made discoveries in the manufacture of soap, and that the dealers in general imposed a bad article upon the people, these persons were erected into a corporation, and the right of the manufacture and sale of the commodity vested in them exclusively, they having paid ten thousand pounds for their patent, and rendered themselves liable to a tax of eight pounds per ton upon the sale. The original pretext, it may be easily supposed, was a lie, the commodity being, in fact, so adulterated as to ruin the clothes of the people. In the same manner, almost every article of ordinary consumption, whether of manufacture or not, was exposed to a similar abuse. Upon everything, no matter how insignificant, the fetters of monopoly were fixed. Salt, starch, coals, iron, wine, pens, cards and dice, beavers, felts, bone-lace, meat dressed in taverns, tobacco, wine-casks, brewing and distilling, lamprons, weighing of hay and straw in London and Westminster, gauging of red herrings, butter casks, kelp and seaweed, linen cloth, rags, hops, buttons, hats, gutstring, spectacles, combs, tobacco-pipes, saltpetre, gunpowder, down to the sole privilege of gathering of rags, were all subjected to monopolies, and consequently heavily taxed!

Some few of these shocking enormities may be illustrated by extracts from the Rev. Mr. Garrard's letters* to the lord-deputy. "Here is much ado," he writes on one occasion, "about the soap business; it is very doubtful whether in the end it will stand or no. For the present, it is strongly backed, and I hear a proclamation shall come forth to stop all mouths that speak against it. Commissioners have been appointed: the Lieutenant of the Tower, Sir William Becher, Sir Abraham Williams, Spiller, joined to the lord-mayor and some aldermen. They have had two general washing-days at Guildhall; most of them have given their verdict for the new soap to be the better; yet continual complaints rise up that it burns linen, scalds the laundress's fingers, wastes infinitely in keeping, being full of lime and tallow; which if true, it is of that use in this kingdom that it will not last. The lord-mayor of London, by the king's commandment, received a shrewd reprimand for his pusillanimity in this business, being afraid of a troop of women that clamorously petitioned him against the new soap: my lord-privy-seal, his brother-in-law, was to give it him at the board, and did very sharply.* "Here are two commissions afloat," he writes on another occasion, "which are attended diligently, which will bring, as it is conceived, a great sum of money to his majesty. The first, concerning the licensing of those who shall have a lease for life to sell tobacco in and about London, and so in all the boroughs and villages in England; fifteen pounds fine, and as much rent by the year. . . . The other is for buildings in and about London since a proclamation in the thirteenth of King James." In the cases of the latter, three years' rent, and "some little rent to the king" additional, was exacted by the commissioners as a composition for suffering the buildings to stand. "How far this will spread," Garrard adds, "I know not; but it is confidently spoken that there are above £100,000 rents upon this string about London. I speak much within compass. For Tuttle [Tothill], St. Giles's, St. Martin's Lane, Drury Lane, Covent Garden, Lincoln's Inn Fields, Holborn, and beyond the Tower from Wapping to Blackwall, all come in, and are liable to fining for annoyances, or being built contrary to proclamation, though they have had licenses granted to do so: my Lord of Bedford's license in this case, as it is said, will not avail him."† The first notice of coal as an article of export is made thus: "My Lords of Dorset and Holland have obtained a beneficial suit of the king, worth better than £1000 a year apiece to them, for seacoal exported." Then we are startled by the following: "We have very plausible things done of late. The book called the Declaration of the King's for rectifying of taverns, ordinaries, bakers, ostleries, is newly come forth. I'll say no more of it; your agent here will send it to your lordship. All back doors to taverns on the Thames are commanded to be shut up: only the Bear at the bridge-foot is exempted, by reason of the passage to Greenwich. To encourage gentlemen to live more willingly in the country, all game fowl, as pheasants, partridges, ducks, as also hares, are by proclamation forbidden to be dressed or eaten in any inns, and butchers are forbidden to be graziers."‡

* See Memorials of English Affairs, p. 46, 47.

* See Life of Strafford, p. 91.

The first introduction of hackney-coaches is next commemorated by Mr. Garrard: "Here is one Captain Bailey; he hath been a sea-captain, but now lives on the land about this city, where he tries experiments. He hath erected according to his ability some four hackney-coaches, put his men in a livery, and appointed them to stand at the Maypole in the Strand, giving them instructions at what rates to carry men into several parts of the town, where all day long they may be had. Other hackney-men seeing this way, they flocked to the same place, and perform their journeys at the same rate, so that sometimes there is twenty of them together, which disperse up and down, so that they and others are to be had anywhere." But now, within two short months of this date, during which time the plan, serving as a comfort and luxury to the great mass of the people,§ had succeeded to an extraordinary extent, we find Garrard mentioning "a proclamation coming forth about the reformation of hackney-coaches, and ordering of other coaches about London: nineteen hundred was the number of hackney-coaches of London, base lean jades, unworthy to be seen in so brave a city, or to stand about a king's court." Nothing that contributed, unencumbered by monopoly, to the comfort of the people, was permitted to continue! Again Garrard writes, "Here is a proclamation coming forth to prohibit all hackney-coaches to pass up and down in London streets; out of town they may go at pleasure, as heretofore. Also the attorney-general hath sent to all taverns to prohibit them to dress meat; somewhat was required of them—a halfpenny a quart for French wine, and a penny for sack and other richer wines, for the king; the gentlemen vintners grew sullen and would not give it, so they are well enough served."* No single thing escaped that had escaped monopoly: the monopolists only were allowed to thrive. Soon after the above we find Garrard mentioning "a project for carrying people up and down in close chairs, for the sole doing whereof Sir Sander Duncombe, a traveller, now a pensioner, hath obtained a patent from the king, and hath forty or fifty making ready for use." The next enormity which Garrard alludes to in his packets of news is monstrous indeed. "Here is at this present," he says, "a commission in execution against cottagers, who have not four acres of ground laid to their houses, upon a statute made the 31 Eliz., which vexeth the poor people mightily, all for the benefit of the Lord Morton, and the secretary of Scotland, the Lord Sterling: much crying out there is against it, especially because mean, needy, and men of no good fame, prisoners in the Fleet, are used as principal commissioners to call the people before them, to fine and compound with them."† Subsequently he remarks, "The taverns begin to victual again; some have got leave."‡ This said that the vintners within the city will give £6000 to the king to dress meat as they did before; and the suburbs will yield somewhat.§ Such illustrations, curious and valuable as they are, considering the source whence they proceed, and to whom they are addressed, might be largely indulged; but one more will serve. "Here," writes Garrard, "here are abundance of new projects on foot, upon seacoal, salt, malt, marking of iron, cutting of rivers, setting up a new corporation in the suburbs of London—much opposed by the Londoners and many others. Where profit may come to the king, let them pass; but to enrich private men, they have not my wishes. Discontinuance of Parliaments brings up this kind of grain, which commonly is blasted when they come."¶

And all these fearful outrages were committed upon the people, while there was probably not a single family in England, with the smallest share of education or intelligence, in whose house a copy of the famous PETITION OF RIGHT

* Stafford's Papers, vol. i., p. 507.

† Ibid., vol. i., p. 206.

‡ Ibid., vol. i., p. 176.

§ Rushworth has recorded that in the first year of Charles there were not above twenty coaches to be had for hire in and about London. "The grave judges of the law," he adds, "constantly rid on horseback, in all weathers, to Westminster."—Collections, vol. ii., p. 317.

* Stafford Papers, vol. i., p. 507.

† Ibid., vol. i., p. 117.

‡ Ibid., vol. i., p. 262.

§ Ibid., vol. ii., p. 55.

might not be found! But this consideration it was, beyond every other, that still sustained with the strongest hope, during the twelve terrible years' continuance of such outrages, such men as Pym and Hampden: 'It was this which, even while their friend Eliot sank to his death under the murderous vengeance of the court, and while others of their friends, as Noy, Digges, Littleton, and Glanville, crept over to the side of the public enemy—it was this which reassured them that least of all were they then to despair. The breath of God was not to be monopolized, neither was the petition of rights to be recalled.

In enforcement of the illegal patents and proclamations of the king, most grievous commissions also were granted, to one or two of which Garrard's correspondence has alluded. They were such, for instance, as a commission touching cottages and inmates; another about services; one for compounding with offenders for transporting butter; another for compounding with those who used or imported logwood; one to compound with sheriffs, and such as had been sheriffs, for selling under-sheriffs' places; another for compounding for the destruction of wood in iron works; another for concealments, and encroachments within twenty miles of London; and the list might be stretched indefinitely.

Nor had the resources of tyranny expended themselves here. Under the candid pretext of curing defects in titles of land, a proclamation was issued, proposing to grant new titles upon the payment of a reasonable composition; and all who declined to avail themselves of this general offer from the court were threatened, in no measured terms, with the loss of their property; nor, indeed, were such cases unfrequent. Many pretended flaws in titles were dragged into the courts, where a parcel of obsequious judges sat ready to establish the objections. Even the form of the judges' patents was changed to fix their slavish dependence more surely! The old clause, quandiu se bene gesserit was changed into durante bene placito, and the benefit of the first clause was even denied to one judge who had received his patent before the change, because he was thought too upright for the designs in hand.*

Other means, too, were adopted to bring the civil government of England into unison with these enormities. The jurisdiction and powers of the courts of Star Chamber and High Commission were enlarged to a most extraordinary degree. New illegal oaths were enforced, and new courts, with vast powers, erected without colour of law; and when commissions were issued for examining into the extent of fees that were complained of, the commissioners compounded with the delinquents, not only for their past offences, but their future extortions. Finally, the orders of the council board were received as positive law. Clarendon tells us that Finch, who, for his conduct in the late Parliament, had been promoted to the office of lord-keeper of the great seal, now boldly declared "that while he was keeper no man should be so saucy as to dispute orders of the council board, but that the wisdom of that board should be always ground enough for him to make a decree in chancery."

An extract from the same noble historian shall complete my sketch of the civil government of England at this period. "Supplemental acts of state were made to supply defect of laws; and so tonnage and poundage, and other duties upon merchandises, were collected by order of the board, which had been positively refused to be settled by act of Parliament, and new and greater impositions laid upon trade; obsolete laws were revived and vigorously executed, wherein the subject might be taught how unthrifty a thing it was, by too strict a detaining of what was his, to put the king as strictly to inquire what was his own. And by this ill husbandry the king received a vast sum of money from all persons of quality, or, indeed, of any reasonable condition, throughout the kingdom, upon the law of knighthood. And no less unjust projects of all kinds—many ridiculous, many scandalous, all very grievous—were set on foot, the envy and reproach of which came to the king, the profit to other men. To recompense the damage the crown sustained by the sale of the old lands and by the grant of new pensions, the old laws of the forest were revived, by which not only great fines were imposed, but great annual rents intended, and like to be settled by way of contract; which burden lighted most upon persons of quality and honour, who thought themselves above ordinary oppressions, and were, therefore, like to remember it with more sharpness. For the better support of these extraordinary ways, and to protect the agents and instruments who must be employed in them, and to discountenance and suppress all bold inquirers and opposers, the council table and Star Chamber enlarged their jurisdictions to a vast extent, 'holding' (as Thucydides said of the Athenians) 'for honourable that which pleased, and for just that which profited;' and being the same persons in several rooms, grew both courts of law to determine rights, and courts of revenue to bring money into the treasury—the council table by proclamations enjoining to the people what was not enjoined by the law, and prohibiting that which was not prohibited, and the Star Chamber censuring the breach, and disobedience to those proclamations, by very great fines and imprisonment, so that any disrespect to acts of state, or to the persons of statesmen, was in no time more penal, and those foundations of right, by which men valued their security, to the apprehension and understanding of wise men, never more in danger to be destroyed."* The reader will scarcely conceive this picture capable of aggravation; but the noble historian afterward proceeds, very dryly, to tell how the people chiefly borne down by these terrible measures were Protestants, while the Papists were not only encouraged, but protected, as the chief promoters of the mischief. "They grew," he says,

* See May's History, p. 17. Hut. Mem., vol. i., p. 132. Whitelocke's Memorials, p. 16. For the various authorities in support of the text, see Mr. Brodie (Hist. of Brit. Emp., vol. ii., p. 275-286); also Rushworth, throughout his first and third volumes of Collections; Old Parl. Hist., vol. ix., p. 62, et seq.; Hilyard's Case; Clarendon's Life, p. 37, 73; May's History; Aikin's Charles the First; and Strafford's Letters.

* Hist. of Rebellion, vol. i., p. 119-122.

"not only secret contrivers, but public professed promoters of, and ministers in, the most grievous projects; as that of soap, formed, framed, and executed by almost a corporation of that religion, which, under that license and notion, might be, and were suspected to be, qualified for other agitations." No wonder the Roman Catholics were hated! It is to be added, that whatever trifling fragments of law or protection might be supposed to remain to the people still, were utterly swept away from a long line of northern counties by the terrible administration of the presidency of the North.

Yet the king continued poor! His advocate has hinted a justification of him in the extract just given, to the effect that while the reproach of these monstrous extortions came to him, the profit went to other men; but this is much more in the nature of an aggravation. When Charles found that the case was so, it served him only as a better excuse for breaking down the spirit of the people by still heavier burdens. What Clarendon has said is indeed quite true, that the tax upon the community was infinitely beyond what came into the Exchequer. For the monopoly of wine, for instance, the king received only £38,000 per annum; but then the vintners paid 40s. per tun to the patentees, which, upon 45,000 tuns, raised the tax to £90,000. The vintners, again, imposed 2d. per quart, which raised it to £8 per tun, or £360,000—nearly twelve times as much as went into the Exchequer.* And so with other impositions. The difficulties of the court, therefore, in the disastrous career they had entered on, were only becoming, day by day, more imminent, when the famous invention of Mr. Attorney-general Noy† came in to give a longer lease to tyranny, and make more fatal its final redemption.

"Lastly" (I again avail myself of the language of Lord Clarendon), "for a spring and magazine that should have no bottom, and for an everlasting supply of all occasions, a writ was framed in a form of law, and directed to the sheriff of every county of England, 'to provide a ship of war for the king's service, and to send it, amply fitted and provided, by such a day to such a place;' and with that writ were sent to each sheriff instructions that,

* See the Old Parl. Hist., vol. ix., p. 62, et seq.

† "He was a man," says Dr. Heylyn, in his Life of Land, p. 301, "extremely well versed in old records, with which consulting frequently in the course of his studies, he had excerpted and laid by many notes and precedents for the king's levying of such naval aid upon the subjects, by his own authority, whenever the preservation and safety of the kingdom did require it of them; which notes and precedents, taken as they came in his way, on small pieces of paper (most of them no bigger than one's hand), he kept in the coffin of a pye, which had been sent him by his mother, and kept there till the mouldiness and corruptibility had perished many of his papers." The singularity of Noy's manners gives colour to this story. I cannot resist subjoining another anecdote, which seems a proof, in a certain sort, that Noy winced a little under his new position, after, as his friends used to say, "he was bewitched to become the king's." When created attorney-general, a messenger, as usual, was sent to attend on him; but, after enduring his presence with very angry scowls for a few days, Noy could not bear it any longer. He ordered him to get home and hide himself, "lest the people, who have always seen me walk free and alone, should fancy me a state prisoner." See Wood's Ath. Oxon., vol. ii., p. 582. Noy died soon after his discoveries in the matter of ship-money, and they were wonderfully improved upon by Finch: see Hallam's Const. Hist., vol. ii., p. 16-21. For admirable characters of Noy and Finch, see Clarendon's Hist., vol. i., p. 129-131.

'instead of a ship, he should levy upon his county such a sum of money, and return the same to the treasurer of the navy for his majesty's use, with direction in what manner he should proceed against such as refused;' and from hence that tax had the denomination of SHIP-MONEY; a word of lasting sound in the memory of this kingdom, by which for some years really accrued the yearly sum of £200,000 to the king's coffers; and it was, in truth, the only project that was accounted to his own service."

A lively illustration of the manner in which this tax was worked will be supplied by one or two extracts from Garrard's letters to the Lord-deputy of Ireland. In one letter* he writes, "In my last I advertised your lordship that the Mayor of London received some reprimand for being so slow in giving answer to the writ sent into the city about the shipping business; afterward the city council were called before the Lords, and received some gentle check, or, rather, were admonished to take heed how they advised the city in a case so clear for the king, wherein his majesty had first advised with his learned counsel and with his council of state. It wrought this effect, that they all yielded, and instantly fell to seizing in all the wards of London. It will cost the city at least £35,000. They hoist up the merchant strangers, Sir William Curtrey, £360; Sir Thomas Cuttcale, £300: great sums to pay at one tax, and we know not how often it may come. It reaches us in the Strand, being within the liberties of Westminster, which furnisheth out one ship. My Lord of Bedford, £60; my Lord of Salisbury, £25; my Lord of Clare, £40; the lord-keeper and lord-treasurer, £20 apiece: may, lodgers, for I am set at 40s. Giving subsidies in Parliament, I was well content to pay to, which now hath brought me into this tax; but I tell my Lord Cottington that I had rather give and pay ten subsidies in Parliament than 10s. this new-old way of dead Noy's. Letters are also gone down to the high sheriffs of the maritime counties to quicken them. Have you heard the answer given by a great lord that hath been a judge? 'Tis true this writ hath not been used when tonnage and poundage was granted, now 'tis not, but taken by prerogative, ergo, this writ is now in full force." On a subsequent occasion he writes, "The sheriff of Sussex sent up to the Lords to receive their farther directions what he was to do, giving them information that seven or eight poor towns in that county stood out, and would not pay towards the shipping. But as soon as they heard that the sheriff, by a new command, began to distrain, they came roundly in and paid their money."† The lord-deputy speedily corrected his correspondent's complaints about the tax, having furnished the court with his opinion that it was "the greatest service the legal profession had done the crown in his time;" while he added, "but unless his majesty hath the like power declared to raise a land army upon the same exigent of state, the crown seems to me to stand but upon one leg at home, to be considerable but by halves to foreign princes abroad; yet sure this, methinks, convinces a power for the sovereign to raise payments for land forces, and consequently submits to his wisdom and ordinance the transporting of the money or men into foreign states, so to carry, by way of prevention, the fire from ourselves into the dwellings of our enemies (an art which Edward III. and Henry V. well understood); and if, by degrees, Scotland and Ireland be drawn to contribute their proportions to these levies for the public, omne tulit punctum. Well fortified," Wentworth continued, "this piece forever vindicates the royalty at home from under the conditions and restraints of subjects, and renders us also, abroad, even to the greatest kings, the most considerable monarchy in Christendom."* Stimulated thus, the court partially extended their views that way, and, advancing gradually from the maritime districts, levied the hated tax upon almost every man in England. "For home news," Garrard writes in one of his subsequent letters,† "the shipping business goes on currently all over England, so 'tis apprehended at court. Some petitions have been offered to the king from poor towns, which he hath referred to his council." Again: "The Londoners have not been so forward in collecting the ship-money, since they have been taught to sing Hey-down-derry, and many of them will not pay till after imprisonment, that it may stand upon record they were forced to it. The assessments have been wonderful unequal and unproportionable, which is very ill taken, it being conceived they did it on purpose to raise clamour through the city." And again, he writes, "Your lordship is very right, that there is no reason all public works should be put upon the crown. And yet you see how unwilling the people are to contribute to any, be it never so honourable or necessary for themselves. Witness the ship-money, which at this very present ending of the term is under argument in the Exchequer chamber before all the judges, brought thither upon a case of Mr. Hambden's, as I think; but I am sure, either upon a case of his or the Lord Say's. So have you the greatest news of the time."

* Stratford Papers, vol. i., p. 358.

† Ibid., vol. i., p. 372.

Great news this was indeed! Many men had resisted ship-money; many poor men had been flung into prison for refusing to pay it, and lay there languishing and unknown; many rich men had vainly stirred themselves against it; but at last, in the person of Hampden, the popular party prepared to make their final and resolved resistance, and in his great name all the renown of that resistance has been absorbed.‡

Pym and St. John were Hampden's close counsellors in the interval before the public trial, and six months were passed in preparations on both sides. At last, after a display of extraordinary learning and power on the part of St. John, till then almost unknown in the courts, and a scarcely less remarkable exhibition of venal prostitution of research on the part of the crown lawyers, judgment was pronounced in favour of ship-money, and against the illustrious defendant, by nine out of the twelve judges. Of the three dissentients—Hutton,* Croke, and Denham—Croke would also have given judgment for the crown, had not his wife, a lady of eminent piety and a truly heroic spirit, sustained his sinking virtue. "She told him," says Whitelocke,† "she hoped he would do nothing against his conscience, for fear of any danger or prejudice to her or his family; and that she would be contented to suffer want, or any misery with him, rather than be the occasion for him to do or say anything against his judgment or conscience."

Lord Clarendon observes that this decision "proved of more advantage and credit to the gentleman condemned than to the king's service. Men before," he adds, "pleased themselves with doing somewhat for the king's service, as a testimony of their affection, which they were not bound to do;‡ many really believing the necessity, and therefore thinking the burden reasonable. But when they heard this demanded in a court of law as a right, and found it, by sworn judges of the law, adjudged so, upon such grounds and reasons as every stander-by was able to swear was not law, and so had lost the pleasure and delight of being kind and dutiful to the king; and instead of giving were required to pay, and by a logic that left no man anything which he might call his own; when they saw in a court of law (that law that gave them title to, and possession of, all that they had) reasons of state urged as elements of law, judges as sharp-sighted as secretaries of state, and in

* Hutton was a friend of Lord Wentworth's, and addressed a long and curious letter to him, exculpatory of the honest course he pursued on this question. I subjoin a characteristic extract from the lord-deputy's reply: "Considering it is agreed by common consent that in time of public danger and necessity such a levy may be made, and that the king is therein sole judge how or in what manner or proportion it is to be gathered, I conceive it was out of humour opposed by Hambden, beyond the modesty of a subject, and that reverence wherein we ought to have so gracious a sovereign; it being ever to be understood, the prospects of kings into mysteries of state are so far exceeding those of ordinary common persons, as they are able to discern and prevent dangers to the public afar off, which others shall not so much as dream of till they feel the unavoidable stripes and smart of them upon their naked shoulders; besides, the mischief which threatens states and people are not always those which become the object of every vulgar eye, but then commonly of most danger when least discovered—nay, very often, if unseasonably over early published, albeit privately known to the king long before, might rather inflame than remedy the evil; therefore it is a safe rule for us all, in the fear of God, to remit these supreme watches to that regal power, whose peculiar indeed it is; submit ourselves in these high considerations to his ordinance, as being no other than the ordinance of God itself; and rather attend upon his will, with confidence in his justice, belief in his wisdom, assurance in his parental affections to his subjects and kingdoms, than feed ourselves with the curious questions, with the vain flatteries of imaginary liberty, which, had we even our silly wishes and conceits, were we to frame a new Commonwealth even to our own fancy, might yet, in conclusion, leave ourselves less free, less happy than now, thanks be to God and his majesty, we are, nay, ought justly to be, reputed by every moderate-minded Christian."

† Memorials, p. 25.

‡ But they were, before the decision, bound to obey the tax, and that by sharper conditions than attended any other levy. These and other expressions of Lord Clarendon in the extract are artful misrepresentations, easily seen through: the extract is very valuable evidence, notwithstanding.

* Strafford Papers, vol. ii., p. 61, 62.

† Ibid., vol. i., p. 468.

‡ It may be observed, at the same time, that doubtless the court party were to be consulted as to the choice of a person in whose case the right of resistance was to be decided, since up to this period, when refusers of ship-money had gone before the courts, the judges on circuit had overruled, or declined to entertain, any plea founded on the assumed illegality of the imposition, and thus the question of right had remained undecided. Unable, however, to resist any longer the demand for a settlement of the question, it is probable that the king's party thought that, in its progress, the "affability and temper" of Hampden as an opponent would serve them best. It is certain that Lord Say and Sele was distinctly refused a trial.

the mysteries of state, judgment of law grounded upon matter of fact, of which there was neither inquiry nor proof, and no reasons given for the tax in question but what included the estates of all the standers-by, they no more looked upon it as the case of one man, but the case of the kingdom, nor as an imposition laid upon them by the king, but by the judges, which they thought themselves bound in conscience to the public justice not to submit to." In other words, the event justified the policy of the leaders of the people, and they now quietly resumed their former position, hopeful and determined. Laud soon wrote to Wentworth that the "faction are grown very bold, and the king's moneys come in a great deal more slowly than they did in former years, and that to a very considerable sum;"* and Whitelocke closes his description of the proceedings with these words: "Hampden and many others of quality and interest in their counties were unsatisfied with the judgment, and continued, with the utmost of their power, in opposition to it, yet could not at that time give any other stop or hindrance; but it remained altâ mente repostum."

Leaving it thus, for a time, in the minds of Pym and Hampden, it is now necessary—in completion of such a sketch of the present government of England as will be thought essential to a right judgment of the exertions of Pym's latter life—that I should slightly revert to Laud's administration of religious affairs. It was frightfully consistent with the view that has been furnished of the condition of civil matters. The barbarous punishment of Leighton,† the Scotch divine; the cruel persecution of Balmerino‡ at Edinburgh; the shocking severities that were practised upon Prynne, Burton, and Bastwick,§ need only be alluded to to

* Strafford Papers, vol. ii., p. 170.

† See Rushworth, vol. ii., p. 55; Whitelocke, p. 15; Neal, vol. i., p. 547; and see Laud's Diary for November 16, 1630.

‡ See Carte, vol. iv., p. 222. State Trials, vol. iii., &c.

§ See Laud's Diary; Neal's History of the Puritans; Rushworth, vol. ii., p. 220, et seq. Heylin's Life of Laud, 249, &c. Garrard writes to Lord Wentworth: "Some few days after the end of the term, in the palace-yard two pillories were erected, and there the sentence of Star Chamber against Burton, Bastwick, and Prynne was executed: they stood two hours in the pillory; Burton by himself, being degraded in the High Commission Court three days before. The place was full of people, who cried and howled terribly, especially when Burton was crompt. Dr. Bastwick was very merry: his wife, Dr. Poe's daughter, got a stool, and kissed him; his ears being cut off, she called for them, and put them in a clean handkerchief, and carried them away with her. Bastwick told the people, the lords had collar-days at court, but this was his collar-day, rejoicing much in it. Since, warrants are sent from the lords to the sheriffs of the several counties where they are to be imprisoned, to receive them and see them placed. Also Dr. Layton, homo ejusdem farinae, censured seven years since, and now prisoner in the Fleet, is removed to some remote prison of the kingdom." From that prison Leighton was not released till ten years after, when he had lost sight, hearing, and the use of his limbs! Another of the lord-deputy's correspondents had before described the mutilation of Prynne: "No mercy showed to Prynne: he stood in the pillory, and lost his first ear in a pillory in the palace at Westminster in full term, his other in Cheapside; where, while he stood, his volumes were burned under his nose, which had almost suffocated him." Lastly, Laud himself wrote thus to Wentworth: "I have done expecting of throw on this side, and therefore shall betake myself to that which you say, and I believe, is the next best; and yet I would not give over neither. But what can you think of throw where there shall be such slips in business of consequence? What say you to it that Prynne and his followers should be suffered to talk what they pleased recall the horror and disgust with which their sufferings have passed into history. The very name of toleration was banished from England. A refusal to attend divine worship in the parish church was, in all persons, without exception, punished in the first instance by fine, and on a repetition of such refusal by transportation. Popish recusants, indeed, were allowed to compound for these penalties by a heavy annual payment; and the celebration of mass, though illegal, was connived at; but no similar indulgence was extended to the religious services of Protestant dissenters. The dissenting ministers, in point of fact, did not yet form a distinct class; they were, with very rare exceptions, ordained and benefited clergy of the English Church; and being thus lawfully subject to the authority of their diocesan, the means of detecting and punishing their deviations from conformity were easy and obvious. Accordingly, from Laud they found no quarter. At the thought of every episcopal visitation the clergy groaned and trembled. Lecturers were peremptorily silenced; domestic chaplains in the houses of private gentlemen punished, and their patrons ordered to attend their parish churches; while the parochial clergy, where non-conformable, were fined, suspended, in some cases deprived, and ultimately, in very many instances, driven out of England with the more zealous of their followers, happy to escape without some mutilation of their persons, for scarcely a sitting of the Star Chamber passed without its victim, and its consequent exhibition, in the public streets, of some scene of bloody human agony! On one occasion, while Lilburne and Wharton, after having suffered a severe whipping, were standing exposed in the pillory, news was carried to the Star Chamber that Wharton, unsilenced by his suffering or his shame, was scattering pamphlets about and haranguing the mob; and the court, happening to be sitting at the moment, made an order that he should be gagged, and the order was executed instantly! Prynne, having had his old ears stitched to his head, "relapsed," as Garrard expresses it, "into new errors," and again suffered a mutilation of the fragments! Meanwhile, the language of Wentworth and Laud held out no hope of change. "Go it as it shall please God with me," wrote Wentworth, "believe me, my lord, I will be still thorough and thoroughout, one and the same.* The cure of this grievous and over-spreading leprosy is, in my weak judgment, to be effected rather by corrosives than lenitives; less than thorough will not overcome it: there is a cancerous malignity in it, which must be cut forth!"

What wonder if, in the midst of all this frightful despotism over the property and consciences of men, large numbers of the English people now sent their thoughts across the wide Atlantic towards the New World that had risen beyond its waters! Such were the gloomy apprehensions and terrors with which the Old World was filled, that only two alternatives while they stood in the pillory, and win acclamations from the people, and have notes taken of what they spake, and those notes spread in written copies about the city, and that when they went out of town to their several imprisonments, there were thousands suffered to be upon the way to take their leave, and God knows what else!"

* Strafford Papers, vol. i., p. 298.

indeed now seemed to many persons to remain : that, as May expresses it,* "Things carried so far on in a wrong way must needs either enslave themselves and posterity forever, or require a vindication so sharp and smarting as that the nation would groan under it." Too weak to contemplate the last alternative, and too virtuous to submit to the first, crowds of victims† to the tyranny of Church and State now accordingly left their homes and their country, willing to encounter any sufferings, privations, and dangers in the distant wilderness they sought, because of the one sole hope they had, that there, at least, would be found some rest and refuge for liberty, for religion, for humanity!

So extensive, however, did the emigration threaten to become, that Laud thought it necessary to interfere at last, and—with a refinement of tyranny of which, it has been truly said, the annals of persecution afford few equally strong examples—to seek to deprive the conscientious sufferers of that last and most melancholy of all resources, a rude, and distant, and perpetual exile. On the 1st of May, 1638, eight ships bound for New England, and filled with Puritan families, were arrested in the Thames by an order in council. It has been a very popular "rumour of history," that among the passengers in one of those vessels were Pym, Hampden, Cromwell, and Hazelrig.

Were this anecdote authentic, the hand of fate had been visible upon Charles indeed! But there is no good authority‡ for it, and it is deficient in all the moral evidences of truth. The mind cannot bring itself to imagine the spirits of such men as these yielding so easily to the despair of country; and at this moment Hampden was the "argument of all tongues" for his resistance to ship-money, while to Pym the vision of the fatal meeting to which he had summoned Wentworth now became daily more and more distinct. Nor are we wanting of absolute circumstances of proof, obvious enough to me, of the utter incorrectness of the statement. In the same part of Rushworth's Collections where the original order is to be found, a subsequent proclamation may be seen also, wherein, after stating the seizure of the ships, the following passage occurs: "Howbeit, upon the humble petition of the merchants, passengers, and owners of the ships now bound for New England, and upon the reasons by them represented to the board, his majesty was graciously pleased to free them from their late restraint, to proceed in their intended voyage."§ So that, in fact, there is no reason for supposing that all who had embarked for New England on board the eight ships alluded to did not proceed to New England. No doubt they did so.

The anecdote in question, however, is not without ground of a certain kind. Some years before its date, the attention of the leading men among the patriots had been strongly directed to the subject of the colonization of part of the North American Continent, with a view to its affording a refuge of safety and comfort to such of their party or their families as the sad troubles which impended over England might force from their homes. The subject had occupied even Eliot's thoughts in his prison, as a passage from one of Hampden's letters to him may serve to show. "The paper of considerations concerning the Plantation might be very safely conveyed to me by this hand, and after transcribing, should be as safely returned, if you vouchsafe to send it to me."* The result of all this consideration of the subject was the purchase of a large grant of land in the name of Lord Brook, and Lord Say and Sele; and in 1635, according to Horace Walpole, these two lords "sent over Mr. George Fenwick to prepare a retreat for them and their friends, in consequence of which a little town was built, and called by their joint names Saybrooke."† Now in this scheme there can be little doubt that Hampden was concerned; and I have found certain evidence, in Garrard's letters to Lord Strafford, that Pym was a party to it. "Our East India Company," writes that indefatigable newsmonger, "have this week two ships come home, which a little revives them. The traders also into the Isle of Providence, who are the Earl of Warwick, the Lord Say, the Lord Mandeville, the Lord Brook, Sir Benjamin Rudyard, Mr. Pym, and others, have taken a prize, sent home worth £15,000 by virtue of letters of marque granted to the planters there by his majesty for some injuries done them by the Spaniard."‡ The date of this letter is December, 1637; and from that date, as the prospects of the court darkened, the hopes of Pym and Hampden must have grown with the passage of every day.

Time and fate soon pressed in hard, indeed, upon the government of Charles. Driven to the close of every expedient, his last hope centred in the Lord-deputy of Ireland, and Wentworth's capacity and vigour had now twice restored the court finances and paid the king's debts. Ruin again impended, when Laud, as if to dash at once into the gulf, made a desperate attempt to impose the yoke of the Common Prayer Book upon the Scotch people. A fool might have seen the result, and indeed one fool did see it, and was whipped for his folly. I do not know that it has been remarked before, but the disgrace of the famous Archy, the jester of Charles I., took place at this time. "Archy is fallen into a great misfortune," writes a letter of the time. "A fool he would be, but a fool-mouthed knave he hath proved himself; being in a tavern in Westminster, drunk, he saith himself, he was speaking of the Scottish

* History of the Long Parliament, p. 17.

† "The plantations of Ormond and Clare," writes Laud to Wentworth at this time, "are a marvellous great work for the honour and profit of the king and safety of that kingdom, and you have done very nobly to follow that business so close; but I am sorry to read in your letters that you want men extremely to fill that work; and this is the more considerable a great deal, that you should want men in Ireland, and that, the while, there should be here such a universal running to New England, and God knows whither; but this it is, when men think nothing is their advantage but to run from government. As for your being left alone in the envious and thorny part of the work, that is no news at least to me, who am forced to the like here, scarce a man appearing where the way is rough indeed."

‡ The only known authorities are Dr. George Bates and Dugdale, both zealous Royalists, and, on this point, quite beneath consideration.

§ See Rushworth, vol. ii., p. 409, and see Aikin's Charles, vol. i., p. 473.

* Eliot MSS. in Lord Eliot's possession.

† See Walpole's Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors, vol. ii., p. 352, ed. Park.

‡ Strafford Papers, vol. ii., p. 140.

business, he fell a railing on my Lord of Canterbury, said he was a monk, a rogue, and a traitor. Of this his grace complained at council, the king being present: it was ordered he should be carried to the porter's lodge, his coat pulled over his ears, and kicked out of the court, never to enter within the gates, and to be called into the Star Chamber. The first part is done, but my Lord of Canterbury hath interceded to the king that there it should end. There is a new fool in his place, Muckle John, but he will never be so rich, for he cannot abide money." This last must have seemed a fool indeed!

The affairs of Scotland belong to general history, and require only a brief mention here. Suffice it, then, to say, that after several months' alternation of persecution and negotiations, the Scottish people remained firm. Most truly has it been said of the conduct of the Covenanters, that the display they now made of fearless purpose, and even of fearless reason; of unwearied, unwinking energy and sagacity; of ardour without violence, and enthusiasm without extravagance, has done imperishable honour to the Scottish character. Why should it be denied that Pym, Hampden, and others of the English opposition placed themselves immediately in communication with those men? It stands upon the authority of Whitelocke, and may not be denied. With the dawning of the fierce opposition in Scotland to the frightful tyranny of conscience attempted by Laud, sprang up the consummation of the hopes entertained during twelve long years of oppression by Pym and Hampden, that a day for the liberties of England would still come. Let the friends of Charles I. make what use of the admission they please, it is quite certain that at the London meetings of the Scotch commissioners from the Covenant, headed by Lords Loudon and Dumferling, not only Pym and Hampden took an active part, but also Lords Essex, Holland, Bedford, and Say.

Meanwhile Lord Wentworth stood by the side of Charles in England, and a war was resolved upon against the Scottish people. The lord-deputy's unparalleled exertions at this period have been already described,* but the silent efforts of Pym and Hampden flung them powerless back, and all the attempts at loans and ship-money levies now fell flat to the ground. The strong spirit of hope was in truth again gone forth among all classes of men, and that word which had been proscribed by Charles twelve years before, was again heard as a familiar word in England.

A Parliament, it was resolved, should be instantly summoned. Wentworth was created Lord Strafford; returned to Ireland as lord-lieutenant; called a Parliament there; procured a large sum of money from them, with a farther offer of "their persons and estates," if required; and in the beginning of April returned to England. The example of the Irish Parliament would, it was vainly hoped, influence the Parliament of England. Meanwhile, the elections for members had been concluded without a single demonstration of tumult in any part of the country; and on the 3d of April, 1640, the king opened the houses in person, and in the midst of a larger number of members of the Commons than had ever been known to assemble on the first day of the session. His speech was equally short and ungracious. "My lords and gentlemen," he said, "there never was a king that had a more great and weighty cause to call his people together than myself: I will not trouble you with the particulars. I have informed my lord-keeper, and command him to speak, and desire your attention."* The lord-keeper's speech was in the absurdest strain of high prerogative. He observed that "his majesty's kingly resolutions were seated in the ark of his sacred breast, and it were a presumption of too high a nature for any Uzzah uncalled to touch it; yet," he continued, "the king is now pleased to lay by the shining beams of majesty, as Phœbus did to Phaeton, that the distance between sovereignty and subjection should not bar you from that filial freedom of access to his person and councils; only let us beware how, like the son of Clymene, we aim not at the guiding of the chariot." He proceeded subsequently to say, "that his majesty did not expect advice from them, much less that they should interpose in any office of mediation, which would not be grateful to him; but that they should, as soon as might be, give his majesty a supply, and that he would give them time enough afterward to represent any grievances to him."†

"The House," proceeds Lord Clarendon, who on this occasion made his first entrance into the House of Commons as Edward Hyde, member for the borough of Wootton-Basset, "met always at eight of the clock, and rose at twelve, which were the old Parliament hours, that the committees, upon whom the greatest burden of business lay, might have the afternoons for their preparation and despatch. It was not the custom to enter upon any important business during the first fortnight, both because many members used to be absent so long, and that time was usually thought necessary for the appointment and nomination of committees, and for other ceremonies and preparations that were usual; but there was no regard now to that custom; and the appearance of the members was very great, there having been a large time between the issuing out of the writs and the meeting of the Parliament, so that all elections were made and returned, and everybody was willing to fall to the work."‡

A leader only was wanting; and in this great position, by the common consent of all, Pym now placed himself. As he looked round the seats, crowded as they were with members, what gaps must have appeared in them to him! The line of his early friends and associates was broken indeed. "The long intermission of Parliament," observes Clarendon, "had worn out most of those who had been acquainted with the rules and orders observed in those conventions." Sir Edward Coke and Sir Robert Philips were dead now, and Sir John Eliot

* Rushworth, vol. iii. (part second), p. 1114. Rushworth was appointed, this session, clerk-assistant to the House of Commons. † See Clarendon, vol. i., p. 233.

‡ Clarendon's History, vol. i., p. 235-234.
 § "Sir Robert Philips," wrote Garrard to the lord-deputy on the 10th of May, 1638, "Sir Robert Philips, your old acquaintance, has died of a cold—choked with phlegm."—Strafford Papers, vol. ii., p. 164.

* See Life of Strafford, p. 117.

had perished in his prison. But it was a great and redeeming consolation to Pym that Hampden still sat by his side, and that up to the close of their illustrious career the most intimate private friendship henceforth united them even more closely, if that were possible, than the great public objects they pursued in common. Hitherto Hampden had been "rather of reputation in his own country than of public discourse or fame in the kingdom;" but the business of ship-money had made him the argument of all tongues; and to the toils and perils of public life he now, by Pym's side, entirely devoted himself. He brought up all his family to London from their seat in Buckinghamshire, which only at a few chance intervals he ever saw again; and it is an additional proof of the close intimacy I speak of, that henceforward they lived in lodgings near Pym's house,* which was then in Gray's Inn Lane, until the commencement of the following Parliament, when Pym having changed his residence to Westminster, Hampden removed there also.† Before the meeting of the present Parliament, I should also mention, they had ridden together through several of the English counties, less with the view, as Anthony à Wood states, of "promoting elections of the Puritanical brethren," than of urging the people to meet and send petitions to the House of Commons as soon as possible after it had assembled. Petitioning Parliament was first organized thus, as a system, by Pym and Hampden. The result was sensibly felt the day after the delivery of the king's speech, when several county members rose and presented petitions from their respective counties,‡ complaining of ship-money projects and monopolies, the Star Chamber and High Commission courts, and other heavy grievances. Hence—though the king had, at the close of the lord-keeper's speech the day before, distinctly asked of the House that they should proceed at once to the consideration of the Scotch business with a view to supplies, and for this purpose had specially ordered the lord-keeper's speech and his own to be entered on the journals—even the Royalist members of the House could not but recognise, after the presentation of such a series of petitions from the people they represented, a certain sort of "divided duty." This was exactly the occasion Pym had sought, and he availed himself of it.

"While men gazed upon each other," says Lord Clarendon, "looking who should begin (much the greater part having never before sat in Parliament), Mr. Pym, a man of good reputation,§ but much better known afterward, who had been as long in those assemblies as any man then living, brake the ice; and in a set discourse of above two hours, after mention of the king with profound reverence, and commendation of his wisdom and justice, he observed, 'that by the long intermission of Parliaments many unwarrantable things had been practised, notwithstanding the great virtue of his majesty;' and then enumerated all the projects which had been set on foot; all the illegal proclamations which had been published, and the proceedings which had been upon those proclamations; the judgment upon ship-money, and many grievances which related to the ecclesiastical jurisdiction; summing up shortly and sharply all that most reflected upon the prudence and justice of the government, and concluding 'that he had only laid that scheme before them that they might see how much work they had to do to satisfy their country, the method and manner of the doing whereof he left to their wisdoms.' " To this may be added the characteristic description given by May, the historian of the Long Parliament: "Master Pym, a grave and religious gentleman, in a long speech of almost two hours, recited a catalogue of the grievances which at that time lay heavy on the Commonwealth, of which many abbreviated copies, as extracting the heads only, were with great greediness taken by gentlemen, and others throughout the kingdom, for it was not then in fashion to print speeches of Parliament."

The effect of this speech was so extraordinary throughout England, that it has been made matter of general comment with all the historians of the period. The only reference they are able to give, however, is to the abstract supplied by Rushworth;* and this seemed to me to be so unsatisfactory a version, that I commenced a search among the pamphlets at the British Museum, in the hope that some publication of a speech that had produced such results, and which might possibly have taken place with Pym's authority, had escaped the notice of the indefatigable collector. This hope was not disappointed; and some extensive extracts shall now be laid before the reader, from a report which received the subsequent correction of Pym himself. These extracts are remarkable on every account: they do not simply illustrate the period better than any laboured history can; they will be found to mark, also, most emphatically, a certain grave and subdued style and manner in the speaker, which singularly contrasts with his tone at the meeting of the Parliament that followed. It is as though he spoke—and doubtless he did speak—with the thorough knowledge that, as the present Parliament had been called by the king, the next was to be forced into existence by the people. The report is given in the third person, and opens thus:

"Never Parliament had greater businesses to dispatch, nor more difficulties to encounter; therefore wee have reason to take all advantages of order and adresse, and hereby wee shall not only doe our owne worke, but dispose and inable ourselves for the better satisfaction of his majestie's desire of supply. The grievances being removed, our affections will carry us with speede and cheerefulness, to give his majestie that which may be sufficient both for his honour and support. Those that in the very first place shall endeavour to redresse the grievances, will be found not to hinder, but to be the best furtherers of his majestie's service. Hee that takes away weights doth as much advantage motion as he that addeth wings. Divers pieces of this maine worke have beene already proposed; his endeavour should be to present

* See Lord Nugent's Memorials of Hampden, vol. i., p. 206.

† Rushworth, vol. iii., p. 1131.

‡ Whitelocke thus describes him: "Master Pym, an ancient gentleman of great experience in Parliamentary affairs, and no less known fidelity to his country."

§ See Clarendon's Life.

* Vol. iii., p. 1131. Old. Parl. Hist., vol. viii., p. 425.

to the House a modell of the whole. In the creation, God made the world according to that idea or forme which was eternally pre-existent in the divine minde. Moses was commanded to frame the tabernacle after the patterne shewed him in the mount. Those actions are seldom well perfected in the execution which are not first well moulded in the designe and proposition."

In such passages as these, for abundance of argument, and weight, no less than closeness of reasoning, the eloquence of Pym approaches to the more deliberate compositions of Lord Bacon.

"He said he would labour to contract those manifold affaires, both of the Church and State, which did so earnestly require the wisdom and faithfulness of this House, into a double method of grievances and cures. And because there wanted not some who pretended that these things wherewith the Commonwealth is now grieved are much for the advantage of the king, and that the redresse of them will be to his majestie's great disadvantage and losse (hee said), he doubted not but to make it appeare that in discovering the present great distempers and disorders, and procuring remedie for them, we should bee no lesse serviceable to his majestie, who hath summoned us to this great councill, than usefull to those whom we doe here represent. For the better effecting whereof he propounded three maine branches of his discourse. In the first (he said) he would offer them the severall heads of some principall grievances under which the kingdome groaned. In the second he undertook to prove that the disorders from whence those grievances issued were as hurtfull to the king as to the people. In the third he would advise such a way of healing and removing those grievances as might bee equally effectuall to maintaine the honour and greatnesse of the king, and to procure the prosperitie and contentment of the people.

"In the handling whereof he promised to use such expressions as might mitigate the sharpnesse and bitterness of those things whereof he was to speake, so far as his duty and faithfulness would allow. It is a great prerogative to the king, and a great honour attributed to him, in a maxime of our law, that he can doe no wrong; he is the fountaine of justice; and, if there be any injustice in the execution of his commands, the law casts it upon the ministers, and frees the king. Activitie, life, and vigour are conveyed into the subluary creatures by the influence of Heaven; but the malignitie and distemper, the cause of so many epidemicall diseases, doe proceed from the noysome vapours of the earth, or some ill affected qualities of the aire, without any infection or alteration of those pure, celestiall, and incorruptible bodies. In the like manner (he said), the authoritie, the power, and countenance of princes may concur in the actions of evil men, without partaking in the injustice and obliquitie of them. These matters whereof we complaine have been presented to his majestie, either under the pretence of royall prerogatives, which he is bound to maintaine, or of publike good, which is the most honourable object of regall wisdom. But the covetous and ambitious designs of others have interposed betwixt his royall intentions and the happinesse of his people, making those things pernicious and hurtfull which his majestie apprehended as just and profitable."

How admirable is the grace and modesty of expression in the first passage that follows, and how thoughtful and comprehensive the tone of the rest!

"He said, the things which he was to propound were of a various nature, many of them such as required a very tender and exquisite consideration. In handling of which, as he would be bold to use the libertie of the place and relation wherein he stood, so he would be very carefull to expresse that modestie and humilitie which might be expected by those of whose actions he was to speake. And if his judgement or his tongue should slip into any particular mistake, he would not thinke it so great a shame to faile by his own weaknesse, as he should esteem it an honour and advantage to be corrected by the wisdom of that House to which he submitted himselfe, with this protestation, that he desired no reformation so much as to reforme himselfe.

"The greatest libertie of the kingdome is religion; thereby we are freed from spirituall evils, and no impositions are so grievous as those that are laid upon the soule. The next great libertie is justice, whereby we are preserved from injuries in our persons and estates; from this is derived into the Commonwealth peace, and order, and safety; and when this is interrupted, confusion and danger are ready to overwhelm all. The third great libertie consists in the power and privilege of Parliaments; for this is the fountaine of law, the great councill of the kingdome, the highest court; this is enabled, by the legislative and consiliarie power, to prevent evils to come; by the judiciarie power, to suppress and remove evils present. If you consider these three great liberties in the order of dignitie, this last is inferiour to the other two, as meanes are inferiour to the end; but if you consider them in the order of necessitie and use, this may justly claime the first place in our care, because the end cannot be obtained without the meanes; and if we doe not preserve this, we cannot long hope to enjoy either of the other. Therefore (he said), being to speake of those grievances which lie upon the kingdome, hee would observe this order:

"1. First to mention those which were against the privileged of Parliaments. 2. Those which were prejudicial to the religion established in the kingdome. 3. Those which did interrupt the justice of the realme in the libertie of our persons and propriety of our estates.

"The privileges of Parliament were not given for the ornament or advantage of those who are the members of Parliament. They have a reall use and efficacie towards that which is the end of Parliaments. We are free from suits that we may the more intirely addict ourselves to the publike services; we have, therefore, libertie of speech, that our counsels may not be corrupted with feare, or our judgements perverted with selfe respects. Those three great faculties and functions of Parliament, the legislative, judiciarie, and consiliarie power, cannot be well exercised without such privileges as these. The wisdom of our laws, the faithfulness of our counsels, the righteousnesse of our judgements, can hardly be kept pure and untainted if they proceed from distracted and restrained minds.

"It is a good rule of the morall philosopher, Et non ladas mentem gubernatricem omnium actionum. These powers of Parliament are to the bodie politike as the rationally faculties of the soule to a man: that which keeps all the parts of the Commonwealth in frame and temper, ought to be most carefully preserved in that freedom, vigour, and activitie which belongs to its self. Our predecessors in this House have ever bene most carefull in the first place to settle and secure their privileges; and (he said) he hoped that we, having had greater breaches made upon us than heretofore, would be no lesse tender of them, and forward in seeking reparation for that which is past, and prevention of the like for the time to come.

"Then hee propounded divers particular points wherein the privilege of Parliament had bene broken. First, in restraining the members of the House from speaking. Secondly, in forbidding the speaker to put any question.

"These two were practiced the last day of the last Parliament (and, as was alledged, by his majestie's command); and both of them trench upon the very life and being of Parliaments; for if such a restraining power as this should take root and bee admitted, it will be impossible for us to bring any resolution to perfection in such matters as shall displease those about the king.

"Thirdly, by imprisoning divers members of the House for matters done in Parliament. Fourthly, by indictments, informations, and judgements in ordinary and inferiour courts, for speeches and proceedings in Parliaments. Fifthly, by the disgracefull order of the King's Bench, whereby some members of this House were enjoined to put in securitie of their good behaviour; and for refusall thereof were continued in prison divers yeares, without any particular allegation against them. One of them was freed by death.* Others were not dismissed† till his majestie had declared his intention to summon the present Parliament. And this he noted not only as a breach of privilege, but as a violation of the common justice of the kingdom. Sixthly, by the sudden and abrupt dissolution of Parliaments, contrary to the law and custom.

"Often hath it bene declared in Parliaments that the Parliament should not be dissolved till the petitions be answered. This (he said) was a great grievance, because it doth prevent the redresse of other grievances. It were a hard case that a private man should bee put to death without being heard. As this representative body of the Commons receives a being by the summons, so it receives a civill death by the dissolution. Is it not a much more heave doome by which we lose our being, to have this civill death inflicted on us in displeasure, and not to be allowed time and libertie to answer for ourselves! that we should not onely die, but have this mark of infamy laid upon us? to bee made intestables, disabled to make our wills, to dispose of our businesse, as this House hath always used to doe before adjournments or dissolutions? Yet this hath often bene our case! We have not bene permitted to poure out our last sighes and groanes into the bosome of our deare soveraigne. The words of dying men are full of piercing affections; if we might bee heard to speake, no doubt we should so fully expresse our love and faithfulness to our prince, as might take off the false suggestions and aspersions of others: at least we should in our humble supplications recommend some such things to him in the name of his people as would make for his owne honour and the publike good of his kingdom.

"Thus he concluded the first sort of grievances, being such as were against the privilege of Parliament, and passed on to the next, concerning religion, all which hee conveyed under these four heads. The first was the great encouragement given to poperie, of which he produced these particular evidences: 1. A suspension of all laws against Papists, whereby they enjoy a free and almost publike exercise of that religion. Those good statutes which were made for restraint of idolatrie and superstition are now a ground of securitie to them in the practice of both, being used to no other end but to get money into the king's purse; which, as it is clearly against the intentions of the law, so it is full of mischief to the kingdom."

Here Pym interposed a few words, which vindicate his memory from the charge that has so often bene urged against it, of religious bigotry and intolerance. Laud's indulgences to the Catholics may possibly be thought nowadays, and justly so thought, unworthy of either regret or blame; but let the reader place himself in the position of a Protestant Nonconformist of that period, and think of the hardships he would have suffered for refusing to bow his conscience to certain prescribed formulæ in doctrine and ceremonial, and contrast them next with these Catholic indulgences; or, considering himself only as a statesman bent on the achievement of responsible government, let him, knowing the connexion in that day of popery with absolute power, observe the eager servility with which the "indulged" Catholics sought to make themselves, upon every occasion, the most active instruments of Charles's despotism. Thoroughly was Pym justified in saying what follows!

"By this means a dangerous party is cherished and increased, who are ready to close with any opportunitee of disturbing the peace and safety of the state. Yet (hee said) hee did not desire any new laws against poperie, or any rigorous courses in the execution of those already in force: he was far from seeking the ruin of their persons or estates; onely he wish't they might be kept in such a condition as should restrain them from doing hurt.

"It may be objected, there are moderate and discreet men amongst them, men of estates, such as have an interest in the peace

* This allusion to Eliot is interesting; and I should add that, two or three days after, Pym moved "that it be referred to the committee of the Tower to examine after what manner Sir John Eliot came to his death, his usage in the Tower, and to view the rooms and places where he was imprisoned, and where he died, and to report the same to the House." I have not been able to find the report. The terms of the notice are very remarkable, and suggest other notions besides that of Pym's affection for his old friend.

† That is, not released from bail. They were all released from prison before Eliot.

and prosperitie of the kingdome as well as wee. These (hee said) were not to be considered according to their owne disposition, but according to the nature of the body whereof they are parties. The planets have severall and particular motions of their owne, yet they are all rapt and transported into a contrarie course by the superior orbe which comprehends them all. The principles of poperie are such as are incompatible with any other religion. There may be a suspension of violence for some by certain respects; but the ultimate end even of that moderation is, that they may with more advantage extirpate that which is opposite to them. Laws will not restrain them—oathes will not. The pope can dispense with both these, and where there is occasion, his command will move them to the disturbance of the realme, against their owne private disposition—yea, against their owne reason and judgement—to obey him; to whom they have (especially the Jesuiticall party) absolutely and intirely obliged themselves, not onely in spiritual matters, but in temporal, as they are in order ad spiritualia. Henry III. and Henry IV. of France were no Protestants themselves, yet were murdered because they tolerated the Protestants. The king and the kingdome can have no securitie but in their weaknesse and disability to do hurt.

"2. A second incouragement is their admission into places of power and trust in the Commonwealth, whereby they get many dependants and adherents, not onely of their owne, but even of such as make profession to be Protestants. 3. A third, their freedome of resorting to London and the court, whereby they have opportunitie, not onely of communicating their counsels and designs one to another, but of diving into his majestie's counsels, by the frequent access of those who are active men amongst them, to the tables and company of great men; and, under subtile pretences and disguises, they want not means of cherishing their owne projects, and of endeavouring to mould and biasse the publike affairs to the great advantage of that partie. 4. A fourth, that as they have a congregation of cardinals at Rome, to consider of the aptest wayes and means of establishing the pope's authoritie and religion in England, so they have a nuncio here, to act and dispose that partie to the execution of those counsels, and, by the assistance of such cunning and Jesuiticall spirits as swarm in this town, to order and manage all actions and events to the furtherance of that maine end.

"The second grievance of religion was from those manifold innovations lately introduced into several parts of the kingdome, all inclining to poperie, and disposing and fitting men to entertain it. The particulars were these: 1. Divers of the chiefest points of religion in difference betwixt us and the Papists have beene publicly defended, in licensed bookes, in sermons, in universitie acts and disputations. 2. Divers popish ceremonies have beene not only practised, but countenanced, yea, little less than enjoined, as altars, images, crucifixes, bowings, and other gestures and observances,* which put upon our churches a shape and face of poperie. Hee compared this to the drie bones in Ezekiel. First, they came together; then the sinews and the flesh came upon them; after this the skin covered them; and then breath and life was put into them! 'So (hee said), after these men had moulded us into an outward forme and visage of poperie, they would more boldly endeavour to breathe into us the spirit of life and poperie.

"The third grievance was the countenancing and preferring those men who were most forward in setting up such innovations: the particulars were so well knowne that they needed not to be named.

"The fourth was the discouragement of those who were knowne to bee most conscionable and faithfull professors of the truth. Some of the wayes of effecting this he observed to be these: The courses taken to inforce and enlarge those unhappy differences, for matters of small moment, which have bene amongst ourselves, and to raise up new occasions of further division, whereby many have bene induced to forsake the land, not seeing the end of those voluntarie and human injunctions in things appertaining to God's worship. Those who are indeed lovers of religion, and of the churches of God, would seek to make up those breaches, and to unite us more entirely against the common enemy. 2. The over-rigid prosecution of those who are scrupulous in using some things enjoined, which are held by those who injoyne them to be in themselves indifferent. It hath bene ever the desire of this House, exprest in many Parliaments in Queene Elizabeth's time and since, that such might be tenderly used. It was one of our petitions delivered at Oxford to his majestie that now is; but what little moderation it hath produced is not unknowne to us all! Any other vice almost may be better endured in a minister than inconformitie! 3. The unjust punishments and vexations of sundry persons for matters required without any warrant of law: as, for not reading the booke concerning recreation on the Lord's day; for not removing the communion table to bee set altarwise at the east end of the chancell; for not coming up to the railes to receive the sacrament; for preaching the Lord's day in the afternoon; for catechising in any other words and manner than in the precise words of the short catechisme in the Common Prayer Booke.

"The fifth and last grievance concerning religion was the ineroachment and abuse of ecclesiastical jurisdiction. The particulars mentioned were these: 1. Fining and imprisoning in cases not allowed by law. 2. The challenging their jurisdiction to be appropriate to their order, which they alledge to be jure divino. 3. The contriving and publishing of new articles, upon which they inforce the churchwardens to take oathes and to make inquiries and presentments, as if such articles had the force of canons; and this, he said, was an effect of great presumption and boldnesse, not onely in the bishops, but in their archdeacons, officials, and chancellors, taking upon themselves a kinde of synodall authoritie. The injunctions of this kinde might, indeed, well partake in name with that part of the common law which is called the extravagants!"

A more masterly statement than this, of the precise bearings of one of those great questions of the time, which it is probably the most difficult to sympathize with now, except, indeed, in the broad statement of a certain widely-felt ecclesiastical oppression, could not possibly be furnished; and from such a speaker it is invaluable.

* See the Life of Eliot, p. 30; and Life of Strafford, p. 99-101.

But Pym's treatment of the civil oppressions of the state is felt, from the nature of the subject, with still greater force. A more massive document was never given to history. It has all the solidity, weight, and gravity of a judicial record, while it addresses itself equally to the solid good sense of the masses of the people, and to the cultivated understandings of the time. The deliberative gravity, the force, the broad, decided manner of this great speaker, contrast forcibly with those choice specimens of awkward affectations and laboured extravagances that have not seldom passed in modern days for oratory.

"Having dispatched these several points, hee proceeded to the third kinde of grievances, being such as are against the common justice of the realme, in the libertie of our persons and proprietie of our estates, of which (he said) he had many to propound: in doing whereof, he would rather observe the order of time wherein they were acted than of consequence; but when hee should come to the cure, hee should then persuade the House to begin with those which were of most importance, as being now in execution, and very much pressing and exhausting the Commonwealth.

"He began with the tonnage and poundage, and other impositions not warranted by law; and because these burdens had long lain upon us, and the principles which produced them are the same from whence divers others are derived, he thought it necessarie to premise a short narrative and relation of the grounds and proceedings of the power of imposing herein practised. It was (he said) a fundamental truth, essential to the constitution and government of this kingdom—an hereditarie libertie and privilege of all the freeborn subjects of the land—that no tax, tallage, or other charge might be laid upon us, without common consent in Parliament. This was acknowledged by the Conqueror; ratified in that contract which he made with this nation upon his admittance to the kingdom; declared and confirmed in the lawes which he published.

"This hath never beene denyed by any of our kings, though broken and interrupted by some of them, especially by King John and Henry III. Then, againe, it was confirmed by Mag. Chart. and other succeeding lawes, yet not so well settled but that it was sometime attempted by the two succeeding Edwards, in whose times the subjects were very sensible of all the breaches made upon the common libertie, and, by the opportunitie of frequent Parliaments, pursued them with fresh complaints, and for the most part found redresse, and procured the right of the subject to be fortified by new statutes.

"He observed that those kings, even in the acts whereby they did break the law, did really affirm the subject's libertie, and disclaime that right of imposing which is now challenged; for they did usually procure the merchants' consent to such taxes as were laid, thereby to put a colour of justice upon their proceeding; and ordinarily they were limited to a short time, and then propounded to the ratification of the Parliament, where they were cancelled or confirmed, as the necessitie and state of the kingdom did require. But, for the most part, such charges upon merchandise were taken by authoritie of Parliament, and granted for some short time, in a greater or lesser proportion, as was requisite for supply of the publike occasions—six or twelve in the pound, for one, two, or three yeares, as they saw cause, to be employed for the defence of the sea; and it was acknowledged so clearly to be in the power of Parliament, that they have sometimes beene granted to noblemen, and sometimes to merchants, to bee disposed for that use. Afterward they were granted to the king for life, and so continued for divers descents, yet still as a gift and grant of the Commons.

"Betwixt the time of Edward III. and Queene Mary, never prince (that he could remember) offered to demand any imposition but by grant in Parliament. Queene Mary laid a charge upon cloth, by the equitie of the statute of tonnage and poundage, because the rate set upon wooll was much more than upon cloth; and, there being little wooll carried out of the kingdom unwrought, the queene thought she had reason to lay on somewhat more; yet not full so much as brought them to an equalitie, but that still there continued a lesse charge upon wooll wrought into cloth than upon wooll carried out unwrought, until King James's time, when, upon Nicholson's project, there was a further addition of charge, but still upon pretence of the statute, which is that we call the pretermitted custome.

"In Queene Elizabeth's time, it is true, one or two little impositions crept in, the generall prosperitie of her raigne overshadowing small errors and innovations. One of these was upon currants, by occasion of the merchants' complaints that the Venetians had laid a charge upon the English cloth; that so we might bee even with them, and force them the sooner to take it off. But this being demanded by King James, was denied by one Bates, a merchant, and upon a suit in the Exchequer, was adjudged for the king. Now the manner of that judgement was thus: There were then but three judges in that court, all differing from one another in the grounds of their sentences. The first was of opinion the king might impose upon such commodities as were forraigne and superfluous, as currants were, but not upon such as were native and to be transported, or necessarie, and to be imported for the use of the kingdom. The second judge was of opinion he might impose upon all forraigne merchandise, whether superfluous or no, but not upon native. The third, that forasmuch as the king had the custody of the ports and the guard of the seas, and that he might open and shut up the ports as he pleased, hee had a prerogative to impose upon all merchandise, both exported and imported. Yet this single, distracted, and divided judgement is the foundation of all the impositions now in practice! for after this King James laid new charges upon all commodities outward and inward, not limited to a certaine time and occasion, but reserved to himself, his heires and successors forever—the first impositions in see simple that were ever heard of in this kingdome. This judgement, and the right of imposing thereupon assumed, was questioned in septimo and duodecimo of that king, and was the cause of the breach of both those Parliaments. In 18 & 21 Jacobi, indeed, it was not agitated by this House, but only that they might preserve the favour of the king for the dispatch of some other great businesses upon which they were more especially attentive.* But in the first of his present majestie, it necessarily came to be remembered, upon the proposition on the king's part for renewing the bill of tonnage and poundage; yet so moderate was that Parliament, that they thought rather to confirm the impositions already set by a law to be made than to abolish them by a judgement in Parliament; but that and divers ensuing Parliaments have bene unhappily broken before that endeavour could be accomplished: onely at the last meeting a remonstrance was made concerning the libertie of the subject in this point; and it hath alwayes bene expressed to bee the meaning of the House, and so it was (as hee said) his owne meaning in the proposition now made, to settle and restore the right according to law, and not to diminish the king's profit, but to establish it by a free grant in Parliament.

"However, since the breach of the last Parliament, his majestie hath, by a new booke of rates, very much increased the burden upon merchandise; and now tonnage and poundage, old and new impositions, are all taken by prerogative, without any grant in Parliament, or authority of law, as we conceive, from whence divers inconveniences and mischiefs are produced: 1. The danger of the president, that a judgement in one court and in one case is made binding to all the kingdome. 2. Men's goods are seized, their legal suits are stopped, and justice denied to those that desire to take the benefit of the law. 3. The great summes of money received upon these impositions, intended for the guard of the seas, claimed and defended upon no ground but that of publike trust, for protection of merchants and defence of the ports, are dispersed to other uses, and a new tax raised for the same purposes. 4. These burdens are so excessive, that trade is thereby very much hindered, the commodities of our owne growth extremely abased, and those imported much enhanced; all which lie not upon the merchant alone, but upon the generalitie of the subject; and by this means the stock of the kingdome is much diminish, our exportation being lesse profitable, and our importation more changeable. And if the warrs and troubles in the neighbour parts had not brought almost the whole streame of trade into this kingdome, we should have found many more prejudicial effects of these impositions, long before this time, than yet wee have done. Especially they have bene insupportable to the poore plantations, whither many of his majestie's subjects have bene transported, in divers parts of the Continent and islands of America, in furtherance of a designe tending to the honour of the kingdome and the enlargement of his majestie's dominions. The adventurers in this noble worke have for the most part no other support but tobacco, upon whic h such a heave rate is set, that the king receives twice as much as the true value of the commoditie to the owner. 5. Whereas these great burdens have caused divers merchants to apply themselves to a way of traffique abroad by transporting goods from one cuntry to another, without bringing them home into England; but now it hath bene lately endeavoured to set an imposition upon this trade, so that the king will have a dutie even out of those commodities which never come within his dominions, to the great discouragement of such active and industrious men.

"The next generall head of civill grievances was enforcing men to compound for knighthood; which though it may seeme past, because it is divers yeares since it was used, yet upon the same grounds the king may renew it, as often as he pleaseth, for the composition looks backward, and the offence continuing is subject to a new fine. The state of that businesse he layed downe thus: Heretofore, when the services due by tenure were taken in kind, it were fit there were some way of triall and approbation of those that were bound to such services. Therefore it was ordained, that such as were to doe knight's services, after they came of age and had possession of their lands, should bee made knights; that is, publicly declared to be fit for that service: divers ceremonies and solemnities were in use for this purpose; and if by the partie's neglect this was not done, he was punishable by fine, there being in those times an ordinary and open way to get knighthood for those who were borne to it. Now it is quite true that, although the use of this hath for divers ages bene discontinued, yet there have past very few kings under whom there hath not bene a generall summons, requiring those who had lands of such value as the law prescribes to appeare at the coronation, or some other great solemnitie, and to bee knighted, and yet nothing intended but the getting of some small fines. So this grievance is not altogether new in the kind, but it is new in the manner, and in the excesse of it, and that in divers respects: 1. First, it hath bene extended beyond all intention and colour of law. Not only innholders, but likewise leaseholders, copyholders, merchants, and others; scarce any man free from it. 2. The fines have bene immoderate, far beyond the proportion of former times. 3. The proportion have bene without any example, president, or rule of justice; for though those that were summoned did appeare, yet distresses infinite were made out against them, and issues increased and multiplyed, and no way open to discharge those issues, by plea or otherwise, but onely by compounding with the commissioners at their owne pleasure.

"The third generall head of civill grievances was the great inundation of monopolies, whereby heave burthens are laid, not onely upon forraigne, but also native commodities. These began in the soape patten. The principall undertakers in this were divers popish recusants, men of estate and qualitie, such as in likelihood did not onely aime at their private gaine, but that by this open breach of law the king and his people might be more fully divided, and the wayes of Parliament men more thoroughly obstructed. Amongst the infinite inconveniences and mischiefs which this did produce, these few may be observed:

* The war with the Palatinate. See Life of Eliot, p. 6-8.

1. The impairing the goodnesse, and enhauncing the price of most of the commodities and manufactures of the realme, yea, of those which are of most necessarie and common use, as salt, soape, beere, coles, and infinite others. 2. That, under colour of licences, trades and manufactures are restrained to a few hands, and many of the subjects deprived of their ordinary way of livelihood. 3. That upon such illegal grants, a great number of persons had bene unjustly vexed by pursevants, imprisonments, attendance upon the councill-table, forfeiture of goods, and many other wayes.

"The fourth head of civil grievances was that great and unparalleled grievance of the ship-money, which, though it may seeme to have more warrant of law than the rest, because there hath a judgement passed for it, yet in truth it is thereby aggravated, if it bee considered that the judgement is founded upon the naked opinion of some judges without any written law, without any custome, or authoritie of law-bookes, yea, without any one president for it! Many expresse lawes, many declarations in Parliaments, and the constant practice and judgement at all times being against it! yea, in the very nature of it, it will be found to be disproportionate to the case of 'necessitie' which is pretended to be the ground of it! Necessitie excludes all formalities and solemnities. It is no time then to make levies and taxes, to build and prepare ships. Every man's person, every man's ships, are to be employed for the resisting of an invading enemy. The right on the subject's part was so cleare, and the pretences against it so weake, that hee thought no man would venture his reputation or conscience in the defence of that judgement, being so contrary to the grounds of the law, to the practice of former times, and so inconsistent in its selfe.

"Amongst many inconveniences and obliquities of this grievance, he noted these: 1. That it extendeth to all persons and to all times; it subjecteth our goods to distresse, and our persons to imprisonment; and, the causes of it being secret and invisible, referred to his majestie's breast alone, the subject was left without possibilitie of exception and reliefe. 2. That there were no rules or limits for the proportion; so that no man knew what estate he had, or how to order his course or expences. 3. That it was taken out of the subject's purse by a writ, and brought into the king's coffers by instructions from the lords of his most honourable privie councill. Now in the legall defence of it, the writ onely did appeare; of the instructions there was no notice taken, which yet in the real execution of it were most predominant. It carries the face of service in the writ, and of revenue in the instructions. Why, if this way had not bene found to turn the ship into money, it would easily have appeared how incompatible this service is with the office of a sheriffe in the inland counties, and how incongruous and inconvenient for the inhabitants!

The law in a body politike is like Nature, which always prepareth and disposeth proper and fit instruments and organes for every naturall operation. If the law had intended any such charge as this, there should have bene certaine rules, suitable meanes and courses, for the levying and managing of it.

"The fifth head was the enlargement of the forrests beyond the bounds and perambulations appointed and established by act of Parliament, 27 & 28 Edward I.; and this is done upon the very reasons and exceptions which had bene on the king's part propounded, and by the Commons answered, in Parliament, not long after that establishment. It is not unknowne to many in this House, that those perambulations were the fruit and effect of that famous charter which is called Charta de forrestâ, whereby many tumults, troubles, and discontents had bene taken away, and composed between the king and his subjects; and it is full of danger, that, by reviving those old questions, wee may fall into the like distempers. Hereby, however, no blame could fall upon that great lord, who is now justice in Eyre, and in whose name these things were acted; it could not be expected that he should take notice of the lawes and customes of the realme, therefore he was carefull to procure the assistance and direction of the judges; and if any thing were done against law, it was for them to answer, and not for him.

"The particular irregularities and obliquities of this businesse were these: 1. The surreptitious procuring a verdict for the king, without giving notice to the countrey, whereby they might be prepared to give in evidence for their own interest and indemnitie, as was done in Essex. 2. Whereas the judges in the justice seat in Essex were consulted with about the entry of the former verdict, and delivered their opinion touching that alone, without meddling with the point of right, this opinion was after enforced in other counties, as if it had bene a judgement upon the matter, and the counsell for the county discountenanced in speaking, because it was said to be already adjudged. 3. The inheritance of divers of the subjects have bene hereupon disturbed, after the quiet possession of three or four hundred years, and a way opened for the disturbance of many others. 4. Great summes of money have bene drawn from such as have lands within these pretended bounds, and those who have forborne to make composition have bene threatened with the execution of these forrest lawes. 5. The fifth was the selling of nusesances, or at least some such things as are supposed to bee nusesances. The king, as father of the Commonwealth, is to take care of the publike commodities and advantages of his subjects, as rivers, highways, common sewers, and such like, and is to remove whatsoever is prejudiciall to them; and for the triall of those, there are legall and ordinary writs of ad quod damnum; but of late a new and extra-judiciall way hath bene taken, of declaring matters to be nusesances; and divers have thereupon bene questioned, and if they would not compound, they have bene fined; if they doe compound, that which was first prosecuted as a common nusanance is taken into the king's protection, and allowed to stand; and having yeelded the king money, no further care is taken whether it be good or bad for the Commonwealth. By this a very great and publike trust is either broken or abused. If the matter compounded for be truly a nusanance, then it is broken to the hurt of the people; if it bee not a nuisance, then it is abused to the hurt of the partie. The particulars mentioned were: First, The commission for buildings in and about this towne, which heretofore hath bene presented by this House as a grievance in King James his time, but now of late the execution hath bene much more frequent and prejudicial than it was before. Secondly, Commission for depopulations, which began some few yeares since, and is still in hot prosecution. By both these the subject is restrained from disposing of his owne. Some have bene commanded to demolish their houses; others have bene forbidden to build; others, after great trouble and vexation, have bene forced to redeeme their peace with large summes, and they still remaine, by law, as lyable to a new question as before; for it is agreed by all, that the king cannot licence a common nuisance; and although indeed these are not such, yet it is a matter of very ill consequence, that under that name they should be compounded for, and may in all times hereafter bee made a president for the kings of this realme to claime a power of licencing such things as are nuisances indeed.

"The seventh great civill grievance hath bene the militarie charges laid upon the severall counties of the kingdome, sometimes by warrant under his majestie's signature, sometimes by letters from the councill-table, and sometimes (such hath bene the boldnesse and presumption of some men) by the order of the lord-lieutenants, or deputy-lieutenant alone. This is a growing evill, still multiplying and increasing from a few particulars to many, from small summes to great. It began first to be practised as a loane, for supply of coat and conduct money; and for this it hath some countenance from the use in Queene Elizabeth's time, when the lords of the councill did often desire the deputy-lieutenants to procure so much money to be laid out in the countrey as the service did require, with a promise to pay it againe in London, for which purpose there was a constant warrant in the Exchequer. This (he said) was the practice in her time, and in a great part of King James's. But the payments were then so certaine, as it was little otherwise than taking up money upon bills of exchange. At this day they follow these presidents in the manner of the demand (for it is with a promise of a repayment), but not in the certaintie and readinesse of satisfaction.

"The first particular brought into a tax (as he thought) was the muster-master's wages, at which many repined; but being for small summes, it began to bee generally digested; yet, in the last Parliament, this House was sensible of it, and to avoid the danger of the president that the subjects should be forced to make any payments without consent in Parliament, they thought upon a bill that might bee a rule to the lieutenants what to demand, and to the people what to pay. But the hopes of this bill were dasht in the dissolution of that Parliament. Now of late divers other particulars are growing into practice, which make the grievance much more heave. Those mentioned were these: 1. Pressing men against their will, and forcing them which are rich or unwilling to serve, to find others in their place.

2. The provision of publike magazines for powder and other munition, spades and pickaxes. 3. The salarie of divers officers besides the muster-master. 4. The buying of cart-horses and carts, and hiring of carts for carriages.

"The eighth head of civill grievances was the extra-judicial declarations of judges, whereby the subjects have bene bound in matters of great importance without hearing of councill or argument on their part, and are left without legall remedie, by writ of error or otherwise. He remembered the expression used by a former member of the House, of a 'teeming Parliament.' This (hee said) was a teeming grievance; from hence have issued most of the great grievances now in being: the ship-money, the pretended nuisances already mentioned, and some others which have not yet bene toucht upon, especially that concerning the proceedings of ecclesiastical courts.

"The ninth generall head was, that the authoritie and wisdom of the councill-table have bene applied to the contriving and managing of severall monopolies, and other great grievances. The institution of the councill-table was much for the advantage and securitie of the subject, to avoid surreptitious and precipitate courts in the great affaires of the kingdome. But by law an oath should be taken by all those of the king's councill, in which, amongst other things, it is exprest that they should for no cause forbear to doe right to all the king's people. For such an oath be not now taken, he wisht it might be brought into use againe.

"It was the honour of that table to bee, as it were, incorporated with the king; his royall power and greatnesse did shine most conspicuously in their actions and in their counsell. Wee have heard of projectors and resrees heretofore; and what opinion and relish they have found in this House is not unknowne. But that any such thing should be acted by the councill-table which might give strength and countenance to monopolies, as it hath not bene used till now of late, so it cannot be apprehended without the just griefe of the honest subject, and encouragement of those who are ill affected. He remembered that in tertio of this king, a noble gentleman, then a very worthy member of the Commons' House, now a great lord and eminent counsellour of state, did in this place declare an opinion concerning that clause used to bee inserted in patters of monopolie, whereby justices of peace are commanded to assist the patentees; and that he urged it to bee a great dishonour to those gentlemen which are in commission to be so meanelly employed: with how much more reason may wee, in jealousie of the honour of the councill-table, humbly desire that their precious time, their great abilities, designed to the publike care and service of the kingdome, may not receive such a staine, such a diminution, as to be employed in matters of so ill report, in the estimation of the law; of so ill effect, in the apprehension of the people!

"The tenth head of civill grievances was comprised in the high court of Star Chamber, which some thinke succeeded that which in the Parliament rolls is called magnum concilium, and to which Parliaments were wont so often to referre those important matters which they had no time to determine. But now this court, which in the late restauration or erection of it, in Henry VII.'s time, was especially designed to restrain the oppression of great men, and to remove the obstructions and impediments of the law—this, which is both a court of counsell and a court of justice—hath beene made an instrument of erecting and defending monopolies and other grievances; to set a face of right upon those things which are unlawful in their owne nature, a face of publike good upon such as are pernicious in their use and execution. The soape-pattent and divers other evidences thereof may be given, so well knowne as not to require a particular relation. And as if this were not enough, this court hath lately intermeddled with the ship-money! divers sheriffes have beene questioned for not levying and collecting such summes as their counties have been charged with; and if this beginning bee not prevented, the Star Chamber will become a court of revenue, and it shall bee made crime not to collect or pay such taxes as the state shall require!

"The eleventh head of civill grievance was now come to. Hee said hee was gone very high, yet hee must go a little higher. That great and most eminent power of the king, of making edicts and proclamations, which are said to be leges temporis, and by means of which our princes have used to encounter with such sudden and unexpected danger as would not indure so much delay as assembling the great counsell of the kingdome—this, which is one of the most glorious beames of majestie, most rigorous in commanding reverence and subjection, hath, to our unspeakable grieve, beene often exercised of late for the injoyning and maintaining sundry monopolies and other grants, exceeding burdensome, and prejudiciall to the people.

"The twelfth next. Now, although he was come as high as he could upon earth, yet the presumption of evill men did leade him one step higher—even as high as heaven—as high as the throne of God! It was now (hee said) growne common for ambitious and corrupt men of the clergie to abuse the truth of God and the bond of conscience, preaching downe the lawes and liberties of the kingdome, and pretending divine authoritie for an absolute power in the king, to doe what he would with our persons and goods. This hath beene so often published in sermons and printed bookes, that it is now the high way to preferment!

"In the last Parliament we had a sentence of an offence of this kind against one Mainwaring, then a doctor, now a bishop, concerning whom (hee said) hee would say no more but this, that when he saw him at that barre, in the most humble and dejected posture that ever he observed, he thought he would not so soone have leapt into a bishop's chaire! But his successe hath emboldened others; therefore (hee said) this may well bee noted as a double grievance, that such doctrine should be allowed, and that such men should bee preferred—yea, as a roote of grievances, whereby they endeavour to corrupt the king's conscience, and, as much as in them lyes, to deprive the people of that royall protection to which his majestie is bound by his fundamentall lawes of the kingdome, and by his owne personall oath.

"The thirteenth head of civill grievances he would thus expresse: The long intermission of Parliaments, contrary to the two statutes yet in force, whereby it is appointed there should bee Parliaments once a yeare at the least; and most contrary to the publike good of the kingdome, since, this being well remedied, it would generate remedies for all the rest."

These extracts will be thought as important as they are interesting by every student of English History, or of the noblest aspects of the English character. To abridge them would be indeed to realize the story of the man who put a brick in his pocket, thinking to show it as the model of a house! What a grave, clear, solid, and laborious style! What honest seriousness and simplicity of tone in the reasoning! What an exquisite general union of fact and feeling in the ideas! What tenacity and firmness in the expression! Nowhere is there any affectation of philosophy or fine taste; the understanding is invigorated and nourished throughout with its proper food. I will only observe farther, that the wonderful adaptation of the manner and construction of the speech to the peculiar circumstances of the occasion will be better felt by the reader hereafter.

"Having gone through the severall heads of grievances, he came to the second maine branch, propounded in the beginning: that the disorders from whence these grievances issued were as hurtfull to the king as to the people, of which he gave divers reasons: 1. The interruption of the sweet communion which ought to be betwixt the king and his people in matters of grace and supply. They have need of him by his generall pardon; to be secured from projectors and informers; to be freed from obsolete lawes; from the subtle devices of such as seek to restrain the prerogative to their owne private advantage and the publike hurt; and he hath need of them for counsel and support in great and extraordinary occasions. This mutuall intercourse, if indeed sustained, would so weane the affections and interests of his subjects into his actions and designes, that their wealth and their persons would be his; his owne estate would be managed to most advantage; and publike undertakings would be prosecuted at the charge and adventure of the subject. The victorious attempts in Queene Elizabeth's time upon Portugall, Spaine, and the Indies were for the greatest part made upon the subjects' purses, and not upon the queene's, though the honour and profit of the successe did most accrew to her. 2. Those often breaches and discontentments betwixt the king and the people are very apt to diminish his reputation abroad, and disadvantage his treaties and alliances. 3. The apprehension of the favour and encouragement given to poperie hath much weakened his majestie's partie beyond the sea, and impaired that advantage which Queene Elizabeth and his royall father have heretofore made, of being heads of the Protestant union. 4. The innovations in religion and rigour of ecclesiastical courts have forced a great many of his majestie's subjects to forsake the land, whereby not onely their persons and their posteritie, but their wealth and their industry, are lost to this kingdome, much to the reduction, also, of his majestie's customes and subsidies. And, amongst other inconveniences of such a sort, this was especially to be observed, that divers clothiers, driven out of the countrey, had set up the manufacture of cloth beyond the seas, whereby this state is like to suffer much by abatement of the price of woolls, and by want of employment for the poore; both which likewise tend to his majestie's particular losse.

5. It puts the king upon improper wayes of supply, which being not warranted by law, are much more burdensome to the subject than advantageous to his majestie. In France, not long since, upon a survey of the king's revenue, it was found that two parts in three never came to the king's purse, but were diverted to the profit of the officers or ministers of the crowne, and it was thought a very good service and reformation to reduce two parts to the king, leaving still a third part to the instruments that were employed about getting it in. It may well be doubted that the king may have the like or worse successe in England, which appears already in some particulars. The king, for instance, hath reserved upon the monopoly of wines thirty thousand pound rent a yeare; the vintner payes forty shillings a tun, which comes to ninety thousand pounds; the price upon the subject by retaile is increased twopence a quart, which comes to eight pound a tun, and for forty-five thousand tun brought in yearly, amounts to three hundred and sixty thousand pounds, which is three hundred and thirty thousand pounds losse to the kingdome above the king's rent! Other monopolies also, as that of soape, have bene very chargeable to the kingdome, and brought very little treasure into his majestie's coffers. Thus it is that the law provides for that revenue of the crowne which is naturall and proper, that it may be safely collected and brought to account; but this illegall revenue, being without any such provision, is left to hazard and much uncertaintie, either not to be retained, or not duly accounted of.

6. It is apt to weaken the industrie and courage of the subject, if they be left uncertaine whether they shall reape the benefit of their own paines and hazard. Those who are brought into the condition of slaves will easily grow to a slavish disposition, who, having nothing to lose, doe commonly show more boldnesse in disturbing than defending a kingdome. 7. These irregular courses doe give opportunitie to ill instruments to insinuate themselves into the king's service, for we cannot but observe that if a man be officious in furthering their inordinate burdens of ship-money, monopolies, and the like, it varnisheth over all other faults, and makes him fit both for employment and preferment; so that out of their offices, they are furnisht for vast expences, purchases, buildings, and the king loseth often more in desperate debts at their deaths than he got by them all their lives. Whether this were not lately verified in a Western man, much employed while he lived, he leaves to the knowledge of those who were acquainted with his course; and he doubted not but others might be found in the like case. The same course, againe, has bene pursued with those that are affected to poperie, to prophanesne, and to superstitious innovations in matters of religion. All kinds of spies and intelligencers have means to be countenanced and trusted if they will be but zealous in these kinde of services, which, how much it de- tracts from his majestie in honour, in profit, and prosperitie of publike affaires, lyes open to every man's apprehension. And from these reasons, or some of them, he thought it proceeded that through the whole course of the English story it might be observed, that those kings who had bene most respectfull of the lawes had bene most eminent in greatnesse, in glory, and successe, both at home and abroad; and that others, who thought to subsist by the violation of them, did often fall into a state of weaknesse, povertie, and infortunitie. 8. The differences and discontents betwixt his majestie and the people at home have in all liklyhood diverted his royall thoughts and counsellors from those great opportunities which he might have, not onely to weaken the house of Austria and to restore the Palatinate, but to gaine himself a higher pitch of power and greatnesse than any of his ancestors; for it is not unknowne how weak, how distracted, how discontented the Spanish colonies are in the West Indies. There are nowe in those parts, in New-England, Virginia, and the Carib Islands, and in the Barmudos, at least sixty thousand able persons of this nation, many of them well armed, and their bodies seasoned to that climate, which, with a very small charge, might be set downe in some advantageous parts of these pleasant, rich, and fruitfull countries, and easily make his majestie master of all that treasure, which not onely foment the warre, but is the great support of poperie in all parts of Christendome. 9. And lastly, those courses are like to produce such distempers in the state as may not be settled without great charge and losse, by which means more may be consumed in a few months than shall be gotten by such wayes in many yeares.

"Having thus past through the two first general branches, he was nowe come to the third, wherein he was to set downe the wayes of healing and removing those grievances, which consisted of two maine branches: first, in declaring the law where it was doubtful; the second, in better provision for the execution of law, where it is cleere. But (hee said) because he had already spent much time, and began to finde some confusion in his memory, he would refer the particulars to another opportunitie, and for the present onely move that which was generall to all, and which would give waight and advantage to all the particular wayes of redresse.

"That is, that wee should speedily desire a conference with the Lords, and acquaint them with the miserable condition wherein wee finde the Church and State; and as we have already resolved to joyn in a religious seeking of God, in a day of fast and humiliation, so to intreat them to coneur with us in a Parliamentary course of petitioning the king, as there should be occasion, and in searching out the causes and remedies of these many insupportable grievances under which we lye; that so, by the united wisdom and authoritie of both houses, such courses may be taken as (through God's blessing) may advance the honour and greatnesse of his majestie, and restore and establish the peace and prosperitie of the kingdome.

"This (hee said) wee might undertake with comfort and hope of successe; for though there be a darknesse upon the land, a thick and palpable darknesse, like that of Egypt, yet, as in that the *sunne had not lost his light, nor the Egyptians their sight (the interruption was onely in the medium), so with us there is still (God be thanked) light in the sunne—wisdom and justice in his majestic—to dispell this darknesse; and in us there remains a visual faculty, whereby we are inabled to apprehend, and moved to desire, LIGHT; and when we shall be blessed in the injoying of it, we shall thereby be incited to return his majestic such thanks as may make it shine more cleerely in the world, to his owne glory, and in the hearts of his people, to their joy and contentment.”

* I found this speech, as I have already stated, in the very valuable collection of king's pamphlets now deposited in the British Museum. The effect it produced, and the numerous abridgments of it taken at the time by different members, for the purpose of circulation through the country, as described by May, have led to a curious confusion respecting it. The varying versions of the same speech have been treated as separate speeches by all the historians, collectors, and memorialists, except Lord Clarendon. I cannot account for the error in Rushworth's case (compare vol. iii., p. 1131, of his collections, with vol. iv., p. 21), save by the supposition of the second report having been inserted by the publisher after the collector's death. The loose way in which it appears, thrown in, as it were, “in a lump,” with the other speeches that follow it, certainly favours this supposition; which is strengthened by the circumstance of this very collection of speeches, including the abridgment of Pym's speech in the April Parliament, having been published in 1641, as delivered in the Long Parliament, whereas many of them, with Pym's, belong to the previous meeting. Compare Rudyard's, Grimston's, &c. This would probably not be thought worth remarking on, were it not that it establishes Clarendon's accuracy on a point that has been disputed, and is important in reference to Pym himself. It is now clear to me, as Clarendon states, that the first speech delivered by this great statesman in the Long Parliament was the speech in which he denounced Lord Strafford. It marks emphatically the difference that was obvious in his “temper.” I will subjoin, as a curiosity, the naked outline which Whitelocke gives of “Pym on grievances;” and upon which it is to be observed, that, though it is given in the mention of the opening proceedings in the Long Parliament, Whitelocke's words by no means imply a contradiction of the fact that it was delivered the Parliament before. He says, “many smart speeches were made in the House of Commons touching grievances, which Mr. Pym divided into three heads.” The following abstract is then given in an isolated form, no mention of its delivery, or the delivery of any thing like it, having been made by the memorialist in his report of the April Parliament:

“I. Against privilege of Parliament. II. Prejudice of religion. III. Liberty of the subject.” Under the first head were reckoned, “1. Restraining the members of Parliament from speaking. 2. Forbidding the speaker to put a question. 3. Imprisoning divers members for matters done in Parliament. 4. By proceedings against them therefor in inferior courts. 5. Enjoining their good behaviour and continuance in prison even unto death. 6. Abrupt dissolutions of Parliaments.” Under the second head, of religion, were mentioned, “1. The suspension of laws against them of the popish religion; laws and oaths will not restrain them; the pope dispenseth with all. 2. Their places of trust and honour in the Commonwealth. 3. Their free resort to London and to the courts to communicate their counsels and designs. 4. As they have a college in Rome for the pope's authority in England, so they have a nuncio here to execute it.” Under the innovations of religion were brought in, “1. Maintenance of popish tenets in books, sermons, and disputes. 2. Practice of popish ceremonies countenanced and enjoined, as altars, images, crucifixes, and bowings. 3. Discouragement of Protestants by rigid prosecution of the scrupulous for things indifferent; no vice made of so great as inconformity. 4. Encroachment of ecclesiastical jurisdiction: (1.) In fining and imprisoning without law; (2.) Challenging their jurisdiction to be appropriate to their order, jure divino; (3.) Contriving and publishing new orders of visitation in force, as of canons, the boldness of bishops, and all their subordinate officers and officials.” Under the third head, the grievances: “1. By tonnage and poundage unduly taken. 2. Composition for knighthood. 3. The unparalleled grievance of ship-money. 4. Enlargement of the forests beyond the due bounds. 5. Selling of nuisances by compounding for them. 6. The commission for building. 7. The commission for depopulations. 8. Unlawful military charges, by warrant of the king, letters of the council, and orders of the lieutenants of the counties and their deputies. 9. Extra-judicial declarations of judges, without hearing council or ar-

When Pym resumed his seat, the king's solicitor, Herbert, attempted, “with all imaginable address,” to call off the attention of the members from the impression his extraordinary speech had made, but vainly. The deadly force of Pym's statements and reasoning, equalled only by the singular moderation of his tone, had diffused through the House a deep and settled calm of determination. A committee was immediately appointed to inquire into the violation of privilege by the speaker of the last House of Commons, in refusing to put a question on the ground of prohibition from the king; the proceedings in the Star Chamber and King's Bench respecting the imprisoned members and the deceased Eliot were ordered to be called for by the speaker's warrant, together with whatever proceedings had taken place in the Exchequer Chamber, and any other courts, respecting ship-money. Subsequently it was resolved that grievances should be considered before supply, and that conference on grievances should be desired by the Lords. Pym and St. John were appointed managers of this conference—“Mr. Pym for the first, and to make an introduction to the whole business.”*

Meanwhile the House of Lords, at the earnest and humiliating entreaty of the king, had passed two resolutions, to the effect that supply ought to have precedence of grievances, and that the Commons should be invited to a conference in order to their being disposed thereto.”†

These resolutions had just passed, when Pym laid them before the House of Commons as a gross breach of privilege. An address to the Lords was, in consequence, agreed to and approved, “and that Mr. Pym should go up to that House with it.” Pym instantly proceeded to the Lords, and the words he uttered are indeed memorable: “Your lordships have meddled with, and advised concerning, both matter of supply and the time when the same should be made, and this before such time as the same was moved to your lordships by the Commons. As a course for the repair of this breach of privilege, the Commons beg to suggest that your lordships would, in your wisdoms, find out, yourselves, some sort of reparation, and of prevention of the like infringement for the future. And the Commons humbly desire, through me, to represent to your lordships that, in case your lordships have taken notice of any orders or proceedings of the Commons concerning religion, property, and privileges, and that they were to proceed to the supply, which they have some cause to conceive by these words: ‘That this being done, your lordships would freely join with the Commons in those three things;’ for the avoiding all misunderstandings between your lordships and the Commons for time to come, they desire your lordships hereafter to take no notice of any thing which shall be debated by the Commons until they shall themselves determine. 10. Monopolies countenanced by the council-table, and justices of the peace required to assist them. 11. The Star Chamber Court. 12. The king's edicts and proclamations lately used for maintaining monopolies. 13. The ambitious and corrupt clergy preaching divine authority and absolute power in kings to do what they will. 14. The intermission of Parliaments.”—Memorials, p. 36.

* Parl. Hist., vol. viii., p. 456.

† Lords' Journals, April, 1640.

clare the same unto your lordships, which the Commons shall always observe towards your lordships' proceedings, conceiving the contrary not to consist with the privileges of the House.*

Some few short years before, such an assertion of power and privilege as this would have seemed monstrous; for it implies, it will be observed, that even upon the king's information and authority their lordships were not ever to touch upon the proceedings of the Commons. But the reader who has observed the course pursued by Pym and his associates in James's Parliaments of 1614 and 1620, as detailed in these pages, and reflects how deeply the principles then insisted on must have sunk, during the succeeding twenty years, into the minds of the people, and what a consequent vigour and diffusion had been given to the democratic principle, his surprise at Pym's tone will cease. How much more flagrantly absurd is the appearance which Charles's pretensions assume!

On Pym's return to the House, he was thanked "for the good service he did them;"† and the original conference appointed with the Lords was directed to proceed. Pym and St. John, on the part of the Commons, persisted in claiming precedence for redress of grievances; but the dispute was interrupted in this stage by a message from Charles, demanding an immediate answer whether he was to have supply or not; and followed by a proposition from the elder Vane, now secretary of state, as well as treasurer of the household, that the king would give up his right to ship-money in consideration of a grant of twelve subsidies, payable in three years. Strenuous debates arose on this proposition. Pym and Hampden, backed by the more fearless patriots, objected, not only that the sum was too great, but that such a transaction would recognise the legality of ship-money. The court party, seconded by Hyde and the trimmers, urged the advantage of closing with the offer. The debates lasted two days. On the second day, after the House had sat from eight in the morning till five in the afternoon, debating two antagonist resolutions from Hampden and Hyde, the latter proposing to grant a supply "without naming the amount," Vane told the House distinctly that the king would accept nothing short of his original demand in amount and manner, and an instant adjournment was the consequence. At an early hour on the following morning the Parliament was dissolved.

Clarendon has ascribed this dissolution to the perfidy of Vane, and asserts that Charles himself repented of the act the instant after it was performed. But the king's solicitor, Herbert, is not accused of perfidy, and Clarendon admits that he seconded Vane's statement, while all the other privy counsellors present sanctioned it in silence. The truth is, that the noble historian wishes to make it appear that the House would have favoured his proposal in the end, whereas Vane interpreted the temper and disposition of the members far more truly.‡

Neither Laud nor his biographer have accused Vane; Secretary Windebanke declared at the time, that though the dissolution was "a very great disaster," there was "no other way;"* and, finally, the king himself has thoroughly repudiated the "case" his noble advocate strives to make out, by one of his own accustomed and deliberate acts of imbecile rage and madness. Some days after the dissolution, he consigned Mr. Crew, the chairman of the committee for religion, to the Tower, because that high-spirited gentleman refused to surrender certain petitions that had been intrusted to him, when their disclosure would have abandoned many clerical petitioners to the vengeance of their metropolitan. Two other members, Sir John Hotham and Mr. Bellasis, were also committed for refusing to disclose to the council what had passed in Parliament. And these proceedings were appropriately wound up by the issue of a declaration of reasons for the dissolution, in which, among other notable matters, Pym, Hampden, St. John, and the rest are thus described: "The ill-affected members of the House of Commons, instead of an humble and dutiful way of presenting their grievances to his majesty, have taken upon them to be the guiders and directors in all matters that concern his majesty's government, both temporal and ecclesiastical; and (as if kings were bound to give an account of their regal actions and of their manner of government to their subjects assembled in Parliament) they have, in a very audacious and insolent way, entered into examination and censuring of the present government, traduced his majesty's administration with as much malice as falsehood, in order to throw all into confusion; either out of disaffection to his majesty, or a mortal hatred to the Earl of Strafford, who had opposed his promotion, and whose ruin was then projecting. There was no guessing at the motives of Herbert's conduct; and though his views were different from Vane's, they both joined in representing the general humour and disaffection of the House to be so violent, that if the members came together again, they would pass such a vote against ship-money as would blast that revenue and other branches of the receipt. The noble historian from whom this relation is taken, and who bore so considerable a part in the debate, seems to have thought this representation exaggerated; but it may well be questioned whether his candid and favourable opinion of some persons, with whom he uncharitably concurred in many of their measures, and whose dark designs he had not yet discovered, did not bias his judgment; and there was certainly a great failure at least of his memory in the accounts he gives of the debates, as if they had taken up two days, whereas what he says of them passed only on the second day (Monday), when the proposal of twelve subsidies was made, and embarrassed the question. On Saturday, the debate could only turn on the single point whether a supply should or should not be granted. If this question was not then put, it must be imputed to the strength of the party which was for postponing the supply till after the redress of grievances, and had the day before, by a majority of 257 to 148, rejected the Lords' desire of a present conference, because they would not be diverted from prosecuting the business of ship-money. Whoever likewise considers the whole tenour of proceedings in this Parliament, and compares them with those of the disaffected faction in the former Parliaments of this reign, after which it copied, and observes that a day for the judicial hearing of the cause of ship-money, in order to repeal the sentence of the judges, had been appointed without any appearance of an opposition, and was actually come, will be apt to think it not ill founded. * His majesty could scarce entertain better hopes, or expect different measures, from an assembly whose proceedings were chiefly directed by Pym and Hampden; two whole days spent in debates, without coming to a conclusion or putting a question, showed sufficiently an indisposition to grant a supply; all appearances countenanced the suggestion of these terrible votes about ship-money, and other branches of the revenue, which would have been the utter ruin of his majesty's affairs."

* See the Clarendon State Papers, vol. ii., p. 86.

* Old Parl. Hist., vol. viii., p. 435.

† Ibid.

‡ I subjoin a passage from a historian who equally admires both Clarendon and the king, and which seems to me to set the question at rest. Carte, in his General History, vol. iv., p. 281, 282, says: "From the part Vane acted soon after, he was supposed to have given those assurances of justice, and rendered, as much as in them lay, odious to the rest of his majesty's subjects, not only the officers and ministers of state, but even his majesty's very government."

On the occasion of this dissolution there was no violence, no protest, no show of resistance in the smallest degree on the part of the Commons. Everything was deep, settled, calm: if there was a ruffle on the surface, it was one of joy. Hitherto the faces of sagacious men had darkened at a Parliament's dissolution, but they were serene and smiling now. "It was observed," says Clarendon, "that in the countenances of those who had most opposed all that was desired by his majesty, there was a marvellous serenity; nor could they conceal the joy of their hearts, for they knew enough of what was to come to conclude that the king would be shortly compelled to call another Parliament. Within an hour after the dissolving, Mr. Hyde met Mr. Saint John, who had naturally a great cloud in his face, and very seldom was known to smile, but then had a most cheerful aspect; and seeing the other melancholic, as in truth he was from his heart, asked him what troubled him; who answered, that the same that troubled him, he believed, troubled most good men: that in such a time of confusion, so wise a Parliament, which alone could have found remedy for it, was so unseasonably dismissed; the other answered, with a little warmth, 'That all was well; and that it must be worse before it could be better; and that this Parliament could never have done what was necessary to be done.'"

The reflection of the joy which thus lighted up the countenance of St. John exhibited itself in the short-sighted multitude in the forms of turbulence and insurrection; and Clarendon takes the opportunity of observing that a general impression prevailed, that such a set of sober and dispassionate men, or fewer who brought ill purposes with them, as had gone to the formation of the House just dissolved, would never meet in Parliament again. This is simply one of Clarendon's thousand attempts to mislead the judgment. A comparison of the lists of the Parliaments of April and November* will at once convince the reader that the so terrible change for the court was in the times, and not the men.

From the instant of the dissolution Pym's exertions were truly extraordinary. The party, and the purposes of the party, were now to be organized for the last time. "Mr. Pym," says Clarendon, "continued after the unhappy dissolution for the most part about London, in conversation and great repute amongst those lords who were most strangers to the court, and were believed most averse to it; in whom he improved all imaginable jealousies and discontents towards the state." There is no doubt that a close correspondence with the Scotch commissioners was now entered into, under the management of himself and Hampden; and two places, Broughton Castle, in Oxfordshire, the seat of Lord Say,† and Faws-ley, in Northamptonshire, the house of Sir Richard Knightley (whose son had married Hampden's daughter), were, from their position with reference to the North Road, and their easy distance from London, fixed upon for the purposes of frequent consultation.* Pym, Hampden, and St. John, with Lords Say and Brook, and, somewhat later in the year, the Earls of Bedford, Warwick, and Essex, Lord Holland, Nathaniel Fiennes, and young Vane, here held their meetings; and a private press, which Sir Richard Knightley's father had established at Fawsley, was brought into constant requisition. Whenever, on the other hand, necessity obliged the meetings to be held in London, they took place at Pym's house in Gray's Inn Lane, from whence various reports were instantly communicated to the chief places in the country.†

Meanwhile the disastrous war with Scotland was dragging the king daily, as Pym had foretold, to the feet of his subjects. Not a day now passed over the heads of the court party without accumulating upon them some fresh evidences of weakness or dishonour. The melancholy part which Strafford was forced to play has been already told. In the midst of their worst distresses, when Charles had been driven back to York after the disgraceful affair of Newbourn, and when, as Laud expresses it, the king's counsellors were "at the wall,"‡ Secretary Windebanke wrote to inform them of the frequent assemblage in London and elsewhere of certain persons of quality, mentioning Pym, Hampden, Lords Say, Russell, and Brook, who, he said, had prevailed with some lords to join them, "that had been observed not to be very well contented at the time, namely, the Earls of Essex, Warwick, and Bedford." These meetings, Windebanke added, were much apprehended to be "for some dangerous practice or intelligence with the rebels of Scotland." In Charles's worst moments of terror and alarm, he could not divest himself of his habits of deceit and perfidy. He now thought to avert the danger closing round him by imposing on his people something of the show of a Parliament, which should induce them to give what every arbitrary expedient had again failed in procuring, and disarm the popular leaders of their resources. Accordingly, upon a precedent of Edward III.'s time, he summoned to York a "council of peers." While his people, under the guidance ings were usually heard amongst them, to the admiration of those who lived in the house, who could not see or discover the persons themselves."

* Some have been found to charge dangerous consultations, years before this date, upon the same places. In a pamphlet (part 13 of No. 113 of King's Pamphlets), entitled, "The English Pope," published on 1st of July, 1643 (from MS. note), I find the following (p. 39): "It is reported that the Lord Digby, of late being at Mr. Knightley's house in Northamptonshire, in a parlour there, whilst his souldiers were busily searching, and plundering; and rifling other rooms, hee smote his hand upon the table, and swore 'that that was the table whereat all these civil wars had been plotted at least a dozen years before.' It should seem Mr. Pym had sojourned some time in that house, and that was sufficient for an inference that the nest of Anabaptists had been there too, and that that nest had studied something which neither our king's cabinet counsellors, nor the junks of Italy or Spaine, could make defeasible."

† Windebanke's letter in the second volume of Clarendon's State Papers.

‡ Hardwicke, State Papers, vol. ii., p. 168.

* In Nalson, the Old Parliamentary History, or Rushworth.

† "It was much observed," says Echard, "that in the Lord Say's house there was a particular room, and a passage to it, which his servants were not permitted to come near; and when the company was complete, great noise and talk-of Pym and Hampden, were advancing with giant strides into the just and responsible governments of the future, this imbecile man proposed to satisfy them by crawling back into precedents of the comparatively barbarous times of England!

As soon as this measure was made public, Pym saw that his work was accomplished. He prepared a petition for a Parliament; placed, with their consent, the names of Bedford, Hertford, Essex, and Warwick at its head; and, with Hampden and St. John, repaired to York.* Eight more signatures were here obtained from the peers then assembled, and the petition was presented to the king. Bedford and Hertford, being called to a conference with the committee of state on the subject, declared boldly that they acted, not for themselves alone, but in trust for "many other noblemen, and most of the gentry in several parts of the kingdom." A second petition was forwarded to the committee immediately after from the hands of Pym, also praying for a Parliament, and subscribed by 10,000 citizens of London.† Other petitions from different quarters, but with the same prayer, reached York at the same moment; and the king, hunted through all his father's shifts and expedients of "kingeraft," issued writs for a new Parliament on the 3d of November.

And now again, without the pause of an instant, Pym and Hampden were seen in the discharge of their great duty as chiefs and advisers of the people. It is stated in several books of the time, and repeated by many of the historians,‡ that between the interval of the issue of the writs and the elections, they rode through every county in England, urging the electors to their duty. Warwick, Brook, and Bedford, Lord Kimbolton (the Earl of Manchester's son), Fiennes (Lord Say's second son), and the younger Vane, exerted themselves, meanwhile, in their respective districts; and Warwick soon wrote to his Essex friends from York, so recently the headquarters of the king, that "the game was well begun." The party of the king were not less active, but they were less successful.

In the opinion of the great mass of the people, Pym was the author of this Parliament—by the common consent of all, he was to be

* "At the same time," says Clarendon, "some lords from London (of known and since published affections to that invasion) attended his majesty at York with a petition, signed by others, eight or ten in the whole, who were craftily persuaded by the liaguers there, Mr. Pym, Mr. Hampden, and Mr. Saint John, to concur in it, being full of duty and modesty enough, without considering that nothing else at that time could have done mischief, and so suffered themselves to be made instruments towards those ends which in truth they abhorred."—Clarendon, vol. i., p. 259.

† The lord-mayor had been implored to suppress this petition, but refused.

‡ Echard; Carte; Warwick; Anthony Wood.

§ I find this in a curious pamphlet of the time, which I was not able to discover in the king's collection, but which I purchased from Mr. Rodd, of Newport-street, to whose intelligence and liberality so many historical collectors have to confess their obligations. The pamphlet is a petition sent up to the king by large numbers of the common people, at the time of his attempted impeachment for high treason; and among answers to the king's charges against Pym, contains the following: "In the fifth article he is impeached, 'that he hath traitorously endeavoured to subvert the rights and very being of Parliaments.' To this we may answer with great facility, he was the chief cause that this Parliament was assembled, and it seems very incongruous that he should subvert the same."

placed in the position of its leader. Preparing himself for that great office, he well knew that the highest duty of his life, and the most fatal, there awaited him. He was to keep his old appointment with Wentworth, now the Earl of Strafford. Any allusion to this illustrious man has been hitherto avoided as much as possible, since a previous portion of this work was devoted to an analysis of his character and actions; and little allusion will even now be necessary for those who have had that analysis before them. Pym judged Wentworth's course as a minister too truly when, on the occasion of their separation twelve years before, he had threatened him with a visionary doom. The twelve years had realized one of the greatest geniuses for despotic government that the world has known; but they had also strengthened, with an almost superhuman power of popular resistance, the mind of Pym. Wentworth himself had received occasional very ominous proofs of this, and some correspondence passed concerning it between himself and the king; but Pym's silence respecting the minister in his famous speech of the preceding April, instead of seeming most ominous of all, had driven back, for a time, the fear of danger. The conduct of the great opposition leader, however, after the dissolution, recalled Strafford's worst apprehensions; and on the disastrous failure of his Scotch expedition, he prayed the king to be allowed to return to his Irish government. But the genius of Strafford was the king's last and only hope; and, pledging a "royal word" that not "a hair of his head" should be touched by the Parliament, the king ordered his minister's presence in London. Charles himself knew not so well as Pym how much Strafford's genius was indeed his last resource. And how much less did he know, that while he pledged his word for Strafford's safety, a few weightier words, lingering yet in the mind of Pym, would bring to the people's service the Tower and the Block, and break, in one short instant, that spell of arbitrary power with which he and his father, and the worst ministers of both, had been for upward of thirty years struggling to subdue the rising liberties! In the death of Strafford, Pym saw that the prestige of royalty, which had hitherto, in Charles's worst extremities, availed so much, would be utterly overthrown.

On the 3d of November the Long Parliament met. There are few well-informed students of English history who, with a fearless and frank admission of the errors of this illustrious assembly, do not pause with emotion at the mention of its name, mindful that there is scarcely a privilege of good and safe government now enjoyed by the common people of England that does not justly date from its commencement. The day that witnessed that commencement was a bright day for every one in England, save the ministers and apologists for tyranny. "It had a sad and melancholic aspect," says Lord Clarendon, "upon the first entrance, which presaged some unusual and unnatural events. The king himself did not ride with his accustomed equipage nor in his usual majesty to Westminster, but went privately in his barge to the Parliament stairs, and after to the church, as if it had been to a return of a prorogued or adjourned Parliament. And there was likewise an untoward, and, in truth, an unheard-of accident, which broke many of the king's measures, and infinitely disordered his service beyond a capacity of reparation. From the time the calling a Parliament was resolved upon, the king designed Sir Thomas Gardiner, who was recorder of London, to be speaker in the House of Commons; a man of gravity and quickness, that had somewhat of authority and gracefulness in his person and presence, and in all respects equal to the service. There was little doubt but that he would be chosen to serve in one of the four places for the city of London, which had very rarely rejected their recorder upon that occasion; and, lest that should fail, diligence was used in one or two other places that he might be elected. But the opposition was so great and the faction so strong to hinder his being elected in the city, that four others were chosen for that service, without hardly mentioning his name; nor was there less industry used to prevent his being chosen in other places." This incident was indeed an omen of ill promise for the court. It was in that day the invariable usage to select a speaker on the king's private recommendation; yet on this occasion, without the smallest appearance of discourtesy, the slavish usage, by means of the admirable organization of the popular party, was warded off. The king, taken by surprise, and obliged to name another member hastily, recommended Lenthall, then only known as a practising barrister.

The members assembled in great crowds to hear the king's speech. All the chief leaders of the Commons were there: Pym (who had again been returned, with Lord William Russel, for Tavistock), Hampden (who sat for Buckinghamshire), St. John, Denzil Hollis, Nathaniel Fiennes, the younger Vane; and, still acting with the people, Lord Digby (the fantastically chivalrous son of the Earl of Bristol), Lord Falkland, and Edward Hyde. The chief popular peers were present also: Francis Russel, earl of Bedford (between whom and Pym there had been the friendship and mutual counsel of a life); William Fiennes and Robert Greville; Lords Say and Brooke; Robert Devereux, earl of Essex; the brothers Henry and Robert Rich, earls of Holland and Warwick; and Edward Montague, lord Kimbolton, son of the Earl of Manchester. Upon the faces of almost all these men, Clarendon says, there was a "marvellous elated" expression, and he proceeds to remark of the members of the Commons, that "the same men who six months before were observed to be of very moderate tempers, and to wish that gentle remedies might be applied, without opening the wound too wide and exposing it to the air, and rather to cure what was amiss than too strictly to make inquisition into the causes and original of the malady, talked now in another dialect both of things and persons." The truth was, that as Mr. Hyde was returning from the House of Lords through Westminster, he fell into conversation with Pym, and that bold statesman, sounding Hyde with some distrust of his honesty, cared no longer to conceal his own prospects or his temper. The anecdote is worth giving in the words of one of the parties.

"Mr. Hyde, who was returned to serve for a borough in Cornwall, met Mr. Pym in Westminster Hall, and conferring together upon the state of affairs, the other told Mr. Hyde 'that they must now be of another temper than they were the last Parliament; that they must not only sweep the house clean below, but must pull down all the cobwebs which hung in the top and corners, that they might not breed dust, and so make a foul house hereafter; that they had now an opportunity to make their country happy by removing all grievances, and pulling up the causes of them by the roots, if ALL MEN WOULD DO THEIR DUTIES;' and used much other sharp discourse to the same purpose; by which it was discerned that the warmest and boldest counsels and overtures would find a much better reception than those of a more temperate allay, which fell out accordingly."

The first week was devoted to the appointment of committees and the reception of petitions. "Troops of horsemen," says Whitelocke, "came from several counties with petitions for redress of grievances and exorbitancies in Church and State."* One or two sharp debates arose on the presentation of these petitions, but Pym took no share in them. On the 10th of November, Lord Strafford arrived in London.

On the 11th of November, Pym suddenly rose in his place in the House of Commons, stated that he had matter of the highest importance to lay before the House, and desired that the strangers' room should be cleared, the outer door of the House locked, and the keys laid upon the clerk's table. What followed this ominous announcement must be given chiefly in the words of one of the members present, since the destruction of this portion of the journals has left us without any other record of the momentous scene that passed.

"Mr. Pym," says Clarendon, "in a long formed discourse, lamented the miserable state and condition of the kingdom, aggravated all the particulars which had been done amiss in the government, as 'done and contrived maliciously and upon deliberation, to change the whole frame, and to deprive the nation of all the liberty and property which was their birth-right by the laws of the land; which were now no more considered, but subjected to the arbitrary power of the privy council, which governed the kingdom according to their will and pleasure; these calamities falling upon us in the reign of a pious and virtuous king, who loved his people, and was a great lover of justice.' And thereupon enlarging in some specious commendation of the nature and goodness of the king, that he might wound him with less suspicion, he said, 'We must inquire from what fountain these waters of bitterness flowed; what persons they were who had so far insinuated themselves into his royal affections as to be able to pervert his excellent judgment, to abuse his name, and wickedly apply his authority to countenance and support their own corrupt designs. Though he doubted there would be many found of this class who had contributed their joint endeavours to bring this misery upon the nation, yet he believed there was one more signal in that administration than the rest, being a man of great parts and contrivance, and of great industry to bring what he designed to pass; a man who, in the memory of many present, had sat in that House an earnest vindicator of the laws, and a most zealous assertor and champion for the liberties of the people, but long since turned apostate from those good affections, and, according to the custom and nature of apostates, was become the greatest enemy to the liberties of his country, and the greatest promoter of tyranny, that any age had produced; and then he named 'the EARL of STRAFFORD, lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and lord-president of the council established in York for the northern parts of the kingdom; who,' he said, 'had in both places, and in all other provinces wherein his service had been used by the king, raised ample monuments of his tyrannical nature; and that he believed, if they took a short survey of his actions and behaviour, they would find him the principal author and promoter of all those counsels which had exposed the kingdom to so much ruin;' and to this end instanced some high and imperious actions done by him in England and in Ireland, some proud and over-confident expressions in discourse, and some passionate advices he had given in the most secret councils and debates of the affairs of state; adding some lighter passages of his vanity and amours, that they who were not inflamed with anger and detestation against him for the former, might have less esteem and reverence for his prudence and discretion; and so concluded, 'that they would well consider how to provide a remedy proportionable to the disease, and to prevent the farther mischiefs they were to expect from the continuance of this great man's power and credit with the king, and his influence upon his counsels.'"

* Whitelocke's Memorials.

† This is Rushworth's expression.

In this brief sketch we may trace the outlines of Pym's speech on this great occasion, and it is a fresh proof of his extraordinary powers. But the resources of a profound understanding are as inexhaustible as the human heart itself. Various adapting to his various hearers the eloquent austerity of his invective, behold Strafford at one moment elevated to the alarm of every wise patriot, and in the next shrunk below the contempt of the meanest person present! Passion, prejudice, patriotism, every emotion that can actuate the virtuous or the base, were called into existence by the orator. It may be to Pym's advantage or disadvantage to state this, but it was so. When he had ceased, there was but one flame raging through that great assembly, and the power of Strafford was blasted forever.

Meanwhile, as several members from every side of the House were swelling the general outcry against the accused, a message arrived from the Lords, desiring instant conference on a treaty with the Scots. Pym, at once suspecting that the extraordinary precautions which had just been taken respecting the exclusion of strangers had given surprise and perhaps alarm in certain quarters, and that these messengers had a very different object from their professed one, despatched them quickly with an answer to decline the meeting, on the ground of very weighty and important business; and at the same moment gave "such advertisement to some of the lords, that that House might likewise be kept from rising, which would otherwise very much have broken their measures."*

"In conclusion," proceeds Clarendon, "after many hours of bitter inveighing, and ripping up the course of the Earl of Strafford's life before his coming to court, and his actions after, it was moved, according to the secret resolution taken before, 'that he might be forthwith impeached of high treason;' which was no sooner mentioned than it found a universal approbation and consent from the whole House; nor was there, in all the debate, one person [not even Mr. Hyde] who offered to stop the torrent by any favourable testimony concerning the earl's carriage, save only that the Lord Falkland (who was very well known to be far from having any kindness for him), when the proposition was made for the present accusing him of high treason, modestly desired the House to consider 'whether it would not suit better with the gravity of their proceedings first to digest many of those particulars which had been mentioned by a committee before they sent up to accuse him, declaring himself to be abundantly satisfied that there was enough to charge him;' which was very ingeniously and frankly answered by Mr. Pym, 'that such a delay might probably blast all their hopes, and put it out of their power to proceed farther than they had done already; that the earl's power and credit with the king, and with all those who had most credit with the king or queen, was so great, that when he should come to know that so much of his wickedness was discovered, his own conscience would tell him what he was to expect, and therefore he would undoubtedly procure the Parliament to be dissolved rather than undergo the justice of it, or take some other desperate course to preserve himself, though with the hazard of the kingdom's ruin; whereas, if they presently sent up to impeach him of high treason before the House of Peers, in the name and on the behalf of all the Commons of England, who were represented by them, the Lords would be obliged in justice to commit him into safe custody, and so sequester him from resorting to counsel, or having access to his majesty, and then they should proceed against him in the usual form with all necessary expedition.' These reasons of the haste they made," continues Clarendon, "so clearly delivered, gave that universal satisfaction, that, without farther considering the injustice and unreasonableness of it, they voted unanimously (for aught that appeared to the contrary by any avowed contradiction) that they would forthwith send up to the Lords, and accuse the Earl of Strafford of high treason, and several other crimes and misdemeanors, and desire that he might be presently sequestered from the council, and committed to safe custody; and Mr. Pym was made choice of for the messenger to perform that office."

After an interval of four hours, passed by many persons outside with intense and varied anxiety, the doors of the House of Commons opened at last to give way to Pym, who, issuing forth at the head of upward of 300 representatives of the English people, proceeded to the House of Lords, where "Mr. Pym, at the bar, and in the name of the lower House, and of all the Commons of England, impeached Thoinas, earl of Strafford, with the addition of all his other titles, of high treason.*

* Clarendon, vol. i., p. 302. Rushworth, vol. iv., p. 43.

The earl was already in the House, according to Clarendon,† when Pym appeared at the bar, and was even prepared with evidence of a correspondence between Pym and other popular leaders and the Scotch, supplied by the perfidy and forgery of Lord Savile, on which he designed at that very instant to accuse them of treason. According to the lively and graphic narrative of Baillie, however, Strafford had not yet entered the House with this view; but, after Pym's sudden appearance, the earl's is thus described: "The Lords began to consult on that strange and unexpected motion. The word goes in haste to the lord-lieutenant, where he was with the king; with speed he comes to the House; he calls rudely at the door; James Maxwell, keeper of the black rod, opens; his lordship, with a proud, glooming countenance, makes towards his place at the board-head. But at once many bid him void the house; so he is forced, in confusion, to go to the door till he was called. After consultation, being called in, he stands, but is commanded to kneel, and on his knees to hear the sentence. Being on his knees, he is delivered to the keeper of the black rod, to be prisoner till he was cleared of those crimes the House of Commons had charged him with. He offered to speak, but was commanded to be gone without a word. In the outer room, James Maxwell required him, as prisoner, to deliver his sword. When he had got it, he cries with a loud voice for his man to carry my lord-lieutenant's sword. This done, he makes through a number of people towards his coach, all gazing, no man capping to him before whom that morning the greatest of England would have stood discovered. Coming to the place where he expected his coach, it was not there; so he behoved to return that same way, through a world of gazing people. When at last he had found his coach, and was entering, James Maxwell told him, 'Your lordship is my prisoner, and must go in my coach,' and so he behoved to do. For some days too many went to visit him; but since, the Parliament hath commanded his keeping to be straiter."‡

The result proved this to have been what Pym anticipated, the master-stroke of the time. In whatever view, or with whatever sense it is regarded, whether of regret or admiration, it cannot be denied to have been, in its practical results, the greatest achievement of this great age of statesmanship. It struck instant terror into every quarter of the court, and left the king, for a time, powerless and alone.

Every resolution of the House of Commons, from the hour of Strafford's impeachment, took the shape of action. Every discussion ended in something done. Monopolists and patentees were at once declared incapable of serving in the House; the tax of ship-money, and the proceedings in Hampden's case, were declared subversive of property, of the laws, of the resolutions of former Parliaments, and the petition of rights; the new Church canons issued by Laud were condemned; and, on the 11th December, the London petition against the prelates and prelacy, signed by 15,000 citizens, and praying that that episcopal government, with all its dependancies, "roots and branches," might be abolished, was received in ominous silence by the House.

"William, lord-archbishop of Canterbury," was then, on the motion of Pym, accused of high treason; and Denzil Hollis carried up the accusation to the House of Lords.* The Scotch commissioners denounced him at the same time as an "incendiary in the national differences;" and, after ten weeks' confinement in the house of the usher of the black rod, the Tower received Laud also.

Informations were now lodged against Wren, bishop of Ely, for oppression and idolatry; and against Pierce, bishop of Bath and Wells, for corruption of religion; and those prelates were ordered to give large securities that they would abide the judgment of Parliament. Impeachments of treason were next prepared against Secretary Windebanke and Lord-keeper Finch. Windebanke escaped to France, and Finch fled to Holland.

"So that," says Clarendon, "within less than six weeks, for no more time was yet elapsed, these TERRIBLE REFORMERS had caused the two greatest counsellors of the kingdom, and whom they most feared and so hated, to be removed from the king, and imprisoned under an accusation of high treason; and frightened away the lord-keeper of the great seal of England, and one of the principal secretaries of state, into foreign kingdoms, for fear of the like; besides the preparing all the lords of the council, and very many of the principal gentlemen throughout England, who had been high sheriffs and deputy-lieutenants, to expect such measure of punishment from their general votes and resolutions as their future demeanour should draw upon them for their past offences.†

These gentlemen had no cause, except in their own consciences, to tremble. The leaders of this great Parliament sought a severe, but a just atonement. They struck down the chief abettors of tyranny in the kingdom, but pardoned its miserable agents. Their terrible inquisition passed over the various sheriffs who had lent their influence to the enforcement of ship-money, while it fixed itself on the servile judges who had prostituted the laws to its support. Bramstone, Davenport, Berkeley, Crawley, Trevor, and Weston were obliged to give securities in enormous sums that they would abide the judgment of Parliament;‡ while Sir Robert Berkeley, as the principal supporter of the iniquitous tax, was impeached of treason, publicly arrested in the King's Bench court, "taken from off the bench where he sat, and

* Clarendon's Hist., vol. i., p. 305.

† "It was about three of the clock in the afternoon when the Earl of Strafford (being infirm, and not well disposed in his health, and so not having stirred out of his house that morning), hearing that both Houses still sat, thought fit to go thither. It was believed by some (upon what ground was never clear enough) that he made that haste then to accuse the Lord Say and some others of having induced the Scots to invade the kingdom; but he was scarce entered into the House of Peers when the message from the House of Commons was called in."—History, vol. i., p. 350.

‡ Baillie's Letters, vol. i., p. 217.

* Whitelocke says in his Memorials (p. 39) that Pym carried it up; but this is an error. See Journals.

† Hist. of the Rebellion, vol. i., p. 311.

‡ The old clause, quandiu se bene gesserint, was also retained, in place of the durante bene placito. See Old Parl. Hist., vol. ix., p. 208.

carried away to prison; which struck a great terror in the rest of his brethren then sitting in Westminster Hall, and in all his profession."*

The speech which led to this latter startling step was delivered in the House of Commons on the 2d of December, and there is every reason to believe by Pym. It appears in pamphlets of the time without the speaker's name; but in Cromwell's Parliament of 1650, Sir Robert Goodwin brought forward a precedent which, he said, "was urged by John Pym in the Long Parliament," and the only resemblance to which is in the speech alluded to.† Some passages, indeed, at the commencement, would seem to discountenance this supposition of authorship, but the general tone and manner are, emphatically, those of the Long Parliament's most famous orator. In the sustained eloquence, the practical wisdom, the singular weight, gravity, and precision of language, and the careful protest it records against the hasty judgments of posterity, we feel the voice of Pym. Some passages are too remarkable to be omitted here. After a comparison of the body politic with the body natural—a favourite parallel with Pym—he thus proceeds:

"This Commonwealth is, Mr. Speaker, or should be, but one body; this House the great physician of all our maladies. But, alas! sir, of what afflicted part shall we poor patients complain first? Or, rather, of what shall we not complain! Are we not heart-sick! Is there in us that which God requires—unity, purity, and singularity of heart! Nay, is not religion, the soul of this body, so miserably distracted, that (I speak it not without terror) 'tis to be feared there is more confusion of religion among us than there was of tongues at the subversion of Babel! And is it not, then, high time that we understand one another, that we be reduced to one faith, one government? Sir, is the head whole—the seat of government and justice, the fountain from whose sweet influence all the inferior members of this body should receive both vigour and motion! Nay, hath not rather a general apoplexy, or palsy, taken or shaken all our members! Are not some dead; others buried quick; some dismembered; all disordered by the diversion of the course of justice? Is the liver, nature's exchequer, open, from whose free distribution each limb may receive his proper nutriment? or, rather, is it not wholly obstructed—our property taken from us! May it not justly be said of us,

"Sic vos non vobis fertis Aratra?"

The hard destiny which for so many years had attended upon labour, is now described with a noble pathos; and those views respecting Church government are stated, which are ascribed, with the greatest justice, to Pym.

"Our ancestors drank the juice of their own vines, reaped and ate the fruit of their own harvest, but now the poor man's plough goes to furrow the seas—to build ships! We labour, not for ourselves, but to feed the excrescences of nature—things grown up out of the ruins of the natural members—monopolists! Sir, these are maxima vitalia—religion, justice, property—the heart, the head, the liver of this great body; and these being so distempered or obstructed, can the subordinate parts be free! The truth is, all is so far out of frame, that to lay open every particular grievance were to drive us into despair of a cure; in so great confusion, where to begin first requires not much less care than what to apply. Mr. Speaker, I know 'tis a right motion to begin with setting God's house in order first. Whoever presses that moves with such advantage, that he is sure no man will gainsay him. 'Tis a well-becoming zeal to prefer religion before our own affairs; and, indeed, 'tis a duty not to be omitted, where they are in equal danger; but in cures of the body politic or natural, we must prefer the most pressing exigencies. Physicians know that consumptions, dropsies, and such like lingering diseases are more mortal, more difficult to cure, than slight external wounds; yet if the least vein be cut, they must neglect their greater cures to stop that, which, if neglected, must needs exhaust the stock of nature, and produce a dissolution of the whole man. A defection from the duties of our religion is a consumption to any state: no foundation is firm that is not laid in Christ. The denial of justice, the abridgment of our liberties, are such an obstruction as renders the Commonwealth leprous; but the wounds in our property let out the life blood of the people. The reformation of Church government must necessarily be a work of much time; and, God be thanked, the disease is not desperate. We serve one God, we believe in one Christ, and we all acknowledge and profess one Gospel. The stop of justice can yet injure but particulars. 'Tis true, there may be many, too many, instances of strange oppressions, great oppressors, but 'twill be hard to judge the conclusion: et sic de ceteris. But take from us the property of our estates, our subsistence, we are no more a people: this is that vein which hath been so deep cut, so far exhausted, that to preserve our being we must double stop this current. IT WILL BE TIME ENOUGH TO SETTLE RULES TO LIVE BY WHEN WE ARE SURE TO LIVE."

While this, as contrasted with Pym's tone in the Parliament of April, is a perfect illustration of his present change of temper, it was also, it cannot be doubted, intended to vindicate himself from a charge which I find brought against him by more than one of the Puritans at the time—a lukewarmness concerning the bold questions of episcopal government,* in favour of the more practical strokes of policy by which he sought, first of all, to assault and take by storm the strongholds of the government of the king. The last words of the passage just quoted are a noble defence of what he had done and was about to do, with this great view. In truth, the difficulties of the period, the considerations which should weigh with posterity against a hasty judgment of the most startling measures, were never so weightily expressed

* "Known," says Clarendon, speaking of Pym at this time, "to be inclined to the Puritan party, yet not of those furious resolutions against the Church as the other leading men were, and wholly devoted to the Earl of Bedford, who had nothing of that spirit."—History, vol. i., p. 323. Pym was, in fact, like Selden, and the majority of lawyers in the House of Commons, a disciple of Erastus in matters of Church government.

* Whitelocke's Memorials, p. 39.

† See Burton's Diary (so admirably edited by that intelligent, accomplished, and long-devoted friend to the popular cause, Mr. John Towill Rutt), vol. iii., p. 120.

as in these few words. The first aim was to save the life of the republic, the next was to govern it.

"Mr. Speaker," he continued, "he that well weighs this little word property, or propriety, in our estates, will find it of a large extent. The leeches that have suck'd this blood have been excise, benevolence, loans, impositions, monopolies, military taxes, ship-money, cum multis aliis—all which spring from one root. And is it not high time to grub up that root that brings forth such fruit! Shall we first stand to lop the branches one by one, when we may down with all at once! He that, to correct an evil tree which brings forth bad fruit, shall begin at the master-bough, and so lop downwards, is in danger to fall himself before the tree falls. The safer and speedier way is to begin at the root; and there, with submission, would I lay the axe.

"The root of most of our present mischiefs, and the ruin of all posterity, I hold to be those extra-judicial judgments I cannot say, but rather) dooms, delivered by all the judges under their hands out of court, yet recorded in all courts, to the subversion of all our fundamental laws and liberties, and the annihilation, if not confiscation, of all our estates: 'that, in case of danger, the king may impose upon his subjects; and that he is the sole judge of the danger, necessity, and proportion.' This, in brief, is to take what, when, and where he will; which, though delivered in the time of a gracious and merciful prince, who, we hope, will not wrest it beyond our abilities, yet, when left to the interpretation of a succeeding tyrant, if ever this nation be so unfortunate to fall into the hands of such, it is a record wherein every man might read himself a slave that reads it; having nothing he can call his own, but all prostitute to the will of another.

"What to do in such a case, we are not to seek for precedents. Our honourable ancestors taught us, in the just and exemplary punishments of Chief-justice Tresilian and his complices,* for giving their judgments out of Parliament, against the established laws of Parliament, how tender they were of us. How careful, then, ought we to be to continue those laws, and to preserve the liberty of our posterity! I am far from maligning the person, nor in my heart wish I the execution, of any man; but certainly it shall be a justice well becoming this House to lay their heads at his majesty's mercy, who laid us under his feet—who had made us but tenants at will of our liberties and our estates. And though I cannot but approve of mercy as a great virtue in any prince, yet I heartily pray it prove a precedent as safe and useful to this oppressed state as that of justice!"

The force and condensation of these passages are wonderful indeed. But what follows is yet more striking, when taken as a great appeal to the future.

"Mr. Speaker, blasted may that tongue be that shall in the least degree derogate from the glory of those halcyon days our fathers enjoyed during the government of that ever-blessed, never-to-be-forgotten royal Elizabeth. But certainly I may safely say, without detraction, it was much advantage to the peace and prosperity of her reign, that the great examples of Empson and Dudley were then fresh in memory. The civility of our law tells us that the king can do no wrong; but then only is the state secure when judges, their ministers, dare do none. Since our times have found the want of such examples, 'tis fit we leave some to posterity! God forbid all should be thought or found guilty; there are doubtless some ringleaders; let us sift them out. In public government, to pass by the innocent is equal injustice as to punish the innocent. An omission of that duty now will be a guilt in us, render us shamed in history, and cursed by posterity. Our gracious, and, in that act of voluntary justice, most glorious king, hath given up, to the satisfaction of his afflicted people, the authors of their ruins. THE POWER OF FUTURE PRESERVATION IS NOW IN US. Et qui non servat patriam cum potest, idem tradit destruenti patriam. What though we cannot restore the damage of the Commonwealth, we may yet repair the breaches in the bounds of monarchy; though it be with our loss and charge, we shall so leave our children's children fenced as with a wall of safety, by the restoration of our laws to their ancient vigour and lustre!

"'Tis too true that it is to be feared the revenues of the crown, sold outright, would scarce remunerate the injuries or repay the losses of this suffering nation since the pronouncing of that fatal sentence. What proportionable satisfaction, then, can this Commonwealth receive in the punishment of a few inconsiderable delinquents! But 'tis a rule valid in law, and approved in equity, that Qui non habent in crumēdā, luant in corpore; and 'tis, without all question, so in policy, that exemplary punishments conduce more to the safety of a state than pecuniary reparations. Hope of impunity lulls every bad great officer into security for his time; and who would not venture to raise a fortune, when the allurements of honour and wealth are so prevalent, if the worst that can fall be but restitution only? We see the bad effects of this bold erroneous opinion. What was, at first, but corrupt law, is since, by encouragement taken from their impunity, become false doctrine. The people are taught in pulpits 'that they have no property; kings instructed in that destructive principle 'that all is theirs;' and it is thence deduced into necessary state policy, and whispered in council, 'that he is no monarch who is bounded by any law.'

"By these bad consequences the best of kings hath been, by the infusion of such poisonous positions, diverted from the sweet inclinations of his own natural equity and justice; the very essence of a king having been taken from him, which is the preservation of his people. And whereas salus populi is, or should be, suprema lex, the power of undoing us is masked under the style of royal prerogative. And is it not high time for us to make examples of the first authors of this subverted law—bad counsel—worse doctrine! Let no man think to divert us from the pursuit of justice by poisoning the clear streams of our affections with jealous fears of his majesty's interruptions if we look too high. SHALL WE THEREFORE DOUBT OF JUSTICE, BECAUSE WE HAVE NEED OF GREAT JUSTICE! We may be confident, the king well knows, that his justice is the band of our allegiance—that it is the staff, the proof of his sovereignty.”

* These are the precedents alluded to by Goodwin, as having been urged "by John Pym in the beginning of the Long Parliament."

Never was a finer answer given to an often-repeated fallacy than is contained in that sudden question of the orator; and the following peroration seems to me quite unequalled in any ancient or modern speaker for its beauty and condensation of thought. Its commencement is indeed an absolute and final vindication of such men as Pym, who, professing themselves the advocates of monarchy, were soon obliged to strip from the monarch all his abused resources of prerogative.

“Tis a happy assurance, sir, of his majesty’s intention of grace to us, that our loyalty hath at last won him to tender the safety of his people. And certainly (all our pressures well weighed this twelve years last past) it will be found that the PASSIVE LOYALTY of a SUFFERING NATION HATH OUTDONE THE ACTIVE LOYALTY of ALL TIMES and STORIES. As the poet hath it, and I may as properly say, Fideliter fecimus. We have done loyalty to suffer so patiently.

“Fortiter, ille facit, qui miser esse potest;”

“Then, since our royal lord hath in mercy visited us, let us not doubt but in his justice he will redeem his people. Qui timide rogat, docet negare! When religion is innovated, our liberties violated, our fundamental laws abrogated, our modern laws already obsoleted, the property of our estates alienated—NOTHING LEFT US WE CAN CALL OUR OWN BUT OUR MISERY AND OUR PATIENCE—if ever any nation might justifiably, we certainly may now—now most properly, most seasonably cry out, and cry aloud, ‘Vel sacra regnet justitia, vel ruat cælum!’”

And in the full acceptance of the spirit of these words, Pym prosecuted the great work he had now in hand, scarcely so much, as he here explains, in the hope of achieving present happiness, as of securing the liberties and happiness of the future. He has been bitterly assailed by the enemies of freedom for urging forward the measures now in contemplation, on the ground that, their tendency being anti-monarchical, he thus, as an equally professed friend to liberty and to monarchy, gave the lie to his professions. But was this so? Has he not placed an undeniable refutation of it on record? The question had been reduced, in truth, as between Pym and the popular party, and Charles the First, to a question strictly personal. The nation had been brought into such a position by the government of Charles, as to make many of the hitherto undenied prerogatives of majesty incompatible, in the person of Charles, with freedom. This is not to be denied; nor can the high and weighty considerations involved in it be dismissed by any affected discussion of them in the “abstract,” or to the exclusion of the one grand element of the whole—the insincerity and perfidy of Charles himself.

In his opening speech of the session, the king had termed the Scots people “rebels.” A vote was now passed by the Commons decreeing £300,000 “for the friendly relief and aid, and towards the losses and necessities, of their brethren the Scots.”* Pym’s object, through all his measures at this time, was apparently to strengthen the democratic power so far above that of the prerogative as to enable the Commons to resist a dissolution, in case a dissolution should be threatened. He was so far successful in achieving it, that an open effort, to secure the continuance of Parliament was now thought advisable. And this in two short months! But the final stand had doubtless now been taken by Pym and the chief men of the party; and, with unswerving reliance on that political and religious faith of the people to which they had been educated by the struggles and miseries of so many years, they moved forward with a steadiness of aim and determination which bore down every opposing effort, and even every wish, against them. Clarendon, Falkland, and Digby were carried along with the stream. Up to this time, and far beyond it, we hear no whisper of resistance on the score of danger to the monarchy. “Truly, I am persuaded,” observes Clarendon, however, in a sort of self-vindication, “whatever design, either of alteration or reformation, was yet formed—I mean in the beginning of the Parliament—was only communicated between Mr. Pym, Mr. Hampden, Mr. Fiennes, Mr. St. John, the Earl of Bedford, the Lords Say and Kimbolton, who, together with the Earl of Rothes and the Lord Loudon (the Scots commissioners), managed and carried it on; and that neither the Earl of Essex, Warwick, nor Brooke himself—no, nor Mr. Hollis nor Strode, nor any of the rest, were otherwise trusted than upon occasion, and made use of according to their several gifts; but there was yet no manner of difficulty in swaying and guiding the affections of men, all having brought resolution and animosity enough against the excesses and exorbitancies that had been exercised in the former government, and dislike enough to the persons guilty of the same, and not yet discerning that there was any other intention than of a just and regular proceeding, and reformation upon both.” So far, at least, this is valuable testimony. It is a warrant, from the authority of the strongest professed friends to the monarchy, for the justice of the impeachment and attainder of Strafford, and for all the measures up to the period of his death.

We have seen Pym alluding, in one of his speeches, to two statutes of Edward III. for the holding of annual Parliaments. Upon this suggestion Mr. Prideaux now introduced a bill for yearly Parliaments, which, however, by the amendments received in committee,* was changed into a triennial measure. The most singular care and precaution were used in framing this statute: The issuing of writs was made imperative on the keeper of the great seal; in case of his failure, upon the Lords; on failure of the latter, upon the sheriffs; and, in the last resort, representatives might be chosen by the people themselves. Charles made a desperate effort to elude assent to this famous bill; but an assent was extorted from him, and the peo-

the third Parliament of Charles. Among the names specified I find those of Pym and Hampden: the last I take to be on the score of ship-money; but was not aware, before, that Pym had then also been subjected to imprisonment and loss.—Old Parl. Hist., vol. ix., p. 86.

* See Journals of the House, 30th Dec., 1640; and again, Journals of 9th January.

* Inquiries were also ordered into the losses suffered by various members of the House by fine and imprisonment after ple welcomed the event with bonfires and every mark of joy.*

Meanwhile Pym had abated none of his exertions in preparing for the impending trial of Strafford. A masterly series of twenty-eight articles of impeachment had been drawn up by himself and St. John, in which fourteen years of Strafford's life were set forth with wonderful force and precision; blending offences of various degrees, but so planned as to exhibit through them all the one grand offence charged upon the earl—an attempt to subvert the fundamental laws of the country. Information was now conveyed that Sir George Radcliffe was mainly relied upon by Strafford for the proof of his answers,† and Pym, well knowing Radcliffe to have been the wretched instrument of the lord-deputy's guilt throughout, instantly charged high treason upon him also. Radcliffe shortly after escaped; but an extract from Pym's speech in presenting the articles against him will not be thought inappropriate here.

"The earl," my lords, "is charged as an author; Sir George Radcliffe as an instrument and subordinate actor. The influence of superior planets is often augmented and enforced, but seldom mitigated, by the concurrence of the inferior, where merit doth arise, not from well doing, but from ill. The officiousness of ministers will rather add to the malignity of their instructions than diminish it, that so they may more fully ingratiate themselves with those upon whom they depend. In the crimes committed by the earl, there appears more haughtiness and fierceness, being acted by his own principles. Those motions are ever strongest which are nearer the primum mobile. But in those of Sir George Radcliffe there seems to be more baseness and servility, having resigned and subjected himself to be acted upon by the corrupt will of another. The Earl of Strafford hath not been bred in the study and practice of the law, and having stronger lusts and passions to incite, and less knowledge to restrain him, might more easily be transported from the rule. Sir George Radcliffe, in his natural temper and disposition being more moderate, and, by his education and profession, better acquainted with the grounds and directions of the law, was carried into his offences by a more immediate concurrence of will, and a more corrupt suppression of his own reason and judgment. My lords, as both these have been partners in offending, so it is the desire of the Commons they may be put under such trial and examination, and other proceedings of justice, as may bring them both to partake of a deserved punishment, for the safety and good of both kingdoms."

As the trial of Strafford approached, the king made an effort to save him by a compromise with the leaders of the opposition. White-locke's account of this negotiation‡ is unsatisfactory and obscure; but it is possible that, from some extracts I shall now make from Clarendon, a just notion of the whole transaction may be arrived at. This is the more necessary, since it has been made matter of grave accusation against the virtue of Pym and Hampden by a writer* who is not less distinguished by his genius than his zeal.

"From the time," says the noble historian, "that there was no more fear of the Archbishop of Canterbury, nor the lord-lieutenant of Ireland, nor of any particular men who were like to succeed them in favour, all who had been active in the court or in any service for the king being totally dispirited, and most of them to be disposed to any vile offices against him, the great patriots thought they might be able to do their country better service if they got the places and preferments in the court,† and so prevent the evil counsels which had used to spring from thence.

... The Earl of Bedford was to be treasurer; in order to which, the Bishop of London had already desired the king to receive the staff. And so the treasury was for the present put into commission. Mr. Pym was to be chancellor of the Exchequer. ... These two were engaged to procure the king's revenue to be liberally provided for,‡ and honourably increased

Mr. Hollis secretary of state, Mr. Hampden tutor to the prince; others to have other places. In order whereunto, the Bishop of London resigned up his treasurer's staff, the Lord Cottington his place of the master of the wards, and the rest were easily to be voided. But whether upon the king's alteration of his mind, or by whatever means it came to pass, is uncertain, these things were not effected, and the great men baffled thereby became the more incensed and violent against the earl, joining with the Scotch commissioners, who were implacable against him." The blank is supposed to have been left for Lord Bedford's name.

* Mr. Southey, in the Quarterly Review.

† In the spurious editions of Lord Clarendon—that is, in every edition published before the Oxford one of 1826, this passage stands thus: "if they got the places and preferments of the court for themselves." See Hist., vol. i., p. 369.

‡ I may here quote the charge which is subsequently brought by Clarendon (vol. iv., p. 438-439) against the memory of Pym, and which I have already (p. 149) adverted to. "The king at one time intended to make Mr. Pym chancellor of the Exchequer, for which he received his majesty's promise, and made a return of a suitable profession of his service and devotion; and thereupon, the other being no secret, somewhat declined from that sharpness in the House which was more popular than any man's, and made some overtures to provide for the glory and splendour of the crown; in which he had so ill success, that his interest and reputation then visibly abated, and he found that he was much better able to do hurt than good, which wrought very much upon him to melancholy, and complaint of the violence and discomposure of the people's affections and inclinations." If any period could have been carefully selected before another with a view to prove the utter falsehood of this charge, it had been this very time named by Lord Clarendon. Pym's interest and repute with the Commons was never so extraordinary and commanding as during and after the proceedings against Strafford, nor did it ever, as we shall see, in the slightest respect abate till after the disastrous reverses at the commencement of the civil war. Now observe upon what the spite of Lord Clarendon, for which truly there was natural and sufficient cause, seems, with even less reason than on the words quoted at p. 149, to have trumped up all this. In a pamphlet of the time, entitled "The Diurnal Occurrences of both Houses from the 3d of November, 1640, to the 3d of November, 1641," I find mention made of a debate respecting ship-money and tonnage and poundage, which took place on the 27th of November, 1640, and in which some words spoken by Selden gave rise to the following from Pym. The reader will recollect that the very step he here recommends was stated by him to be on the eve of being taken when the third Parliament was dissolved. "That morning, also, Master Pym, the great Parliament man, declared that they would make the king the richest man in all Christendom; and that they had no other intention, but that he should continue their king to govern them; and pressed he might have tonnage and poundage granted him by act of Parliament, which took well in the

* See Parl. Hist., and Stat. 16, Car. I., c. i. Clarendon's Hist., vol. i., p. 367.

† See Clarendon's Hist., vol. i., p. 377.

‡ These are his words: "But there was a proposal (the subject of much discourse) to prevent all this trouble, and to restore the Earl of Strafford to his former favour and honour, if the king would prefer some of the grantees to offices at court, whereby Strafford's enemies should become his friends, and the king's desires be promoted. It was, that — should be made lord-treasurer, the Lord Say master of the wards, Mr. Pym chancellor of the Exchequer, and settled; and that this might be the better done, the Earl of Bedford prevailed with the king, upon the removals mentioned before, to make Oliver St. John his solicitor-general, which his majesty readily consented to, hoping that he would have been very useful in the present exigence to support his service in the House of Commons, where his authority was then great; at least, that he would be ashamed ever to appear in any thing that might prove prejudicial to the crown. And he became immediately possessed of that office of great trust, and was so well qualified for it at that time, by his fast and rooted malignity against the government, that he lost no credit with his party, out of any apprehension or jealousy that he would change his side; and he made good their confidence, not in the least degree abating his malignant spirit, or dissembling it, but with the same obstinacy opposed every thing which might advance the king's service, when he was his solicitor, as ever he had done before. The Lord Say was to be master of the wards, and Denzil Hollis secretary of state. Thus far the intrigue for preferments was entirely complied with; and it is great pity that it was not fully executed, that the king might have had some able men to have advised or assisted him, which probably these very men would have done after they had been so thoroughly engaged. . . . But the Earl of Bedford was resolved that he would not enter into the treasury till the revenue was in some degree settled; at least, the bill for tonnage and poundage passed, with all decent circumstances, and for life; which both he and Mr. Pym did very heartily labour to effect, and had in their thoughts many good expedients by which they intended to raise the revenue of the crown. And none of them were very solicitous to take their promotions before some other accommodations were provided for some of the rest of their chief companions, who would be neither well pleased with their so hasty advancement before them, nor so submissive in the future to follow their dictates. Hampden was a man they could not leave unprovided for, and therefore there were several designs, and very far driven, for the satisfaction and promotion of him, and Essex, and Kimbolton, and others, though not so fully concluded as those before mentioned. For the king's great end was, by these compliances, to save the life of the Earl of Strafford, and to preserve the Church from ruin; for nobody thought the archbishop in danger of his life. And there were few of the persons mentioned before who thought their preferments would do them much good if the earl were suffered to live; but in that of the Church, the major part even of those persons would have been willing to have satisfied the king; the rather because they had no reason to think the two Houses, or, indeed, either of them, could have been induced to have pursued the contrary. And so the continued and renewed violence in the prosecution of the Earl of Strafford made the king well contented House; but stood upon it to have grievances first reformed, and so it was left at large." So that here, immediately after Strafford and Laud had been yielded to the Tower, and long before any compromise of office was thought of, we find Pym simply recommending what the third Parliament wished to have done, with a condition which it is even possible that Parliament would have dispensed with; and this is twisted into the charge first quoted, to gratify the spleen and spite of a personal and political opponent.

(as the other reasons prevailed with the other persons) that the putting of those promotions in practice should be for a time suspended."* And in a subsequent passage, Lord Clarendon, probably without intending it, supplies some very singular and serviceable comments on his present account of these transactions. "If that stratagem," he says, "of winning men by places had been practised as soon as the resolution was taken at York to call a Parliament (in which, it was apparent, dangerous attempts would be made, and that the court could not be able to resist those attempts), and if Mr. Pym, Mr. Hampden, and Mr. Hollis had been then preferred with Mr. Saint John before they were desperately embarked in their desperate designs, and had innocence enough about them to trust the king and be trusted by him (having yet contracted no personal animosities against him), it is very possible that they might either have been made instruments to have done good service, or at least been restrained from endeavouring to subvert the royal building, for supporting whereof they were placed as principal pillars. But the rule the king gave himself (very reasonable at another time), that they should first do service, and compass this or that thing for him, before they should receive favour, was then very unseasonable; since, besides that they could not in truth do him that service without the qualification, it could not be expected they would desert that side, by the power of which they were sure to make themselves considerable, without an unquestionable mark of interest in the other, by which they were to keep up their power and reputation. And so, whilst the king expected they should manifest their inclinations to his service by their temper and moderation in those proceedings that most offended him, and they endeavoured, by doing all the hurt they could, to make evident the power they had to do him good, he grew so far disoblinded and provoked that he could not in honour gratify them, and they so obnoxious and guilty that they could not think themselves secure in his favour; and thence, according to the policy and method of injustice, combined to oppress that power they had injured, and to raise a security for themselves by disabbling the king to question their transgressions."†

Now surely there cannot remain a doubt, after a careful observation of these extracts, of the precise nature and conduct of the "compromise" which Whitelocke has so imperfectly and obscurely stated. It is quite clear that Pym and Lord Bedford never for an instant contemplated the restoration of Strafford as their condition of entering office. It is here acknowledged that the thought of office was only entertained by the patriots on the understanding that Strafford and Laud, with all their evil counsels, were silenced forever; and it is proved, in the case of St. John, that the great body of the opposition had sufficient faith in their leaders to see them assume office without the fear that they would "change sides." Doubtless, when the negotiation was first entered on, some pledge for what is called by Clarendon the "security of the Church" was given by Pym, since there was nothing in his opinions on that subject* that should have raised up an insurmountable obstacle. The ecclesiastical constitution of England, as it existed in that day, apart from Laud's gross administration, and as it exists now, is as nearly as possible Erastian in theory, and almost wholly Erastian in practice. But, admitting that such a pledge was given, it is to be observed, also, that neither Pym nor Lord Bedford would consent to treat with the king on any narrow or personal consideration—the people were to have a secure guarantee for a thoroughly and completely popular ministry. "Neither of them were very solicitous to take their promotions before accommodations were provided for the rest of their chief companions." And why was the whole negotiation suddenly broken off? Because of a "continued and renewed violence in the prosecution of the Earl of Strafford," is the distinct reply of Clarendon; because none of the popular statesmen "thought their preferment would do them much good if the earl were suffered to live." It is true that the same writer, in another part of his voluminous work, has apparently a partial contradiction of this; but its precise terms are worth notice. "The Earl of Bedford secretly undertook to his majesty that the Earl of Strafford's life should be preserved, and to procure his revenue to be settled as amply as any of his progenitors."† Here Pym's name is omitted, and the "secrecy" of the undertaking alluded to would seem to imply treachery on the part of Lord Bedford to his political associates. Now Clarendon is not the best authority to receive such an accusation from. Laud, though he was then a prisoner, had ample opportunity of making himself master of the state of parties and affections, and his testimony may be taken with greater confidence. He accuses the Earl of Bedford with remaining "savagely" intractable respecting the death of Strafford. "The earl," he says, in his diary, "being thus laid low, and his great services done in Ireland made part of his accusation, I cannot but observe two things: the one, that upon Sunday morning before, Francis, earl of Bedford (having about a month before lost his second son, in whom he most joyed), died, the smallpox striking into his brain. This lord was one of the main plotters of Strafford's death; and I know where he, with other lords, before the Parliament sat down, resolved to have his blood. But God would not let him live to take joy therein, but cut him off in the morning, whereas the bill for the Earl of Strafford's death was not signed till night," &c.

* Hist., vol. i., p. 369-372.

† Hist. of Rebel., vol. ii., p. 60, 61.

This, then, is the conclusion to which all impartial men must come respecting this much-disputed passage of history—that whatever shape or ultimate purpose these proposed changes might have assumed in the mind of Charles, they have left unsullied the motives of Pym and Hampden. With the king the negotiation may have been merely a stratagem of despair, but with the patriots it was entertained with a sincere and bonâ fide hope of serving the cause, and possibly of saving the king. Happy would the issue, in all probability, have proved for England; but, whether or no, little did Pym and Hampden then deserve to have it said of them, in after times, that they only "wanted places and power; and being disappointed in their expectations, they determined upon shedding the blood of the man with whom, if they might have been taken into office, they were willing to have coalesced."* Granting, for an instant, that it were possible to reconcile such a charge with our impressions of virtue of the accused, how could it consist with their undisputed genius? They had been shortsighted fools, and not wise statesmen, to have hazarded such an outrage on that people whose confidence had given them their power. Mr. Southey is an able and unflinching defender of his party; but when he sees the propriety of withdrawing this remark, he will be the last to refuse such a concession to truth.†

* "In the House of Commons, though of the chief leaders, Nathaniel Fiennes and young Sir Harry Vane, and shortly after Mr. Hampden (who had not before owned it), were believed to be for root and branch; which grew shortly after a common expression, and discovery of the several tempers; yet Mr. Pym was not of that mind, nor Mr. Hollis, nor any of the Northern men, nor those lawyers who drove on most furiously with them: all of whom were pleased with the government itself of the Church."—Clarendon's History of the Rebellion, vol. i., p. 410. See afterward vol. iv., p. 437.

† Hist., vol. i., p. 446.

The impeachment of Strafford now moved gradually forward, and at last, on the 22d of March, the trial was opened in Westminster Hall. That mighty scene has been already described,‡ and it is only necessary here to present some memorable passages from the speeches of the second chief actor in it, the accuser Pym. The first day was occupied with a recapitulation of the charges and answers.

"My lords," said Pym, rising on the morning of the second day, "we stand here by the commandment of the knights, citizens, and burgesses, now assembled for the commons in Parliament. And we are ready to make good that impeachment whereby Thomas, earl of Strafford, stands charged in their name, and in the names of all the commons of England, with high treason.

"This, my lords, is a great cause, and we might sink under the weight of it, and be astonished with the lustre of this noble assembly, if there were not in the cause strength and vigour to support itself and to encourage us. It is the cause of the king; it concerns his majesty in the honour of his government, in the safety of his person, in the stability of his crown. It is the cause of the kingdom; it concerns not only the peace and prosperity, but even the being of the kingdom. We have that piercing eloquence, the cries and groans, and tears and prayers, of all the subjects assisting us. We have the three kingdoms, England, and Scotland, and Ireland, in travail and agitation with us, bowing themselves, like the hinds spoken of in Job, to cast out their sorrows.

"Truth and goodness, my lords—they are the beauty of the soul; they are the protection of all created nature; they are the image and character of God upon the creatures. This beauty evil spirits and evil men have lost; but yet there are none so wicked but they desire to march under the show and shadow of it, though they hate the reality.

* Mr. Southey, in the Quarterly Review.

† I should not omit to say that Hume's view of this matter (History, vol. v., p. 264, quarto ed.) does not materially differ from that which I have taken.

‡ Life of Strafford, p. 122, 124.

"This unhappy earl, now the object of your lordships' justice, hath taken as much care, hath used as much cunning, to set a face and countenance of honesty and justice upon his actions, as he hath been negligent to observe the rules of honesty in the performance of all these actions. My lords, it is the greatest baseness of wickedness that it dares not look in its own colours, nor be seen in its natural countenance. But virtue, as it is amiable in all respects, so the least is not this, that it puts a nobleness, it puts a bravery upon the mind, and lifts it above hopes and fears, above favour and displeasure. It makes it always uniform and constant to itself. The service commanded me and my colleagues here is to take off those vizards of truth and uprightness which hath been sought to be put upon this cause, and to show you his actions and his intentions in their own natural blackness and deformity.

"My lords, he hath put on a vizard of truth in these words, wherein he says 'that he should be in his defence more careful to observe truth than to gain advantage to himself.' He says he would endure any thing rather than be saved by falsehood.

"It was a noble and brave expression if it were really true.

"My lords, he hath likewise put the vizard of goodness on his actions when he desires to recite his services in a great many particulars, as if they were beneficial to the Commonwealth and state, whereas we shall prove them mischievous and dangerous.

"It is left upon me, my lords, to take off these vizards, and appearances of truth and goodness, in that part of his answer which is the preamble; and that I shall do with as much faithfulness and brevity as I can:

"The first thing, my lords, that I shall observe in the preamble, is this: That having recited all those great and honourable offices which he hath done under his majesty, he is bold to affirm that he hath been careful and faithful in the execution of them all.

"My lords, if he might be his own witness and his own judge, I doubt not but he would be acquitted. It is said in the Proverbs of the adulterous woman, 'that she wipes her mouth,' and says 'she had done no evil.' Here is a wiping of the mouth, here is a verbal expression of honesty. But, my lords, the foulness and injustice will never be wiped off, neither from his heart nor from his actions—I mean for the time past: God may change him for the time to come!"

With the same earnest gravity, and in the same confident and inflexible tone, Pym proceeded to observe upon the various parts of Strafford's "apologetical preamble." Among other allegations, for instance, that in all things he had "endeavoured the honour of the king." Here the accuser exclaimed, "The honour of the king! My lords, we say it is the honour of the king that he is the father of his people, that he is the fountain of justice; and it cannot stand with his honour and his justice to have his government stained and polluted with tyranny and oppression!" Another of Strafford's allegations was, that by his means many good and wholesome laws had been made since his government in Ireland. "Truly, my lords," said Pym, "if we should consider the particulars of these laws, some of them will not be found without great exception. But I shall make another answer. Good laws, nay, the best laws, are no advantage when will is set above law; when the laws have force to bind and restrain the subject, but no force to relieve and comfort him."

Pym then proceeded thus: "He says he was a means of calling a Parliament not long after he came to his government. My lords, Parliaments without Parliamentary liberties are but a fair and plausible way into bondage. That Parliament had not the liberties of a Parliament. Sir Pierce Crosby, for speaking against a bill in the Commons' House, was sequestered from the council-table, and committed to prison. Sir John Clotworthy, for the same cause, was threatened that he should lose a lease that he had. Mr. Barnewell, and two other gentlemen, were threatened they should have troops of horse put upon them for speaking in the House. Proxies by dozens were given by some of his favourites; and, my lords, Parliaments coming in with these circumstances, they be grievances, mischiefs, and miseries; no works of thanks or honour."

Strafford had urged his having been a means to put off monopolies and other burdensome projects from the subject, upon which his accuser observed thus bitterly: "If he had hated the injustice of a monopoly or the mischief of a monopoly, he would have hated it in himself—he himself would have been no monopolist. Certainly, my lords, it was not the love of justice, nor the common good, that moved him. And if he were moved by any thing else, he had his reward. It may be it was because he would have no man gripe them in the kingdom but himself; his own harvest crop would have been less if he had had sharers. It may be it was because monopolies hinder trade; he had the customs, and the benefit of the customs would have been less. When we know the particulars, we shall make a fit and proper answer to them. But in the mean time we are sure that, whatsoever was the reason, it was not justice, nor love of truth, that was the reason."

Alluding next to Strafford's plea that he had no other commission but what his predecessors had, and that he had executed that commission with all moderation, the orator proceeded thus powerfully: "For the commission, it was no virtue of his if it were a good commission. I shall say nothing of that. But for the second part—his moderation! When you find so many imprisoned of the nobility! so many men, some adjudged to death, some executed without law! when you find so many public rapines on the state, soldiers sent to make good his decrees—so many whippings in defence of monopolies—so many gentlemen that were jurors, because they would not apply themselves to give verdicts on his side, to be fined in the Star Chamber—men of quality to be disgraced, set on the pillory, and wearing papers, and such things (as it will appear through our evidence)—can you, my lords, think there was any moderation? And yet truly, my lords, I can believe that if you compare his courses with other parts of the world ungoverned, he will be found beyond all tyranny and harshness; but if you compare them with his own mind and disposition, perhaps there was moderation! Habits, we say, are more perfect than acts, because they be nearest the principle of actions. The habit of cruelty in himself (no doubt) is more perfect than any act of cruelty he hath committed; but if this be his moderation, I think all men will pray to be delivered from it. I may truly say that that is verified in him, 'The mercies of the wicked are cruel!'"

Then, after exposing at length, and with singular precision, the fallacies respecting revenue in the answers of Strafford, Pym took up one of his statements, to the effect that many churches had been built since his government; and went on, "Truly, my lords, why he should have any credit or honour if other men builded churches, I know not; I am sure we hear of no churches he hath built himself. If, indeed, he had been careful to have set up good preachers, that would have stirred up devotion in men, and made them desirous of the knowledge of God, and by that means made more churches, it had been something. But I hear nothing of spiritual edification, nothing of the knowledge of God, that by his means hath been dispersed in that kingdom. And certainly they that strive not to build up men's souls in a spiritual way of edification, let them build all the material churches that can be, they will do no good: God is not worshipped with walls, but he is worshipped with hearts."

It is necessary to hasten, however, through many remarkable details in this speech to the memorable words which closed it: "The earl concludes, my lords, with a desire 'that he may not be charged with errors of his understanding or judgment, being not bred up in the law; or with weakness, to which human nature is subject.' Truly, my lords, it would be far from us to charge him with any such mistakes! No, my lords, we shall charge him with nothing but what the law in every man's breast condemns—the light of nature, the light of common reason, the rules of common society. And this will appear in all the articles which my colleagues will offer to you."

It has been observed in the course of this work* that in the speeches of Pym alone will be found a real vindication of all the proceedings against Strafford up to the exaction of his life. From them alone is indeed reflected that "flowing and existing light of the public welfare," which discovered to virtuous statesmen then what was requisite to be done, and without which now our sight is dull and feeble. It appears to me that Pym, and of all the managers Pym alone, argued the accusation and conviction of the earl as of the substance of eternal right, in opposition to the technical forms which the defence assumed. That crisis of danger to the public liberties had in his view already arrived, wherein, by every precedent of great and virtuous statesmanship, the question of Justice reared itself above the narrow limits of the law.

Hence it was that, early on the morning of the thirteenth day of the trial—when the eloquence, the dignity of demeanour, and the obvious bodily sufferings of the noble accused had weighed as much in his favour with the lords as he judges as the commanding intellect and mournful severity of his features had preposessed the lady spectators on his side—Pym rose in his place in the House of Commons, and announcing a discovery of the last importance respecting Strafford, presented to the House certain weighty reasons for closing the proceedings against the earl by the legislative enactment of a bill of attainder. He then produced Vane's famous notes, in proof of advice from Strafford given to the king at the council-table, that he had an army in Ireland by which England might be reduced to obedience; and moved that the bill of attainder, which he now also produced, should be read a first time.

Pym's motives to this sudden course are obvious. They are distinctly explained by a motion which he submitted to the House six days after, when, on the bringing up the report of the bill previous to its third reading, he prevailed with the House to pass, unanimously, a previous resolution, "That it has been sufficiently proved that Thomas, earl of Strafford, hath endeavoured to subvert the ancient and fundamental laws of these realms of England and Ireland, and to introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical government against law."* In the course of the proceedings of the impeachment, and on the discovery of Vane's notes, the policy, no less than the necessity, had made itself apparent to him, of fixing the case of Strafford on wider and more special grounds than were found to be involved in a very strict construction of the old statute of treasons. Admitting this, however, nothing is so vain as to argue this question with a view to our present settlement of the laws of evidence and treason. The rules of evidence, and legal constructions of statutes, which are now clearly and intelligibly defined, were then recognised doubtfully, and frequently exceeded; nor is it to be denied that the people at least—accustomed as they were to perpetual stretchings of the statute of Edward by constructive interpretation—were unable to attach any definite sense to the crime.† In Pym's refusal even to risk any arbitrary construction of a statute which might thereafter be turned against the people, we see only a fresh evidence of his never-ceasing care of the public freedom, which he would not consent to endanger, even in so extraordinary an emergency, by any possible invasion of the securities of regular jurisprudence. He resolved on a bill of attainder. Bills of attainder were not then unusual, were the same in principle as the ordinary bills of pains and penalties; and the argument against such a proceeding, as an act of retrospective punishment, was thoroughly answered in the case of Strafford by the course which Pym adopted. The histories do not mention the resolution I have just quoted, but it embodies his grand vindication. It plainly reduced the reasoning of Strafford to this, that though to transgress a particular law is a crime, he who takes advantage of circumstances to overturn the whole established laws had no legal warning of his guilt, and therefore was no criminal. Pym only waited till he had reason to believe that the proofs he advanced under the fifteenth article of the impeachment did not amount to a substantive treason under the statute, when it is very clear that he at once resolved upon this course, wisely judging it better to fix the guilt of Strafford on higher and grander considerations,* and to bring the treason that had been committed against the laws and liberties of the Commonwealth to the immediate arbitration of what he justly termed "the element and source of all laws, out of which they are derived; the end of all laws, to which they are designed, and in which they are perfected." With this view, also, he inserted the famous proviso in the bill, that the present attainder should not be acted upon by the judges as a precedent in determining the crime of treason. Truly has Mr. Godwin said† that this illustrates emphatically the clearness of his conceptions and the equality of his temper through the whole of these memorable proceedings.

* Life of Strafford, p. 126.

* See Journals of 16th April, 1641.

† See Hallam's Const. Hist., vol. ii., p. 146.

Nothing has been so little understood, not to say grossly misrepresented, as the exact course of Pym in this matter. He did not wait till "the impeachment had obviously failed;" he did not wait to see "the effect of Vane's notes upon the lords;" he did not at last hurry the bill of attainder through the lower House "with indecent haste." Clarendon's assertions, that the bill was not introduced till after Strafford's defence was made, and that then it was "received with wonderful alacrity, and immediately read the first and the second time, and so committed, which was not usual in Parliaments,"‡ are simply untruths. Pym introduced the bill on the 10th of April, when it was read the first time; Vane's notes were not read in Westminster Hall till the 13th of April, immediately before Strafford's defence; on the day following (the 14th) the bill of attainder was read a second time; and the third reading did not pass till the 21st of April.§ Meanwhile Pym and St. John had both stated to the House of Lords that the Commons did not seek "to decline their lordships' justice in a judicial way"|| by submitting the bill of attainder to them; and ultimately the House of Lords did in fact vote upon each article of the bill judicially, and not as if they were enacting a legislative measure; while the judges themselves, on a solemn reference by the Lords for their opinion whether some of the articles charged upon Strafford amounted to treason, answered unanimously that upon all which their lordships had voted to be proved, they considered the earl to be guilty of that crime. So that, in truth, there is no reason to suppose a failure of the impeachment, had it been allowed to proceed. It was Pym who first refused to sanction that proceeding with the weight of his authority in after-times; and to him, and the great men who acted with him, be awarded the praise of having thus stamped the guilt of Strafford as a treason against the people rather than the king, and, while they guarded with profound and sagacious care the liberty of the subject and the strict authority of the law, of having written for all future ages, in the death of Strafford, the terrible lesson of a nation's retribution.

I now return to the last day of the trial in Westminster Hall, where the Lords still proceeded as if they were ignorant of the bill now pending in the lower House. On the 13th of April, after Lord Strafford had delivered the noble and affecting burst of eloquence with which his defence concluded, Pym rose, and, in the language of an honest writer* who was present, "made, in half an hour, to the confession of all, one of the most eloquent, wise, free speeches that ever we heard, or I think shall ever hear."† The speech was indeed extraordinary. It seems, by all the accounts, to have been delivered with the evident sense that the great occasion of the speaker's life had come, and that with him it now finally rested whether or not the privileges so long contested, and the rights so long misunderstood, of the great body of the people, should win at last their assured consummation and acknowledgment.

"My lords," he began, "many days have been spent in maintenance of the impeachment of the Earl of Strafford by the House of Commons, whereby he stands charged with high treason; and your lordships have heard his defence with patience, and with as much favour as justice will allow. We have passed through our evidence; and the result is, that it remains clearly proved that the Earl of Strafford hath endeavoured, by his words, actions, and counsels, to subvert the fundamental laws of England and Ireland, and to introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical government.

"This is the evenenomed arrow‡ for which he inquired in the beginning of his replication this day, which hath infected all his blood; this is that intoxicating cup (to use his own metaphor) which hath tainted his judgment and poisoned his heart! From hence was infused that specific difference which turned his speeches, his actions, his counsels into treason; not cumulative, as he expressed it, as if many misdemeanors could make one treason, but formally and essentially. It is the end that doth inform actions, and doth specify the nature of them, making not only criminal, but even indifferent words and actions to be treason when done and spoken with a treasonable intention.

"That which is given to me in charge is to show the quality of the offence, how heinous it is in the nature, how mischievous in the effect of it; which will best appear if it be examined by that law to which he himself appealed, that universal, that supreme law, SALUS POPULI. This the element of all laws, out of which they are

* Baillie, the principal of the Glasgow University.

† "The king," Baillie adds, "never heard a lecture of so free language against that his idolized prerogative. Some of the passages, and no more but some, and these defaced, I send you in print, as they have been taken in speaking by some hand."

‡ In the commencement of the defence which had just closed, Strafford, observing upon the statement of his accusers that separate articles in the impeachment might be no treason in themselves, and yet conduce to the proof of treason, had said, "And hence, my lords, I have all along watched to see if I could find that poisoned arrow that should evenenom all the rest—that deadly cup of wine that should intoxicate a few alleged inconveniences and misdemeanors, to run them up to high treason." Pym's remarks on this and other important points of the defence proves that in general management, and much of the expression, this great speech of his was delivered extempore.

* See these considerations urged at greater length in the Life of Strafford, p. 126-129.

† Hist. of the Commonwealth, vol. i., p. 92.

‡ Hist., vol. i., p. 398.

§ See the Journals of those days; or the Old Parl. Hist., vol. ix., p. 259. || Nalson's Collections, vol. ii., p. 163.

derived; the end of all laws, to which they are designed, and in which they are perfected. How far it stands in opposition to this law I shall endeavour to show, in some considerations which I shall present to your lordships, arising out of the evidence which hath been opened.

"The first is this: it is an offence comprehending all other offences. Here you shall find several treasons, murders, rapines, oppressions, perjuries. The earth hath a seminary virtue, whereby it doth produce all herbs and plants, and other vegetables: there is in this crime a seminary of all evils hurtful to a state; and if you consider the reasons of it, it must needs be so.

"The law is that which puts a difference betwixt good and evil, betwixt just and unjust. If you take away the law, all things will fall into a confusion. Every man will become a law to himself, which, in the depraved condition of human nature, must needs produce many great enormities. Lust will become a law, and envy will become a law; covetousness and ambition will become laws; and what dictates, what decisions such laws will produce, may easily be discerned in the late government of Ireland!"

"The law hath a power to prevent, to restrain, to repair evils. Without this, all kinds of mischief and distempers will break in upon a state. It is the law that doth entitle the king to the allegiance and service of his people; it entitles the people to the protection and justice of the king. It is God alone who subsists by himself; all other things subsist in a mutual dependence and relation. He was a wise man that said that the king subsisted by the field that is tilled: it is the labour of the people that supports the crown. If you take away the protection of the king, the vigour and cheerfulness of allegiance will be taken away, though the obligation remain.

"The law is the boundary, the measure, betwixt the king's prerogative and the people's liberty. Whilst these move in their own orbs, they are a support and a security to one another—the prerogative a cover and defence to the liberty of the people, and the people, by their liberty, enabled to be a foundation to the prerogative; but if these bounds be so removed that they enter into contestation and conflict, one of these mischiefs must ensue: if the prerogative of the king overwhelm the liberty of the people, it will be turned into tyranny; if liberty undermine the prerogative, it will grow into anarchy."

The whole compass of our language does not contain a nobler description of law than this. It has indeed been justly pronounced, by no partial witness* to Pym's memory, to combine the splendour of one of the commonplaces of Cicero with the logical force of Lord Bacon's profound meditations. It has even greater force, philosophy, and beauty, when viewed in relation to the wider appeal which the speaker had already judged it necessary to make, not less to prevent the possibly undue stretching of a statute, than to wither and destroy the monstrous assumption of the accused—that he, forsooth, was a pleader for the law, while the very principle assumed in his argument is that of having laboured to overturn all law.

It will be observed, however, that nothing more strikingly impresses itself upon us, in reading Rushworth's report* of this extraordinary speech, than the instant and impressive practical application to the defence which Strafford had just delivered, with which all the great principles and abstract truths on which Pym must have thought for years, now, with a stateley vehemence, rushed forth from him. This it is, as with the greatest orators, to comprehend the whole of a subject, no matter how overwhelming in its interests and proportions, at a single glance; and then, out of an armory of words and thoughts, collected through the untiring exertions of a life of observation and study, to know how to send every word and every thought to its errand, like an arrow to its mark, with unerring aim. The first of the noble passages which follow has reference to what Strafford had said in his defence respecting Ireland—that it was a conquered country, and that his illegal exertions there were to maintain the king's absolute sovereignty. This was as good an argument as many that have been since advanced, with less excuse, for subsequent oppressions in the same quarter; but mark with what final and unanswerable eloquence Pym crushes every such sophism or pretension!

"The law is the safeguard, the custody of all private interests. Your honours, your lives, your liberties, and estates are all in the keeping of the law. Without this, every man hath a like right to any thing; and such is the condition into which the Irish were brought by the Earl of Strafford. But the reason which he gave for it hath even more mischief in it than the thing itself! They were a conquered nation! There cannot be a word more pregnant and fruitful in treason than that word is. There are few nations in the world that have not been conquered, and no doubt but the conqueror may give what law he pleases to those that are conquered; but if the succeeding pacts and agreements do not limit and restrain that right, what people can be secure? England hath been conquered, and Wales hath been conquered, and by this reason will be in little better case than Ireland. If the king, by the right of a conqueror, gives laws to his people, shall not the people, by the same reason, be restored to the right of the conquered to recover their liberty if they can? What can be more hurtful, more pernicious to both, than such propositions as these? And in these particulars is determined the first consideration.

"The second consideration is this: arbitrary power is dangerous to the king's person, and dangerous to his crown. It is apt to cherish ambition, usurpation, and oppression in great men, and to beget sedition and discontent in the people; and both these have been, and in reason must ever be, causes of great trouble and alteration to princes and states. If the histories of those Eastern countries be pursued, where princes order their affairs according to the mischievous principles of the Earl of Strafford, loose and absolved from all rules of government, they will be found to be frequent in combustions, full of massacres, and of the tragical ends of princes. If any man shall look into their own stories in the times when the laws were most neglected, he shall find them full of commotions—of civil distempers, whereby the kings that then reigned were always kept in want and distress, the people consumed with civil wars; and by such wicked counsels as these some of our princes have been brought to such a miserable end as no honest heart can remember without horror, and an earnest prayer that it may never be so again.*

* Mr. D'Israeli in his Commentaries, vol. iv., p. 467.

* My quotations are taken from it.

"The third consideration is this—the subversion of the laws; and this arbitrary power, as it is dangerous to the king's person and to his crown, so is it in other respects very prejudicial to his majesty, in his honour, profit, and greatness. And yet these are the gildings and paintings that are put upon such counsels: 'these are for your honour—for your service;' whereas, in truth, they are contrary to both. But if I take off this varnish, I hope they shall then appear in their own native deformity, and therefore I desire to consider them by these rules.

"It cannot be for the honour of the king that his sacred authority should be used in the practice of injustice and oppression—that his name should be applied to patronise such horrid crimes as have been represented in evidence against the Earl of Strafford; and yet how frequently, how presumptuously his commands, his letters, have been vouched throughout the course of this defence! Your lordships have heard that when the judges do justice it is the king's justice; and this is for his honour, because he is the fountain of justice; but when they do injustice the offence is their own; how these officers and ministers of the king, who are most officious in the exercise of arbitrary power, do it commonly for their own advantage; and, when they are questioned for it, then they fly to the king's 'interest'—to his 'direction!' Truly, my lords, this is a very unequal distribution for the king, that the dishonour of evil courses should be cast upon him, and they to have the advantage!

"The prejudice which it brings to him in regard of his profit is no less apparent, since it deprives him of the most beneficial and most certain revenue of his crown; that is, the voluntary aids and supplies of his people. His other revenues, consisting of goodly demesnes and great manors, have by grants been variously alienated from the crown, and are now exceedingly diminished and impaired. But this revenue, it cannot be sold; it cannot be burdened with any pensions or annuities; it comes entirely to the crown. It is now almost fifteen years since his majesty had any assistance from his people, and these illegal ways of supplying the king were never pressed with more violence and art than they have been in this time; and yet I may, upon very good grounds, affirm, that in the last fifteen years of Queen Elizabeth she received more by the bounty and affection of her subjects than hath come to his majesty's coffers by all the inordinate and rigorous courses which have been taken; and as those supplies were more beneficial in the receipt of them, so were they like in the use and employment of them.

"Another way of prejudice to his majesty's profit is this: such arbitrary courses exhaust the people, and disable them, when there shall be occasion, to give such plentiful supplies as otherwise they would do. I shall need no other proof of this than the Irish government under my Lord Strafford, where the wealth of the kingdom has been so consumed by those horrible exactions and burdens, that it is thought the subsidies lately granted will amount to little more than half the proportion of the last subsidies. The two former ways are hurtful to the king's profit in that respect which they call lucrum cessans, by diminishing his receipts; but there is a third yet more full of mischief, and it is in that respect which they call damnum emergens, by increasing his disbursements; for such irregular and exorbitant attempts upon the liberties of the people are apt to produce such miserable distractions and distempers, as will put the king and kingdoms to so vast expenses and losses in a short time that they will not be recovered in many years. We need not go far to seek a proof of this—these two last years will be a sufficient evidence; within which time I assure myself it may be proved, that more treasure hath been wasted, and more loss sustained by his majesty and his subjects, than was spent by Queen Elizabeth in all the war of Tyrone, and in those many brave attempts against the King of Spain, and the royal assistance which she gave to France and the Low Countries, during all her reign.

"Now, as for greatness, this arbitrary power is apt to hinder and impair it, not only at home, but abroad. A kingdom is a society of men conjoined under one government for the common good. The world is a society of the kingdoms and states. The king's greatness consists not only in his dominion over his subjects at home, but in the influence which he hath upon states abroad; that he should be great, even among kings, and by his wisdom and authority be able so to incline and dispose the affairs of other states and nations, and those great events which fall out in the world, that they shall be for the good of mankind, and for the peculiar advantage of his own people. This is the most glorious and magnificent greatness—to be able to relieve distressed princes, to support his own friends and allies, to prevent the ambitious designs of other kings; and how much this kingdom hath been impaired in this kind by the late mischievous counsels, your lordships best know, who, at a near distance, and with a more clear sight, do apprehend these public and great affairs than I can do. Yet thus much I dare boldly say, that if his majesty had not with great wisdom and goodness forsaken that way wherein the Earl of Strafford had put him, we should, within a short time, have been brought into that miserable condition as to have been useless to our friends, contemptible to our enemies, and incapable of undertaking any great design either at home or abroad.

"A fourth consideration is, that this arbitrary and tyrannical power which the Earl of Strafford did exercise with his own person, and to which he did advise his majesty, is inconsistent with the peace, the wealth, the prosperity of a nation : it is destructive to justice, the mother of peace ; to industry, the spring of wealth ; to valour, which is the active virtue whereby only the prosperity of a nation can be procured, confirmed, and enlarged. It is not only apt to take away peace, and so entangle the nation with wars, but doth corrupt peace, and put such a malignity into it as produceth the effects of war. We need seek no other proofs of this but the Earl of Strafford's government, where the Irish, both nobility and others, had as little security of their persons or estates in this peaceable time as if the kingdom had been under the rage and fury of war.

* The king was present, the reader will recollect, though not recognised as being so. A screen of trellis-work was before him. It may be supposed that now, while these memorable words sounded through the hall, was the moment of "breaking down the screen with his own hand," as Baillie records him to have done.

"And as for industry and valour, who will take pains for that which, when he hath gotten, is not his own ? or who fight for that wherein he hath no other interest but such as is subject to the will of another ? The ancient encouragement to men that were to defend their countries was this, that they were to hazard their person, pro aris et focis, for their religion and for their homes ; but by this arbitrary way which was practised in Ireland, and counselled here, no man had any certainty either of religion, or of his home, or of any thing else to be his own ; and besides this, such arbitrary courses have an ill operation upon the courage of a nation, by embasing the hearts of the people. A servile condition does for the most part beget in men a slavish temper and disposition. Those that live so much under the whip, and the pillory, and such servile engines as were frequently used by the Earl of Strafford, they may have the dregs of valour—sullenness and stubbornness, which may make them prone to mutinies and discontents, but those noble and gallant affections which put men to brave designs and attempts for the preservation or enlargement of a kingdom they are hardly capable of. SHALL IT BE TREASON TO EMBASE THE KING'S COIN, THOUGH BUT A PIECE OF TWELVE-PENCE OR SIXPENCE ? AND MUST IT NOT NEEDS BE THE EFFECT OF A GREATER TREASON TO EMBASE THE SPIRIT OF HIS SUBJECTS, AND TO SET UP A STAMP AND CHARACTER OF SERVITUDE UPON THEM, WHEREBY THEY SHALL BE DISABLED TO DO ANYTHING FOR THE SERVICE OF THE KING AND COMMONWEALTH ?

"The fifth consideration is this, that the exercise of this arbitrary government in times of sudden danger, by the invasion of an enemy, will disable his majesty to preserve himself and his subjects from that danger. This is the only pretence by which the Earl of Strafford, and such other mischievous counsellors, would induce his majesty to make use of it ; and if it be unfit for such an occasion, I know nothing that can be alleged in maintenance of it. When war threatens a kingdom by the coming of a foreign enemy, it is no time then to discontent the people, to make them weary of the present government, and more inclinable to a change. The supplies which are to come in this way will be unready—uncertain ; there can be no assurance of them—no dependence upon them, either for time or proportion ; and if some money be gotten in such a way, the distractions, divisions, distempers which this course is apt to produce, will be more prejudicial to the public safety than the supply can be advantageous to it. Of this we have had sufficient experience the last summer.

"The sixth is, that this crime of subverting the laws, and introducing an arbitrary and tyrannical government, is contrary to the pact and covenant betwixt the king and his people. That which was spoken of before was the legal union of allegiance and protection ; this is a personal union, by mutual agreement and stipulation, confirmed by oath on both sides. The king and his people are obliged to one another in the nearest relations. When Justice Thorp, in Edward III.'s time, was by the Parliament condemned to death for bribery, the reason of that judgment is given, because he had broke the king's oath ; not that he had broke his own oath, but he had broken the king's oath, that solemn and great obligation which is the security of the whole kingdom. Now if for a judge to take a small sum in a private cause was adjudged capital, how much greater was this offence, whereby the Earl of Strafford hath broken the king's oath in the whole course of his government in Ireland, to the prejudice of so many of his majesty's subjects in their lives, liberties, and estates, and to the danger of all the rest !* The doctrine of the Papists, fides non est servanda cum hæreticis, is an abominable doctrine ; yet that other tenet, more peculiar to the Jesuits, is more pernicious, whereby subjects are discharged from their oath of allegiance to their prince whensoever the pope pleaseth. Now, my lords, this may be added, to make the third no less mischievous and destructive to human society than either of the rest, that the king is not bound by that oath which he hath taken to observe the laws of the kingdom, but may, when he sees cause, lay taxes and burthens upon them without their consent, contrary to the laws and liberties of the kingdom. This hath been preached and published by divers ; and this is that which hath been practised in Ireland by the Earl of Strafford in his government there, and endeavoured to be brought into England by his counsel here.

"The seventh is this : it is an offence that is contrary to the end of government. The end of government is to prevent oppressions, to limit and restrain the excessive power and violence of great men, to open the passages of justice with indifferency towards all. This arbitrary power is apt to induce and encourage all kinds of insolences. Another end of the government is to preserve men in their estates, to secure them in their lives and liberties ; but if this design had taken effect, and could have been settled in England as it is practised in Ireland, no man would have had more certainty in his own than power would have allowed him. But these two have been spoken of before ; there are two behind more important, which have not yet been touched.

* This precedent, by-the-by, is likely to have been that which was in Sir R. Goodwin's mind when he referred to Pym in Cromwell's Parliament of 1658 ; but I have allowed the speech to stand, which has been attributed to Pym on the ground of its containing a similar precedent, both because of its extraordinarily marked style, which, in the absence of any known author, and in spite of strong opposing evidence, still seems to point to Pym as having had a share in its authorship, and also because, being a most striking illustration of the times, it is yet excluded from the common Parliamentary histories.

"It is the end of government that virtue should be cherished, vice suppressed; but where this arbitrary and unlimited power is set up, a way is open not only for the security, but for the advancement and encouragement of evil. Such men as are apt for the execution and maintenance of this power are only capable of preferment; and others who will not be instruments of any unjust commands, who make a conscience to do nothing against the laws of the kingdom and liberties of the subjects, are not only not passable for employment, but subject to much jealousy and danger. It is the end of government that all accidents and events, all counsels and designs, should be improved to the public good; but this arbitrary power is apt to dispose all to the maintenance of itself. The wisdom of the council-table, the authority of the courts of justice, the industry of all the officers of the crown, have been most carefully exercised in this; the learning of our divines, the jurisdiction of our bishops, have been moulded and disposed to the same effect; which, though it were begun before the Earl of Strafford's employment, yet hath been exceedingly furthered and advanced by him. Under this colour and pretence of maintaining the king's power and prerogative, many dangerous practices against the peace and safety of the kingdom have been undertaken and promoted. The increase of popery, and the favours and encouragement of Papists, have been, and still are, a great grievance and danger to the kingdom. The invocation, in matters of religion, upon usurpations of the clergy, the manifold burthens and taxations upon the people, have been a great cause of our present distempers and disorders; and yet those who have been chief furtherers and actors of such mischiefs have had their credit and authority from this, that they were forward to maintain this power. The Earl of Strafford had the first rise of his greatness from this; and in his apology and defence, as your lordships have heard, this hath had a main part.

"The royal power and majesty of kings is only glorious in the prosperity and happiness of the people. The perfection of all things consists in the end for which they were ordained. God only is his own end. All other things have a further end beyond themselves, in attaining whereof their own happiness consists. If the means and the end be set in opposition to one another, it must needs cause an impotency and defect of both."

These extracts carry with them their own praise. They belong, indeed, to the very highest order of eloquence; they embody the truths of a sound philosophy with the great substantial truths of common sense, and mingle, with a power and purpose that are truly masterly, the great maxims of the old English Constitution with the real interests and general feelings of mankind in every country and under every circumstance.

Pym now turned to certain special excuses and justifications which Strafford had urged in his defence. "The eighth consideration is the vanity and absurdity of those excuses and justifications which he made for himself, whereof divers particulars have been mentioned in the course of this defence.

"1. That he is a counsellor, and might not be questioned for any thing which he advised according to his conscience. The ground is true. There is a liberty belongs to counsellors, and nothing corrupts counsels more than fear. He that will have the privilege of a counsellor, however, must keep within the just bounds of a counsellor: those matters are the only proper subjects of counsel which in their times and occasions may be good or beneficial to the king or Commonwealth; but such treasons as these—the subversion of the laws, violation of liberties—they can never be good or justifiable by any circumstance or occasion. Therefore his being a counsellor makes his fault much more heinous, as being committed against a greater trust, and in a way of much mischief and danger, lest his majesty's conscience and judgment (upon which the whole course and frame of his government do much depend) should be poisoned and infected with such wicked principles and designs. This Lord Strafford hath endeavoured to do, which by all laws and in all times hath in this kingdom been reckoned a crime of a high nature.

"2. He labours to interest your lordships in his cause by alleging it may be dangerous to yourselves and your posterity, who by your birth are fittest to be near his majesty, in places of trust and of authority, if you should be subject to be questioned for matters delivered in council. To this it is to be answered, that it is hoped their lordships will rather labour to secure themselves and their posterity in the exercise of their virtues than of their vices, that so they may, together with their own honour and greatness, preserve the honour and greatness both of the king and kingdom.

"3. Another excuse is this, that whatsoever he hath spoken was out of good intention. Sometimes, my lords, good and evil, truth and falsehood, lie so near together that they are hardly to be distinguished. Matters hurtful and dangerous may be accompanied with such circumstances as may make them appear useful and convenient; and, in all such cases, good intention will justify evil counsel. But where the matters propounded are evil in their own nature, such as the matters are wherewith the Earl of Strafford is charged—as to break a public faith, and to subvert laws and government—they can never be justified by any intentions, how good soever they be pretended.

"4. He allegeth it was a time of great necessity and danger, when such counsels were necessary for the preservation of the state. Necessity hath been spoken of before, as it relates to the cause; now it is considered as it relates to the person. If there were any necessity, it was of his own making: he, by his evil counsel, had brought the king into a necessity; and by no rules of justice can be allowed to gain this advantage by his own fault, as to make that a ground of his justification which is a great part of his offence.

"5. He hath often insinuated this, that it was for his majesty's service, in maintenance of that sovereign power with which he is intrusted by God for the good of his people. The answer is this: no doubt but that sovereign power wherewith his majesty is intrusted for the public good hath many glorious effects, the better to enable him thereunto; but without doubt this is none of them, that, by his own will, he may lay any tax or imposition upon his people without their consent in Parliament. This hath now been five times adjudged by both Houses—in the case of the loans, in condemning commissions of the excise, in the resolution upon the saving clause offered to be added to the petition of right, in the sentence against Mainwaring, and now against Lutell, in condemning the ship-money. And, therefore, if the sovereign power of the king can produce no such effect as this, the allegation of it is an aggravation; and no diminution, of his offence, because thereby he doth labour to interest the king against the just grievance and complaint of the people.

"6. That this counsel was propounded with divers limitations and provisions for securing and repairing the liberty of the people. This implies a contradiction: to maintain an arbitrary and absolute power, and yet to restrain it with limitations and provisions; for even those limitations and provisions will be subject to the same absolute power, and to be dispensed in such manner and at such time as itself shall determine. Let the grievances and oppressions be never so heavy, the subject is left without all remedy but at his majesty's own pleasure.

"7. He allegeth they were but words, and no effect followed: this needs no answer, but that the miserable distempers into which he hath brought all the three kingdoms will be evidence sufficient that his wicked counsels have had such mischievous effects, within these two or three last years, that many years' peace will hardly repair those losses and other great mischiefs which the Commonwealth hath sustained."

Pym now offered his concluding considerations, which, it will be seen, bear emphatic reference to the new course which he had already initiated in the House of Commons, of declaring Strafford's treason by the justice of a special enactment.

"The ninth consideration, my lords, is this: that if this be treason in the nature of it, it doth exceed all other treasons in this, that in the design and endeavour of the author it was to be a constant and permanent treason. Other treasons are transient, as being confined within those particular actions and proportions wherein they did consist; and those being past, the treason ceaseth. The powder treason was full of horror and malignity, yet it is past many years since. The murder of that magnanimous and glorious king, Henry IV. of France, was a great and horrid treason, and so were those manifold attempts against Queen Elizabeth, of blessed memory; but they are long since past: the detestation of them only remains in histories and in the minds of men, and will ever remain. But this treason, if it had taken effect, WAS TO BE A STANDING, PERPETUAL TREASON, WHICH WOULD HAVE BEEN IN CONTINUAL ACT; NOT DETERMINED WITHIN ONE TIME OR AGE, BUT TRANSMITTED TO POSTERITY, EVEN FROM ONE GENERATION TO ANOTHER.

"The last consideration is this: that as it is a crime odious in the nature of it, so it is odious in the judgment and estimation of the law.

To alter the settled frame and constitution of government is treason in any state. THE LAWS WHEREBY ALL OTHER PARTS OF A KINGDOM ARE PRESERVED WOULD BE VERY VAIN AND DEFECTIVE IF THEY HAD NOT A POWER TO SECURE AND PRESERVE THEMSELVES."

The orator concluded with these condensed and terrible words: "The forfeitures inflicted for treason by our law are of life, honour, and estate, even all that can be forfeited; and this prisoner having committed so many treasons, although he should pay all these forfeitures, will be still a debtor to the Commonwealth. Nothing can be more equal than that he should perish by the justice of that law which he would have subverted. Neither will this be a new way of blood. There are marks enough to trace this law to the very original of this kingdom; and if it hath not been put in execution, as he allegeth, these 240 years, it was not for want of law, but that all that time hath not bred a man bold enough to commit such crimes as these!"

An interesting incident now occurred, which has already been described in this work,* but which cannot be omitted here. Through the whole of the speech Strafford is described to have been closely and earnestly watching Pym; when the latter suddenly turning, as the above words were spoken, met the fixed and faded eyes and haggard features of his early associate, and a rush of feelings from other days—so fearfully contrasting the youth and friendship of the past† with the love-poisoned hate of the present and the mortal agony impending in the future—for a moment deprived the patriot of self-possession. "His papers he looked on," says Baillie, "but they could not help him; so he behoved to pass them." For a moment only! Suddenly recovering his dignity and self-command, he told the court that the solicitor-general, St. John, would, on a future day, and "with learning and abilities much better for that service," argue certain points of law before them, and solicited their lordships, for the present, to consider the proceedings closed.

The few eventful weeks of life which still remained to Strafford have already been detailed; but some incidents connected with the plots devised for his rescue, not given before, may now be used in illustration of Pym's character. While the bill of attainder was on its way to the Lords,‡ Mr. Hyde (Lord Clarendon) was sent up to that house with a message stating that the Commons apprehended a design for the escape of Strafford, and requesting that the Irish army should be disbanded. Five days after this, and two days after the ill-advised interference of the king,§ a furious mob of upward of 6000 people, variously armed, thronged round Westminster Hall, clamoured for Strafford's blood, and placarded the names of those members of the Commons who, out of a

* Life of Strafford, p. 127.

† The expression conveyed in Strafford's look may be felt on reading a few of the touching words which graced his eloquent defence: "That I am charged with treason by the honourable Commons is my greatest grief: it pierces my heart, though not with guilt, yet with sorrow, that in my gray hairs I should be so misunderstood by the companions of my youth, with whom I have formerly spent so much time."

‡ On the 28th of April.

§ See Life of Strafford, p. 127.

house of 263,* had voted against the attainder, as "Straffordians, and betrayers of their country." The Lords instantly demanded a conference on the subject, and were refused. The Commons were at that moment listening, in the deepest agitation, to Pym, whose sleepless vigilance had discovered a formidable and dangerous conspiracy, and was then denouncing it, in all its details, and with the names of all its actors. He discovered to the House various desperate intrigues and dangerous designs, both at home and abroad (referring to France), against the Parliament and the people; and especially a plot "to disaffect the army to the Parliament," and bring it up from the North, with the king's assent, to overawe their proceedings; also of a design upon the Tower for Lord Strafford's escape, and of an intended descent of the French upon Portsmouth in furtherance of these machinations. He stated farther, that "persons of eminence about the queen" appeared to be deeply implicated; and moved that his majesty be requested to shut the ports, and to give orders that no person attending on himself, the queen, or the prince, should quit the kingdom without license of his majesty, by the advice of Parliament.†

The immediate effects of Pym's speech were very memorable. The Commons, who remained sitting on the occasion with locked doors from seven in the morning till eight at night, drew up a "protestation," at last, on Pym's motion,‡ "to defend the Protestant Church, his majesty's person and power, the privileges of Parliament, and the lawful rights and liberties of the people;" which was instantly signed by every member present ("Edward Hyde" is the second name attached to it), subsequently by the members of the House of Lords (the Catholic peers excepted, and who were in consequence absent during Strafford's attainder), and then circulated, in various copies, for universal signature throughout the kingdom. The sensation thus created was felt everywhere,

* "The question being then put for passing the bill against the earl, it was carried in the affirmative by 204 against 59. Mr. Pym was ordered to carry this bill to the Lords, and to express to them 'that it was a bill that highly concerned the Commonwealth in the expediting of it.'" This was on the 21st of April.—Old Parl. Hist., vol. ix., p. 262, 263.

† Subsequent discoveries have placed us in possession of the exact course and substance of Pym's present disclosures. They are thus shortly summed up in the History from Mackintosh: "Goring, then a colonel in the army, and Percy, brother of the Earl of Northumberland, took the lead in a consultation of officers, held under an oath of secrecy. It originated with Sir John Suckling, who was soon thrown aside from distrust of his personal courage. The Parliament was to be overawed or dissolved; and, in short, the king rendered absolute, by the sudden march of the army to London. They addressed to the king a petition, which he received and approved, and marked with the initials C. R.: it seriously compromised him. This movement was combined with the escape of Strafford. Balfour, lieutenant of the Tower, was offered by the earl £22,000, the marriage of Balfour's son to his eldest daughter, and the king's warrant for his indemnity. He received the king's command, at the same time, to receive Captain Billingsley, one of the conspirators, with 100 picked men, into the Tower. Dreading the vengeance of the House of Commons, he rejected the bribe, and refused obedience to the military order. The king and queen charged Jermyn, already the queen's favourite, to reconcile the rival pretensions of Goring and Percy, but failed to do so; and Goring disclosed the plot to Lord Newark, from whom, through Bedford, Say, and Kimbolton, it reached Pym."

‡ See the speech of Pym, as reported in Clarendon, vol. i., p. 438-441.

and the popular leaders took advantage of it to achieve a still more memorable measure. Pym pointed out the nature of the dangers that had threatened them before this discovery, and asked whether they were safer now. The king had listened to and approved a proposal of appealing from the House of Commons to a military force. Were they now secure from instant dissolution? and, supposing a dissolution at the present crisis, with a term of three years for prerogative measures against the people, were not the public liberties in danger of being lost forever! A bill to secure the existence of the present Parliament, on which depended every thing, was then named, and fervently welcomed by the House. "A rapid impulse," observes Mr. Hallam,* "rather than any concerted resolution, appears to have dictated a hardy encroachment on the prerogative. The bill against the dissolution of the present Parliament without its own consent was resolved in a committee on the 5th of May,† brought in the next day, and sent to the Lords on the 7th." On the 8th the bill passed. On the same day Strafford's attainder passed also, and both measures were presented to the king.

He at once signed the bill for the continuance of Parliament; and Mr. Hallam suggests that "his ready acquiescence in this bill, far more dangerous than any of those at which he had hitherto demurred, can only be ascribed to his own shame and the queen's consternation at the discovery of the late plot. He implored for some delay, however, before signing Strafford's attainder. Nothing could be more vain. The same discovery had also enmeshed him here; for it was already obvious, into such a state had the public mind been thrown, that had the Commons even consented to a temporary respite, it must have been in defiance of imminent danger to the kingdom. The bill was signed on the 9th of May; and on the 12th, Strafford, "the greatest subject in power, and little inferior to any in fortune that was at that time in any of the three kingdoms,"‡ suffered on the scaffold.

Such were the instant consequences of Pym's discovery of the army plot; and others, almost equally remarkable, will be noticed hereafter. Lord Clarendon has not failed, therefore, to assail the character of the vigilant patriot on this point; and, treating the real plot as a very trifling affair, charges Pym in his history with having used it only to agitate the public mind, and raise terrifying tumults. Admitting, however, subsequently, that what was really discovered "gave great credit and reputation to Mr. Pym's vigilance and activity," he takes occasion to add, that at this period "Mr. Pym had all tavern and ordinary discourses carried to him;" which only leaves us to regret that the treachery of such men as "Mr. Hyde" should have rendered such vigilance necessary. Notwithstanding all this, nothing is more certain, at least, than that this same "Mr. Hyde" partook of the terrors which Pym excited, since he carried up the first message to the Lords, was foremost in the affair of the "protestation," which so effectually roused the country, and, with his friend Lord Falkland, managed a sudden conference with the Lords respecting the bill for the continuance of Parliament.* It was only the "Earl of Clarendon" who, many years after, found it convenient to represent the conspiracy as having been exaggerated for factious purposes; and, notwithstanding the thorough exposure of his falsehoods, carelessness, and disingenuousness by Mr. Brodie and Mr. Hallam,† he has found a very resolute and ingenious follower in the present day, who yet persists in saying that the only solid mischief of the army plot was worked "by the adroit management of Pym, whose vigorous conceptions could create mighty consequences from slight events, and on whose bold designs now revolved the fate of an empire."‡

* Const. Hist., vol. ii., p. 155.

† That is, two days after Pym's discovery of the army plot.

‡ Clarendon.

It is now necessary to go back a little. Some few weeks before the death of Strafford, Pym had been specially chosen by the Commons to justify the impeachment and detention of Laud, on the occasion of their delivering to the Lords the articles that had been prepared against him. The time was well selected, in reference to measures respecting prelacy and the Star Chamber, then instantly depending; and the speech is not only so remarkable in itself, but so little known, that it claims a place in his memoir.§ The articles having been read, Pym opened his task with a very striking effect.

"My lords," he said, "there is an expression in the Scripture which I will not presume either to understand or to interpret; yet, to a vulgar eye, it seems to have an aspect something suitable to the person and cause before you. It is a description of the evil spirits, wherein they are said to be 'spirituall wickednesses in high places.' Crimes acted by the spirituall faculties of the soule, the will, and the understanding, exercised about spirituall matters, concerning God's worship and the salvation of man, seconded with power, authoritie, learning, and many other advantages, doe make the partie who commits them very suitable to that description—SPIRITUALL WICKEDNESSES IN HIGH PLACES.

"These crimes, my lords, are various in their nature, haynous in their qualitie, and universall in their extent. If you examine them theologically, as they stand in opposition to the truth of God, they will be found to be against the rule of faith, against the power of godliness, against the means of salvation. If you examine them morally, as they stand in opposition to the light of nature, to right reason, and the principles of humane societie, you will then perceive pride without any moderation; even such a pride as that is which 'exalts' itself 'above all that is called God.' Malice without any provocation, malice against vertue, against innocency, against pietie! Injustice without any means of restitution; even such injustice as doeth robbe the present times of their possessions, the future of their possibilities! If they be examined, my lords, by legall rules, in a civill way, as they stand in opposition to the publike goode, and to the lawes of the land, the accused will be found to be a traytour against his majestie's crowne, an incendiary against the peace of the state, the highest, the boldest, the most impudent oppressor that ever was an oppressor both of king and people.

"This charge, my lords, is distributed and conveyed into fourteene severall articles, as you have hearde; and those articles are onely generall; it being the intention of the House of Commons (which they have commanded me to declare) to make them more certaine and particular by preparatory examinations, to be taken with the helpe of your Lordships' House, as in the case of my Lord of Strafford. For the present I shall runne through them with a light touch, onely marking, in each of them, some special points of venome, virulency, and malignitie.

"The first article, my lords, doth containe his indeavour to introduce into this kingdome an arbitrary power of government, without any limitations or rules of law. This, my lords, is against the safetie of the king's person, the honour of his crowne, and most destructive to his people. Those causes which are most perfect have not onely a power to produce effects, but to conserve and cherish them. The seminary vertue, and the nutritive vertue in vegetables, doe produce from the same principles. It was the defect of justice, the restraining of oppression and violence, that first brought government into the world, and set up kings, the most excellent way of government; and by the maintenance of justice, all kinds of government receive a sure foundation and establishment. It is this that hath in it an abilitie to preserve and secure the royall power of kings—yea, to adorn and increase it.

"In the second article your lordships may observe absolute and unlimited power defended by preaching—by sermons and other discourses, printed and published upon that subject; and truly, my lords, it seems to be a prodigious crime that the trueth of God and his holy law should be perverted to defend the lawlessness of man; that the holy and sacred function of the ministry, which was ordained for instruction of men's soules in the wayes of God, should be so abused that the ministers are become trumpets of sedition, the promoters and defenders of violence and oppression!

"In the third article, my lords, you have the judges, who, under his majestie, are the dispensers and distributors of justice, frequently corrupted by feare and solicitation; you have the course of justice in the execution of it shamefully obstructed; and, if a willful act of injustice in a judge be so high a crime in the estimate of the law as to deserve death, under what burthen of guilt doth this man lye, who hath beene the cause of great numbers of such voluntary and willful acts of injustice!

"In the fourth article hee will be found, in his owne person, to have sold justice in causes depending before him, and by his wicked counsell indeavouring to make his majestie a merchant of the same commoditie; onely with this difference, that the king, by taking money for places of judicature, should sell it in grosse, whereas the archbishop sold it by retails.

"In the fifth article there appears a power

* See the Journals. Colepepper, with Falkland, Hyde, and Whitelocke, all "moderate men," were equally warm supporters of this very "unconstitutional" measure.

† Hist. of Brit. Empire, vol. iii., p. 109–114, note. Const. Hist., vol. ii., p. 154, note.

‡ D'Israeli's Commentaries, vol. iv., p. 172.

§ I give the extracts from a small quarto in my possession, printed for Ralph Mabb, 1641.

usurped of making canons, and of laying obligations on the subjects in the nature of lawes; while this power is abused to the making of such canons, as are in the matter of them very pernicious, being directly contrarie to the prerogative of the king and the libertie of the people. In the manner of pressing of them may bee found fraud and shuffling; in the conclusion, violence and constraint, men being forced by terrour and threatening to subscribe to all: which power, thus wickedly gotten, has beene laboured to bee established by perjurie, and the injoyning such an oathe for the maintenance of it as can neither bee taken nor kept with a good conscience.

"In the sixth article you have the king robbed of his supremacy; you have a papall power exercised over his majestie's subjects, in their consciences and in their persons; you have ecclesiasticall jurisdiction claimed by an incident right, which the law declares to proceed from the crowne. And herein your lordships may observe, that those who labour in civill matters to set up the king above the lawes of the kingdome, doe yet, in ecclesiasticall matters, endeavour to set up themselves above the king. This was first procured by the archbishop to bee extra-judicially declared by the judges, and then to bee published in a proclamation. In doing whereof hee hath made the king's throne but a footstool for his owne and their pride.

"You have, my lords, in the seventh article, religion undermined and subverted; you have poperie cherished and defended; you have all this seconded with power and violence: by severe punishment upon those which have opposed this mischievous intention, and by subtle and eager persecution, hath the power of ecclesiasticall commissioners, of the Star Chamber and councill-table, beene made subservient to the wicked designe.

"My lords, you may observe, in the eighth article, great care taken to get into his owne hande the power of nominating to ecclesiasticall livings and promotions. You have as much mischievous, as much wicked care taken in disposing of these preferments, to the hindrance and corruption of religion; and by this meanes, my lords, it is that the king's sacred majestie, instead of sermons fit for spirituall instructours, hath often given forth invectives against his people, encouragements to injustice, or to the overthrow of the lawes! Such chaplaines have beene brought, indeed, into his owne service, as have as much as may bee laboured to corrupt his owne household, and beene eminent examples of corruption to others; which hath, moreover, so farre prevailed, as that it hath exceedingly tainted the universities, and beene generally disperst through all the chiefe cities, the greatest townes and auditories of the kingdome; the grievous effects whereof are most manifest to the Commons' House, there being divers hundred complaints there depending against scandalous ministers, and yet I believe the hundredth part of them not yet brought in.

"The ninth article sets out the like care to have chaplaines of his owne, that might bee promoters of this wicked and traytorous designe; men of corrupt judgements, of corrupt practice, extremely addicted to superstition; and to such men's cares hath beene committed the lycensing of bookes to the presse, by meanes whereof many have beene published that are full of falshood—of scandals; such as have beene more worthy to bee burnt by the hande of the hangman in Smithfield (as I thinke one of them was*) than to bee admitted to come into the handes of the king's people.

"In the tenth article it will appeare how hee, having made these approaches to poperie, comes now to close and joyn more nearely with it. Hee confederates with priests and Jesuits; hee, by his instruments, negotiates with the pope at Rome,† and hath correspondence with them that hee authorized from Rome here. Hee hath permitted a Romane hierarchie to bee set up in this kingdome. And though hee hath beene so careful that a poore man could not goe to the neighbour parish to heare a sermon when hee had none at home, could not have a sermon repeated nor prayer used in his owne family but hee was a fit subject for the High Commission court; yet the other hath beene done in all partes of the realme, and no notice taken of it by any ecclesiasticall judges or courts.

"My lords, you may perceive preaching suppressed in the eleventh article; divers godly and orthodox ministers oppressed in their persons and estates. You have the king's loyall subjects banished out of the kingdome, not as Elimelech, to seeke for bread in forraigne countries by reason of the great scarcitie which was in Israel, but travelling abroad for the bread of life because they could not have it at home, by reason of the spirituall famine of God's word caused by this man and his partakers; and by this meanes, you have had the trade, the manufactory, the industry of many thousands of his majestie's subjects carried out of the land. It is a miserable abuse of the spirituall keyes to shut up the doors of heaven and to open the gates of hell; to let in prophaneness, ignorance, superstition, and errour. I shall need say no more. These things are evident, and abundantly knowne to all.

"In the twelfth article, my lords, you have a division indeavoured betweene this and the forraigne reformed churches. Now the Church of Christ is one body, and the members of Christ have a mutuall relation as members of the same body. Unity with God's true Church everywhere is not onely the beautie, but the strength of religion; of which beautie and strength hee hath sought to deprive this church, by his manifold attempts to break this union. To which purpose hee hath suppressed the privileges granted to the Dutch and French churches; hee hath denied them to bee of the same faith and religion with us; and many other wayes hath hee declared his malice to those churches.

"In the thirteenth article, as hee hath sought to make an ecclesiasticall division, or religious difference betweene us and forraigne nations, so hee hath sought to make a civill difference between us and his majestie's subjects of the kingdome of Scotland. And this hee hath promoted by many innovations, there prest by himselfe and his owne authoritie. When they were uncapable of such alterations, hee advised his majestie to use violence. Hee hath made private and publike collections towards the maintenance of that warre, which hee might justly call his owne warre; and with an impudent boldnesse, hee hath struck tallies in the exchequer for divers summes of money procured by himselfe, pro defensione regni; when, by his counsellors, the king was drawne to undertake, not a defensive, but an offensive warre.

* An allusion to one of Mainwaring's books.

† The celebrated offer from the court in Italy to make Laud a cardinal, and his doubts, hesitation, and final refusal—"because somewhat dwelt within him which would not suffer that, till Rome was other than it was"—were all recorded in Laud's diary by his own hand, and are well known. Rome still cherished, in those days, the project of restoring its communion in England.

"Hee hath lastly, my lords, thought to secure himselfe and his partie by seeking to undermine Parliaments, and thereby hath laboured to bereave this kingdome of the legislative power, which can onely bee used in Parliaments. We should then have bene left a kingdome without that which, indeed, makes and constitutes a kingdome, and is the onely meane to preserve and restore it from distempers and decayes. Hee hath hereby endeavoured to bereave us of the highest judicatory; such a judicatory as is necessarie and essentiall to our government. Some cases cannot bee tried in any inferiour court, as divers cases of treason, and others concerning the prerogative of the crowne and libertie of the people. It is the supream judicatory to which all difficult cases resort from other courts. Thus hee hath sought to deprive the king of the love and counsell of his people, of that assistance which hee might have from them, and likewise to deprive the people of that reliefe of grievances which they most humbly expect from his majestie.

"My lords, the Parliament is the cabinet wherein the chiefest jewells both of the crowne and kingdome are deposited. The great prerogative of the king and the libertie of the people are most effectually exercised and maintained by Parliaments. Here, my lords, you cannot passe by this occasion of great thanks to God and his majestie for passing the bill whereby the frequent course of Parliaments is established; which, I assure myselfe, hee will by experience finde to bee a strong foundation both of his honour and his crowne.

"This is all, my lords, I have to say to the particulars of the charge. The Commons desire your lordships that they may have the same way of examination that they had in the case of the Earle of Strafford; that is, to examine members of all kinds of your Lordships' House and their owne, and others, as they shall see cause; and those examinations to bee kept secret and private, that they may with more advantage bee made use of when the matter comes to tryall."

Nothing is more striking in this speech than the utter absence of any thing like sectarian intolerance; and nothing, it will be admitted, after reading this and other evidences of opinion to be adduced hereafter, has been so much misunderstood as the nature and influence of religion on the mind of this great speaker and statesman. It will have been observed throughout the speech just given, that he restricts himself with singular closeness to the political influence of Laud's administration; that he chooses the plainest and most obvious illustrations of its despotic tendency; and that he employs no language, strong as the temptation would have been to a man of bigoted persuasions, beyond what is simply necessary to carry his positions distinctly home. The leading sentiment through the whole is that of a vigorous and practical statesman. In the exposing Laud's design to set up a "Roman hierarchie"—in the showing the false claim to "ecclesiastical jurisdiction," grounded on "an incident right" which "the law declares to proceed from the crowne"—in the stripping bare the pretensions of "those who labour in civill matters to set up the king above the lawes of the kingdome, and yet in ecclesiasticall matters doe indeavour to set up themselves above the king"—we see nothing that is not worthy of the highest order of political capacity, and, indeed, nothing that has not directly proceeded from it. It is to be supposed, in charity, that all the elaborate accounts in the family histories of the bigotry and intolerance of Pym, and that all the accusations against him of "mysterious jargon" in the religious matters of government, are not the offspring of deliberate falsehood. I have found it difficult even to find many of Pym's speeches, and others may have found it equally difficult, or, at least, inconvenient, to read them.

Now, however, once for all, before I proceed to resume the active course of Pym's life, after the death of Strafford, let me interpose some few remarks concerning this "mysterious jargon" which we have heard so much of, from so many various quarters, in reference to the speeches of Pym and the popular leaders of the day. Its utter inapplicability, practically speaking, has been proved already by these pages; but there is a certain question involved in the very circumstance of the charge having been made at all, which bears a relation to the subject of this memoir too important to be passed over in silence.

"Mysterious jargon," being translated, means nothing more than a frequent recurrence of the phraseology of Scripture; and to this, in a certain kind and degree, Pym may very proudly plead guilty. Something beyond this, however, is to be said; not in vindication of the practice, for it needs none, but in explanation of the influences it sprang from, and of the cause of its so potent and universal action at this period in the atmosphere of life and thought. This is never sufficiently kept in view. Every one can think himself privileged to laugh at the too exclusive search after parallelism in the deeds of the Hebrew worthies indulged by the people generally in Pym's days; but very few have thought it worth while to go sufficiently back to understand the original idea, or movement of the mind, of which these are the vestiges only. The mighty sound is gone: by the mere echo, thunder itself seems no perilous matter.

Revert, however, to the very beginning. It is not my province or intention here to explain or reason on, but simply to state the fact, that the fountain of influence—of the great influence in this world—has been the Bible; that book whose first words* announce what philosophers have at length agreed to be the one and only truth we are capable of demonstrating, and which one truth seems a fit object enough to employ, and destined to employ, life. In the next place, that book is the history of a certain race : it is meant to be the type of a nation. The nature of the institutions it records is not within my present province to discuss ; suffice it to say, that whenever the general intellect of man has grown too large for its institutions, or its tyrannies of habit and custom, it has gone instinctively back to those records to renew its strength, and to take a new course by their direction, as the enfeebled or restless man of civilization might compare himself from time to time with Plato's original type of man, to ascertain his precise situation. Afterward Christ came to "fulfil the law ;" in other words, to give this type anew in all its freshness. Then the Crusades followed ; the Reformation ; the emancipation of mind, and modern freedom of thought—all of which are to be held, in an inquiry of this kind, as recurrences to the one grand type. The graceful arts, meanwhile, constituted as they are to benefit man, must of course rise or fall with his dignity, and hence a simultaneous influence on these arts has been the effect of these recurrences. This is not the place to pursue the inquiry in detail ; but let the scholar, at his leisure, glance at the progress from Dante through all the changes till Milton—from Giotto and Ghiberti to Michael Angelo, and down again to Poussin—or advance from the most timid Christianity of Palestrina and Pergolesi to the pure and magnificent Hebraism of Handel.

* IN THE BEGINNING, GOD CREATED THE HEAVEN AND THE EARTH.

Keeping all this in view, the nature of the epoch we are considering, and the position of the men, will explain the rest. An attempt appeared to be in progress to check the impulses of the Reformation, when terrible energies sprang from the rebound, and imbodyed themselves in the Eliots, the Pym, the Hampdens, and the Vanes ; and new passions and emotions were scattered abroad among the people, under the forms of the great original type of power and expression, to check the threatened retreat into bigoted faith and slavish obedience. It is not difficult to follow up the result. Imagine the great public mind overlaid and opposed by a dissolute and artificial court, consecrated and made plausible in its pretences by a literature growing out of, and adapted to, the most servile court in the world (that of Augustus) : see all thoughts expressing themselves in that literature—testing themselves, their worth, their approvedness by it only, and running only in such a channel—and then imagine that mind recurring, in unison with the laws I have mentioned, to the old type—bursting forth into the primæval liberty—plunging itself suddenly back among the rich treasures of thought and feeling disclosed in the translation of the Bible—the ancient manners revealed ! the lessons of the inspired teachers taught again ! the days when all were equal contrasted, to the people, with their own ! or when, in the midst of the petty kings of Moab and Edom, the free people of Israel, without a king, lived majestically ! Imagine all this, and nothing will be wanting to explain the source of the wildest fancies of the time, or the origin of the form which many of the thoughts of the greatest writers and orators assumed. There will be an opportunity of pursuing this into all its relations when treating of the life and works of Vane. Meanwhile Pym restrained the tendency, while he guided it no less, up to the hour of his death. In himself, in Eliot, and in Hampden, we see the grand development of one of those recurrences to the first idea or type—the beginning of that movement of mind, of that stride in the progress of man, which had its subsequent consummation in the intellect of Vane. Pym was Vane's first friend—he was his teacher, so to speak : he introduced him into public life.*

Every accession, if the term may be used, of originality of thought, brings with it necessarily an accession of a certain originality of style. The one is progressive as the other, with obvious limits and restrictions. The thoughts of Pym's days, assimilating themselves in the grandness of a common object to the first and intensest ideas of the world, clung also round the simple and sublime language of the earliest ages, and indeed sought and struggled not to be disconnected from the very words last used when God was before his people in the cloud and the flame. But, apart from this natural consequence, where can be found such an oratorical text-book as the Bible ! Not, assuredly, in Greece or Rome ! Pym availed himself of it with a most admirable taste, no less than the profoundest political purpose. Nothing, indeed, throughout this great man's life, is more observable than that in which it has been most grossly misunderstood—his invariable treatment of religion as an element of political government. Let it always be recollected that, to him, a true political government was religion. His was that great capacity in which bad government and good faith, or good government and bigoted faith, could not coexist. To be free in thought and in act—to secure responsibility in government, and security in the public liberties, was, with him, to set up the true religion in its purity. It was with Pym the practice first began, in these days, of prosecuting the public measures on the Sabbath itself in certain crises ;† and no doubt with a view to its profound result on the minds of the people, that, in thus using the very day they were most urgent to free from the desecration of the court, they made, as it were, their business Heaven's own, and, "standing in the great hand of God," had become once again his ministers.

All this it was which produced Milton also ; whose life and works are a deliberate looking forth into the world and into paradise, and a final choice of the latter. His thoughts ever aspired upward and upward to the Hebrew theocracy, beyond "insolent Greece and haughty Rome," and "all that they have left us." In his Paradise Regained, indeed, he has chosen to condense the whole argument in one glorious and triumphant passage. After bringing forward—irresistibly, to all antagonists but one, and that one himself—the position that "All knowledge is not couch'd in Moses' law,

The Pentateuch, or what the Prophets wrote :
The Gentiles also know, and write, and teach
To admiration, led by Nature's light,
And with the Gentiles much thou must converse"—

* Strafford Papers, vol. ii.

† He did this on the occasion of the discovery of Waller's plot, as will be seen shortly.

after going to the very heart of the argument, and fortifying it by a eulogium on Athens which makes even the greatest work of Sophocles, written professedly to flatter Colonos, his native ἄνθρωπος, wholly tame in the comparison, he calmly and forever sets the question at rest in that magnificent reply of the Saviour, the conclusion of which is indeed the true "device" of the Pym and Vanes.

"Their orators then extoll'd, as those
The top of eloquence; statists indeed,
And lovers of their country, as may seem;
But herein to our PROPHETS far beneath,
As men divinely taught, and better teaching
The solid rules of civil government,
In their majestic, unaffected style,
Than all the oratory of Greece and Rome:
In them is plainest taught, and easiest learnt,
What makes a nation happy, and keeps it so!"

After the death of Strafford, public affairs advanced to a crisis rapidly. The gradual disclosures made under Pym's committee, appointed to investigate the recent and still continuing conspiracies against the Parliament and people, served to keep the public mind excited and vigilant; special measures were taken for the security of Portsmouth; the queen's confessor and other Roman Catholic attendants were dismissed; and her mother, Mary de Medici, who had sought shelter in England from the power of Richelieu, was requested ("the rather, for the quieting of the jealousies in the hearts of his majesty's well-affected subjects, occasioned by some ill instruments about the queen's person") to leave the kingdom. Upon this, Henrietta herself expressed a wish and an intention to leave England, her health requiring her, she said, to take the waters of Spa. That this was not her real purpose, however, was more than suspected by the popular leaders; and Pym conducted certain negotiations on the subject which ended in her majesty's declining the journey. It was supposed, and subsequently rendered almost certain, that Henrietta's motive was to have sought foreign aid against the Parliament.*

Bills had passed, meanwhile, for the abolition of the Court of Star Chamber, the High Commission, the Court of York, the Court of the Welsh Marches, and other horrible engines of the administration of Strafford and Laud; and a subsidy bill was sent with them to the king to receive the royal assent. The subsidy bill received it at once, while no notice was taken of the others. Charles still madly clung to his old ecclesiastical government, and could not, without heavy pangs, surrender the terrors of the Star Chamber. But it fared with this as with every thing else. While murmurs were not distinctly heard throughout the city, and while the Commons were in hard and secret debate with closed doors, the monarch, suddenly alarmed, hurried down to the House of Lords, and summoning the Commons, and rebuking them for their distrust, gave his assent to both the bills. It was the sad misfortune of this prince to banish every semblance of grace from his concessions. In each and all he never failed to leave a drop of bitterness that was enough to poison the whole. His conduct on the present occasion, betraying what his hope and his will still was, had the effect of driving in the current against Church government and the prelacy more strongly and violently than ever. The "root and branch" petition was revived in the House of Commons.

* See Rushworth, vol. iv., p. 349, 350; and Parliamentary History. The message of the Commons after her majesty's compliance with their request, and her answer, are characteristic: "That because we understand, by Sir Theodore Mayerne, that the chief cause of her majesty's sickness and distempers proceed from some discontent of her mind, the House of Commons have thought good to declare, 'that if any thing within the power of Parliament may give her majesty contentment, they are so tender of her health, both in due respect to his most excellent majesty and herself, that they will be ready to further her satisfaction in all things, so far as may stand with that public duty to which they are obliged.'" Answer: "I give many thanks to both houses of Parliament for their great care of my health, and their affection to me, hoping I shall see the effect of it. Truly nothing but my health could have made me to resolve of this journey; and if I thought I could serve the king and this kingdom with the hazard of my life, I would do it. And I hope you will believe that I have so much interest in the good of this kingdom, that I shall never wish any thing to the prejudice of it. You will pardon the imperfectness of my English. I had rather spoken in any other language, but I thought this would be most acceptable."

The rise and present influence of the Republican party in that house will be described in the life of Vane. It is only necessary to treat of these religious questions, in which they now especially busied themselves, in so far as they strikingly illustrate the political course of Pym, which was, in reality, as decided here as it was in every other dispute where good government lay on one side and tyranny on the other. It might serve Clarendon's purpose to secure the authority of Pym in favour of his darling Episcopacy; but why have modern writers, without his cause to sustain, adopted his errors and misrepresentations?*

A vote passed to the effect that the bishops should not sit in Parliament, and the grounds of the vote were communicated in a conference to the Lords. Their lordships at once resolved the contrary of this vote; not in much love for the bishops, but with no little alarm for themselves. The Commons, on this, lost no time in changing their resolution to a bill, which disabled the bishops and clergy from temporal functions. On the third reading in the upper House,† the bishops' votes were restored, and the Commons, after two conferences, refused to receive the "amended" bill. A memorable result followed. A bolder measure was projected; and a bill for the utter abolishing and taking away of archbishops, bishops, deans, archdeacons, and their officers, out of the Church of England, was drawn up by Saint John, and at once introduced. It was read twice on the day of its introduction,‡ and went into committee on the 11th of June, fifteen days after.

Now mark what Clarendon says on this subject. After observing that on its first intro-

* Lord Nugent says, in his Memorials of Hampden, that "Pym was but a faint supporter of the bill to restrain the bishops from voting; and that, on the further measures for abolishing Episcopacy, he was openly opposed to Hampden, Vane, Fienes," &c. This, as will be shown presently, is an utterly groundless assertion, in so far as the existence of Episcopacy was ever brought in question. My former reference to this subject (p. 185) was in relation to the opinions held by Pym on the ecclesiastical constitution of England as a human institution.

† On this, as on every other matter connected with this bill, Clarendon is guilty of the most wilful, or the most grossly inaccurate error. He says on this that "the Lords could not be prevailed with so much as to commit the bill, but at the second reading utterly cast it out."

‡ See Journals of May, 1641, and an admirable remark in Godwin's History of the Commonwealth, vol. i., p. 61.

duction "the rejecting it was earnestly urged by very many," and repeating some of the remarks to this effect, the "historian" thus proceeds: "The bill was at last read, and no question being to be put upon the first reading, it was laid by, and not called upon in a long time after.* When everybody expected that nothing should be mentioned in the House but the dispatch of the treaty of the pacification, they called in a morning 'for the bill' (that had so long before been brought in by Sir Edward Dering†) 'for the extirpation of Episcopacy,' and gave it a second reading; and resolved 'that it should be committed to a committee of the House, and that it should be proceeded upon the next morning.' It was a very long debate the next morning, after the speaker had left the chair, who should be in the chair for the committee; they who wished well to the bill having resolved 'to put Mr. Hyde into the chair, that he might not give them trouble by frequent speaking, and so too much obstruct the expediting the bill.' In conclusion, Mr. Hyde was commanded to the chair; they who were enemies to the bill being divided in opinion, many believing that he would obstruct the bill more in that place than if he remained at liberty, and they found it to be true. . . . The chairman perplexed them very much;‡ for besides that at the end of his report every day to the House, before the House put the question for the concurrence in the votes, he always enlarged himself against every one of them, and so spent them much time; when they were in the heat and passion of the debate, he often ensnared them in a question;§ so that when he reported to the House the work of the day, he did frequently report two or three votes directly contrary to each other. . . . After near twenty days spent in that manner, they found themselves very little advanced towards a conclusion, and that they must review all that they had done; and the king being resolved to begin his journey for Scotland, they were forced to discontinue their beloved bill, and let it rest."||

Such and so despicable is the self-sketches character of the loyal and religious Clarendon! Setting aside his plain falsehoods in these memorable extracts, what mean and pitiful pettefogger of the law would not feel shame to be set down as a party to the tricks which are here unblushingly, and, indeed, with a self-satisfied chuckle, described! And what is the worth of the testimony of such a writer on any disputed matter! not to speak of the present, wherein he lent himself to such despicable meanness.

Another extract, from Clarendon's own life,

* Vol. i., p. 418.

† The only just remark I can find in Clarendon about the whole of this matter relates to this weak and silly gentleman, to whose hands the bill was injudiciously committed, and who will be heard of soon in a very different character. Clarendon observes that the popular party "prevailed with Sir Edward Dering, a man very opposite to all their designs (but a man of levity and vanity, easily flattered by being commended), to present it to the House; which he did from the gallery, with the two verses in Ovid, the application whereof was his greatest motive:

"Cuncta prius tentanda, sed immedicabile vulnus Ense recidendum est, ne pars sincera trahatur."

—Vol. i., p. 416.

‡ These words are introduced for the first time in the recent Oxford edition.

§ These also are restored for the first time.

|| Vol. i., p. 484.

completes the picture he has left of himself at this period. "When Mr. Hyde sat in the chair, in the grand committee of the House for the extirpation of Episcopacy, all that party made great court to him, and the House keeping those disorderly hours, and seldom rising till after four of the clock in the afternoon, they frequently importuned him to dine with them at Mr. Pym's lodgings, which was at Sir Richard Manly's house, in a little court behind Westminster Hall, where he and Mr. Hampden, Sir A. Hazlerig, and two or three more, upon a stock kept a table, where they transacted much business, and invited thither those of whose conversion they had any hope." Except in the lively illustration it affords of the party system of the time, this statement is quite as little worth credit as the others, and, indeed, carries internal evidence of misrepresentation. The same writer, in his history, could say that Pym took no interest in the progress of the anti-Episcopacy measure! The truth was, that if he was interested in any thing more than that at this particular time, it was in the evident trimming and shuffling of "Mr. Hyde" himself.

Meanwhile, before turning to consider the latter, let me exhibit the feelings of Pym respecting these questions in an unequivocal shape. When, for various reasons, this Church bill was temporarily suspended, Pym was the author of a very resolute and decisive measure. Some months before, in the midst of all the threatening aspects of the time, the bishops had exhibited their gross love of tyranny, and their still grosser folly, in enacting a series of canons in convocation, which imposed oaths, introduced innovations, and set aside the laws of the land. Pym now pointed out the propriety of impeaching the thirteen prelates who had been most active in framing the canons. I will extract the result of this motion from its place in the journals.

"Mr. Pym declared from the House of Commons that there is nothing of greater importance to the safety and good of the kingdom, than that this high court of Parliament, which is the fountain of justice and government, should be kept pure and uncorrupted, free from partiality and bye respects. This will not only add lustre and reputation, but strength and authority, to all our actions. Herein, he said, your lordships are specially interested, as you are a third estate by inheritance and birth-right; so the Commons are publicly interested by representation of the whole body of the commons of this kingdom, whose lives, fortunes, and liberties are deposited under the custody and trust of the Parliament.

"He said, the Commons have commanded him and his colleague, Mr. Solicitor General, to present to your lordships two propositions, which they thought very necessary to be observed and put in execution at this time. First, that the thirteen bishops, which stand accused before your lordships for making the late pretended canons and constitutions, may be excluded from their votes in Parliament. Secondly, that all the bishops may be suspended from their votes upon that bill, entitled, An Act to disable all Persons in Holy Orders to exercise any Jurisdiction or Authority Temporal.

"The first of these was committed to his charge, and he said he would support it with three reasons: First. That the thirteen bishops have broken that trust to which every member of Parliament is obliged; which trust is to maintain, 1. The prerogative of the king. 2. The privilege of Parliaments. 3. The property of the subject. 4. The peace of the kingdom. These were the jewels, he said, that are deposited under the trust of Parliament; and this trust these prelates had broken, not by one transient act, but by setting up canons in nature of laws to bind the kingdom forever.

"That the canons are of this nature, appeared by the votes of both Houses; and that they were all parties to the making thereof, appeared by the acts of that synod. The book itself the Commons cannot tender to your lordships, because they sent for it, but he that hath the book in custody was out of town; but a member of their own House, upon view of it, is ready to depose that their names were entered among those that did subscribe to it.

"Wherefore the House of Commons desire your lordships, in the first place, to consider whether they that take to themselves a legislative power, destructive to Parliaments, be fit to exercise that power of making laws which only belongs to the Parliament.

"Secondly. Whether it be safe for the Commonwealth that they should be trusted with making laws, who, as much as in them lay, have endeavoured to deprive the subject of those good laws which are already made.

"A third reason is this, That they stand accused of crimes very heinous; that is, of sedition, and of subversion of the laws of the kingdom. This will easily appear in the nature of the canons themselves, as also by the votes to which your lordships and the Commons have already agreed. Standing so accused, is it fit that they should have the exercise of so great a thing as the continuing of their votes and places in Parliament?"

And, though it occurred some few months after this time, I will here present also Pym's speech at a conference with the Lords, on delivering a charge against Lord Digby (recently raised to their Lordships' House), since it has immediate relation to the same question, is sufficiently explanatory of itself, and is a still more distinct and forcible expression than any which has yet been given of the grounds of Pym's opposition to the temporal power and authority of bishops:

"My lords, the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the House of Commons, now assembled in Parliament, have commanded me to present to your lordships this information, which they have received against the Right Honourable George, lord Digby, of such dangerous consequence, that, if not prevented, evil and troublesome events may ensue, to the great hazarding the peace of this kingdom, and the great hindrance of the happy proceedings of this Parliament.

"My lords, I humbly crave your patience to declare to your lordships what I am commanded concerning the said information, which is, that he, the said Lord Digby, should give forth report, upon reading the late petition and protestation of the twelve bishops, 'that the present Parliament was a forced one; and that the acts, votes, and laws that should be enacted therein, without the votes and assents of the bishops, are void and of none effect, and not binding to the subject.'

"My lords, this report is of great danger to the state, if proved against the said lord, in these three respects, as I, under your lordships' favour, conceive. First, it is a great breach of the rights and privileges of Parliament; secondly, it intrencheth much on the prerogative of the king, and abridges his royal power; thirdly, it is the first step to bring into this state an arbitrary and tyrannical form of government.

"My lords, it is a breach of the privileges of Parliament for these reasons: It is against the votes of Parliamentary proceedings, which ought to be reserved and unquestionable during the free sitting thereof. It is against the late act of Parliament, in that case made and provided, for not adjourning or abrupt breaking up of the same. This act, my lords, was freely voted by both Houses; freely and willingly passed by his majesty, without any force or compulsory means used by any, or private working of any of the members of either House to induce his majesty to do the same; nay, the act was voted as well by the said lord as the rest of this honourable House. This report, therefore, of his must needs be against his knowledge and former free consent in passing that act. Besides, my lords, one privilege of Parliament, and that one of the greatest, is to accuse and freely proceed to the punishment of delinquents that have caused the troubles in this state, both in Church and Commonwealth. Lord Digby's report is against this privilege, since it opposeth altogether our proceedings against the bishops, accused as the greatest delinquents both in Church and State. For, my lords, if the Parliament is forced in the absence of the bishops, how may then the Parliament proceed lawfully against them? If the bishops sit and have their votes, although delinquents, in Parliament, how can we proceed, I beseech you, against their votes? Then, my lords, to redress the grievances of the Commonwealth is a privilege of Parliament. This report is against this privilege. How, I pray you, my lords, can our grievances be redressed, when the oppressions, injustice, and vexatious troubling of his majesty's loyal subjects by the bishops may not be called in question, nor the misdoers therein prosecuted and punished for the same? Lastly, my lords, under this head, the report is against divers acts of Parliament of this kingdom that have been made without the voice of bishops in Parliament, as is on record in the Parliamentary rolls. And thus, under favour, I have shown you how this report is against the privileges of Parliament.

"Next, my lords, this report intrencheth on the royal power and prerogative of the king, and that in two respects: It intrencheth on his royal prerogative in making and enacting laws by Parliament, it resting only in his power to pass or refuse the votes of Parliament. My lords, the king of this realm has the greatest prerogative (to require the counsel and assistance of the whole State, upon any occasion whatsoever, when it pleaseth him) of any prince in the world, except the King of France : and, under favour, my lords, I conceive a Parliament cannot be termed forced when it is freely called and willingly continued by the king. I conceive, my lords, a forced Parliament is when, against the free consent of a king and his lords, and without lawful calling by writ, men assemble themselves, and by force of arms sit in council and enact laws not tending to the welfare of the kingdom. The Parliament holden in the fourteenth year of the reign of Edward II. was a forced Parliament ; the barons coming thither with horse and arms, and compelling the king to pass what they thought proper to have enacted. Moreover, my lords, this report intrencheth on the royal power of the king in making of laws ; for, as before I have touched, Parliaments have, without bishops, made and enacted laws. By this supposition, my lords, that laws made without bishops are void, bishops, be they never so vile and disaffected to the tranquillity and security of the state, yet must have votes in rectifying and setting in order such things as are amiss in the same—amiss as well by their own procuring as others—a ‘rectifying’ not then likely to take any good effect. Nay, my lords, it is too apparent they have been the greatest opposers of our proceedings in this Parliament, and the chiefest cause why no more is done.

“ Thirdly and lastly, my lords, this report is the first step to bring in an arbitrary and tyrannical form of government ; and that, under favour, for these reasons : Free Parliaments are the securest and safest government that ever could be found for this nation, and that in respect of the power and wisdom thereof. It is upholden, defended, and preserved by the whole body of the kingdom ; therefore powerful : the members thereof are men elected, one out of ten thousand, by the whole state ; therefore esteemed wise. Then to oppose the proceedings thereof, to deny the government thereof, is to change the same ; and, if changed to another form (none being so secure, so powerful, and so wise), it must needs be arbitrary, and so tyrannical. Also, my lords, if no laws can be binding to the subject but such as are voted and assented to by the bishops, then none can be expected but such as are destructive to the state, their affections being altogether averted from free Parliamentary proceedings, and their designs only agitated for the opposing the government thereof ; and we cannot but daily fear the utter confusion of the same thereby.

“ Now, my lords, having, to my weak ability, fulfilled the command of the House of Commons in speaking something on this information, I am to desire your lordships, in their name, that the said George, lord Digby, may answer the said information, or otherwise be proceeded against as the Parliament shall think fit.”

I have remarked that Pym had already seen reason to suspect the secession of “Mr. Hyde” from the popular cause. That celebrated person could never have seemed very secure to the sagacious mind of the leader of the party, and he had given forth no unequivocal signs of his feeling and desires on the already noticed disagreement between the two Houses on the bill to restrain bishops’ votes. Beside him, also, were a party of weak, though probably well-intentioned men, whom his influence controlled. The danger to the cause would obviously be great, if at this moment, and before the bulwarks so recently obtained for the preservation of the public liberties had been firmly placed, such a desertion as Hyde could effect from the ranks of the popular members should be suddenly exhibited to the people. Nothing had been more apparent throughout all the concessions wrested from Charles than that they had only been yielded, subject to a good occasion for reclaiming them. Strafford could not be raised from the dead, and therefore, only, the concession in his case had been harder than in the rest. With a certain semblance of a popular ministry, backed by all the arts of Hyde, and the pretences of half-popular measures, the king had yet the power to strike a heavy blow for the old prerogative. Moreover, the House of Lords were not to be relied on ; and there was too much reason to fear, in various quarters of the country, some still undiscovered sections of the army plot. Charles himself was evidently recovering confidence, while, to save the bishops, the universities were moving heaven and earth.* The course which was, under such circumstances, proposed by Pym, with a view to avert these dangers, has no parallel for vigour and capacity, no less than a most decisive boldness, even in the records of his life.

Charles had warning of it before he departed for Scotland. Doctor Hackett tells us, in his life of Archbishop Williams, that “the bishop, coming to the king, besought his majesty, that for his sake he would put off his Scotch journey to another season. ‘Sir,’ says he, ‘I would it were not true that I shall tell you : some of the Commons are preparing a declaration to make the actions of your government odious. If you gallop to Scotland, they will post as fast, to draw up this biting remonstrance. Stir not till you have mitigated the grand contrivers with some preferments.’ ‘But is this credible?’ says the king. ‘Judge you of that, sir,’ says the bishop, ‘when a servant of Pym’s (in whose master’s house all this is moulded) came to me, to know of me in what terms I was contented to leave mine own case in the Star Chamber exhibited among other irregularities ? and I had much ado to keep my name, and what concerns me, out of these quotations ; but I contrived that of the fellow, and a promise to do me more service, to know all they have in contrivance, with a few sweetbreads that I gave him out of my purse.’ Yet nothing was heeded.”†

Charles’s purpose in this journey was narrowly and jealously watched by the patriots. Many and various reasons had been publicly assigned for it, but the real intention—the double attempts at negotiation with the disbanded officers on the borders, with the Covenanters, and with those who had supplied to Lord Strafford the forged letter by which Savile strove to implicate Pym and Hampden in treasonous purposes—all this was kept carefully in the back ground. One course remained under these circumstances, and was at once adopted. Commissioners were deputed nominally to treat with the Scots concerning the satisfaction of the treaty, but really to thwart and check the king's negotiation with the Covenanters, and to report upon them to the Parliament. Charles went to Scotland, and, at the same time, a committee, openly appointed by the votes of both Houses—and consisting of Lords Bedford and Howard of Escricke, of Hampden, Fiennes, Sir Philip Stapleton, and Sir William Armyne—openly followed him. Soon after his departure, the two Houses, having respectively appointed committees to sit and act during the recess, and intrusted them with extraordinary powers,* adjourned over from the 9th of September to the 20th of October. Pym was appointed chairman of the committee of the House of Commons.

* May’s History of the Parliament.

† Hackett’s Scrinia Reserata, part ii., p. 163.

His fame and influence at this period were unbounded. "I think Mr. Pym was at this time," says Lord Clarendon, "the most popular man, and the most able to do hurt, that hath lived in any time." His name was in the mouths of all, whether the residents of palaces or of the "huts where poor men lie." Every nook and corner of the kingdom was pervaded with his influence and renown, and the fiercest hate or the most unbounded love were equally his great reward.

It is difficult to ascertain, except on the doubtful authority of his enemies, what his private habits were at this time. It is certain, however, that they were not of the rigid or puritanic sort, any more than his opinions were those of the Puritans. The quaint Dr. Hacket describes him, in his peculiar style, as "homo ex argilla, et luto factus epicuræo," as Tully said of Piso—that is, in Christian English, a painted sepulchre, a belly-god;† and the Royalist songs, while they charge him in still plainer terms with having been warmly devoted to Bacchus and Ceres, have left us to conclude that in other matters his habits were by no means constrained.‡ It is not my duty here to enlarge on a point of this kind, which I have already, perhaps, sufficiently adverted to,§ nor would a mention of such statements, drawn as they are from the political lampoons of the time, have been worth giving at all, were it not that graver authorities have seemed to bear them out. With such authority, even fugitive ballads, poignant with the bitterness of the hour so long passed away, are not among the despicable materials of history; and to me, as illustrations of the fugitive aspects of character, catching, as they recede forever, the glancing points of personal manners, they have seemed most valuable. What remains to be said rests on the authority of Sir Philip Warwick, a "grave writer," though a Royalist, as even Mr. Godwin admits, and certainly a very honourable man.

The famous Lucy Percy, the countess of Carlisle, now a beautiful dowager of about forty, had been for some years "entirely devoted" to Strafford, when, upon the death of her favourite, she suddenly transferred her affections to Pym; and from this time, it is certain—the countess still preserving appearances at court —the interior of Whitehall was always better known to the patriot than that of the House of Commons to the king.

The character of such a woman needs some explanation. Warburton calls her the "Erynias" of her time, but without just authority. Her passions were certainly not extreme. The reader who is startled at the apparent contradictions of her life has not read rightly Sir Toby Mathew's description of her character.* "She is of too high a mind and dignity not only to seek, but almost to wish, the friendship of any creature; they whom she is pleased to choose are such as are of the most eminent condition both for power and employments, not with any design towards her own particular either of advantage or curiosity, but her nature values fortunate persons. . . . She prefers the conversation of men to that of women; not but she can talk on the fashions with her female friends, but she is too soon sensible that she can set them as she wills—that pre-eminence shortens all equality. She converses with those who are most distinguished for their conversational powers. . . . Of love freely will she discourse; listen to all its faults, and mark all its power. . . . She cannot herself love in earnest, but she will play with love . . . and will take a deep interest for persons of condition and celebrity."

What wonder, then, if, on the fall of Strafford, and the sudden and most brilliant rise of Pym's fame, we find the grave Sir Philip Warwick playing the part of the scandalous chronicler, and announcing that "Master Pym" had succeeded to the situation of the Earl of Strafford in the affections of my Lady Carlisle!‡ How much of politics there may have been in Pym's love, or how much love in his politics, the reader must determine. As the fact has been stated, it is presented to him with a commentary from Sir Toby Mathew, which seems to render it by no means improbable, on the part of the lady, at least. The wonder remains of how "Master Pym" could find leisure, in the midst of his wonderful and unwearied public labours, for such affairs of practical gallantry as this, and others charged upon him. For the imputation of Hacket, it may remain as he has made it. "Voluptuous and wise withal" the great patriot may have been; and, undoubtedly, the portly and well-dressed person represented in the various engravings circulated at this period§ as the "true effigies of the burgess for Tavistocke;" the open and intelligent face, so resolute and yet so quiet; the long hair flung negligently back from the lofty and deep-thoughted forehead; the full mustaches upon the upper lip, and the neat arrangement of the peaked beard and dress below, present altogether such a picture as may be willingly received of Pym—neither inconsistent with the extraordinary intellect which every one conceded to him, nor bidding absolute defiance to the Royalist slanders.

Of Pym's movements during this short recess of Parliament, and generally before the king's return from Scotland, I have been fortunate in

* See the instructions, Old Parl. Hist., vol. ix., p. 537.

† Scrinia Reserata, part ii., p. 150, 151.

‡ See some extracts from a curious satire of the time, in Appendix B.

§ Life of Strafford, p. 89.

* See Mathew's Letters, or the notes to Fenton's edition of Waller.

† See Sir P. Warwick's Memoirs, p. 204.

‡ Several may be seen in the collection at the British Museum: that by Edward Bower is the best, and I allude to it in the text.

obtaining somewhat curious intelligence (not noticed sufficiently by the histories) in the correspondence of Evelyn. Sir Edward Nicholas, who succeeded Windebanke in the office of secretary of state, had it left to him in charge by the king, before his departure, to furnish diligent information of what was going on in London; and the letters in which this was done, noted and answered in the margin by Charles and posted back to the writer, ultimately fell into Evelyn's hands. These shall now be used in illustration of some striking and disputed historical passages, and of some certain personal details.

The day after the adjournment, Nicholas wrote to Charles a long account of a consoling hope he had, that there were decided differences to be now expected between the two Houses, upon which the king remarks that he is "not much sorrie for it."^{*} In another letter, under date of the 27th of September, mention is made to Charles of a certain paper, the contents of which are not named, but which he says the Lady Carlile had given to the queen, saying "she had it from the Lord Mandeville." Taken in connexion with this, the following is very curious: "I heare," continues Nicholas, "there are diverse meetings in Chelsey att y^e Lo. Mandeville-house and elsewhere, by Pym and others, to consult what is best to bee done at their next meeting in Parliament." Whereupon in this remark by the king: "It were not amiss that some of my servants met lykewise to countermynd their plots, to w^{ch} end speake wth my wyfe, and receive her directions."[†]

This Lord Mandeville is better known by the title of his barony, Kimbolton, in right of which he was at about this period called up to the House of Lords. He now lived at Chelsea, and Pym had taken lodgings near him. The meetings alluded to in the above extracts, the presence of Lady Carlile, the temper of the king, and his anxiety for a "plot" of his own, and the graphic touch with which his majesty's note concludes, are worth rescuing from the secret records of the time. In none of the correspondences do Henrietta's intrigues and the king's subjection appear more manifest than in this of Sir Edward Nicholas. My next extracts will prove her distinct participation, and also that of the king, in Goring's army plot.

In this plot Sir John Berkeley, afterward governor of Exeter, and Captain O'Neale, were deeply implicated.‡ Under date of the 29th of September, Nicholas writes to the king: "Yesterday, at Oatlands, I understood that Sir Jo. Berkeley and Capt. O'Neale were come over, and that they had beeene the day before privately at Weybridge: I was bould then to deliver my opinion to the quenee, that I did believe, if they continued in England, they would bee arrested [by Pym]. Her majestie seemed (when I tould it her) to appehend noe lesse, and will, I believe, take order that notice may bee given to them of y^e danger." In a letter of the 5th of October he adds: "The Commons' committee met, and had before them Sir Jo. Berkeley and Capt. O'Neale, who were (as I heare) yesterday apprehended by the servant of the serjeant att arms."^{*} Here the king remarks, "I hope some day they may repent their severitie;" and at the close of the letter, Nicholas having told him of the jocund cheerfulness of Pym and his friends, Charles subjoins, "I believe, before all be done, that they will not have such great cause of joy." Again: Nicholas having written in his next letter, "Mr. Pym reports that the Earle of Arguile is chancellor of that kingdome (Scotland);" Charles affixes to the passage these significant words: "You may see by this that all his designes hit not; and I hope, before all be done, that he shall miss of more." And in the despatch following this, the secretary having implored the immediate return of the king, saying that, "if your majestie doe not hasten to bee here some dayes before y^e next meeting in Parliament, I doubt there will bee few that will dare to appeare here to oppose y^e partie that now swayeth;" Charles answered: "Though I cannot return so soon as I could wishe, yet I am confident that you will finde there was necessitie for it, and I hope that manie will misse of their ends."

No one in the slightest degree acquainted with the character of Charles, and with the peculiar intrigues he was at this very period carrying on in Scotland, will hesitate to attach sufficient meaning to these covert threats against Pym and the popular leaders. There had never been a time in which greater danger threatened the people's cause than now; never was there a time—looking at the daily defections within the House of Commons, at the falling off of the Lords without, at the rotten condition of the army, and the notorious and well-proved perfidy of the king—wherein a greater necessity existed for some grand appeal to the people, not simply to save the freedom of Parliament, but even the lives of its most illustrious members; not simply to secure the permanence of those provisions which had been achieved for the public liberty, but even to ward off the substitution of a naked despotism. Pym and Hampden acted with a perfect knowledge of these things, then, far beyond our imperfect surmise now.

Parliament reassembled, after the recess, on the day to which it stood adjourned, the 20th of October. In an able and lucid statement,† ^{*} Evelyn's Memoirs, vol. ii., part ii., p. 18, quarto ed., 1619. In the two following letters there are some curious particulars respecting the crown jewels, with injunctions to peculiar secrecy, which are of a little significant of the king's purposes at this time.—P. 21–23.

† In a subsequent letter Nicholas tells the king that he had communicated respecting all this with her majesty, but that she "saith that cannot be done in your majestie's absence." Charles answers: "I confess, not so well, but yet so much as may do much good; therefore be diligent in it."—P. 34.

‡ See a curious marginal note by Charles at p. 142.

§ See May's History.

* Pym's own report of this affair, delivered on the reassembling of Parliament, differs from this. He said, "Next there came to me, to my lodgings at Chelsea, Sir John Berkeley and Serjeant-major O'Neal, who said they heard they were accused, and had rashly withdrawn themselves; but, upon better consideration, they were returned to submit to the pleasure of the House. I thought it my duty to make some privy counsellor acquainted therewith, whereupon I went to my Lord Willmot with them, who undertook they should attend the committee the next sitting, which they did accordingly; and, in pursuance of the order and warrant of the House for the apprehending of them, they were both attached by the serjeant's deputy: so the House may be pleased to send for them, and to do therein as they see cause."—Parl. Hist., vol. x., p. 5.

† See Parl. Hist., vol. x., p. 1–6.

Pym reported the proceedings of the committee during the recess. While yet engaged upon this duty, news arrived in London of that celebrated occurrence at Edinburgh which is well known in history by the name of the "Incident." Through all the mystery which yet envelops this affair, one thing is not denied; that Charles received from Montrose his project of assassination, and, having received it, continued Montrose in his service and confidence. Montrose had indeed established a lasting hold upon Charles's favour by the proposition he coupled with his scheme of assassination—to cut off the English leaders by the milder, but not less certain course of law, on evidence of a "treasonable correspondence" with the Scottish army. The king's every thought now bore upon the latter scheme: he had entered Scotland with a view to conciliate the Covenanters, in the vain hope of effecting it in that way; failing of this, he concerted with Montrose to trample upon the Covenant, only with a view to the same end. Pym, Hampden, and the rest, struck down, the world of despotism would be once again before him where to choose!

But with the news of the "incident," letters from Hampden, still in Edinburgh with the committee, were placed in Pym's hands. Their contents may be surmised from the fact that Pym instantly proposed and conducted a conference with the lords "concerning the security of the kingdom and Parliament;" denouncing again a branch conspiracy in London; and demanded that all the military posts of the city should be occupied with a strong force. This was at once acceded to, and, besides this, the Westminster trainbands were brought up to guard the Houses of Parliament by night as well as day.†

Secretary Nicholas, deeply alarmed, wrote to the king, "It is thought that this businesse will bee declared to bee a greater plot against the kingdome and Parliaments in Eng: and Scotl: than hath beene discovered at all. There have beene some well-affected Parliament-men here with me this morning, to know whether I had any relation of that businesse; but finding I had none, they seemed much troubled, as not knowing what to say to it." To this the king answers with cautious reserve. In a subsequent letter Nicholas mentions the sudden introduction of another bill for abolishing the temporal functions of the bishops, accompanying it with a remark, that "it is said to bee against ye ancient order of Pliamt to bring in a bill againe ye same sessions that it was rejected;" whereupon the king eagerly seizes this objection, and orders Nicholas to "bid his servants make as much use of it as may bee."‡

They did so, and were foiled by Pym. His great object at this time was to weaken the powers of mischief in the upper House; and finding that his impeachment against the thirteen bishops on the ground of their share in the recent canons must be quashed on some points of informality (the lords had already admitted their demurrer), he counselled the reintroduction of the first bill against the bishops as a temporary compromise for a great ultimate gain. I will describe the result in Clarendon's words, as recently restored: * "Mr. Pym and his party found that they were so far from having gotten credit by their angry bill against the Church for the extirpation of bishops, that they had lost ground in the attempt, and therefore they seemed to decline any farther thought of such a violent proceeding, and to have more moderate inclinations; and so, one morning, they brought in and desired to have a bill read for the taking away the votes of the bishops out of the House of Peers, no otherwise differing from the former than it was shorter. It was opposed by many that it should be received or read; for it was a known rule of the House that a bill rejected could not be brought again into the House during the same session, which was an order that had never been known to be violated, which Mr. Pym confessed, but said, 'that our orders were not like the laws of the Medes and Persians, not to be altered, but that they were in our own power; and that the receiving this bill, since it was in our power, was very necessary, and would quiet the minds of many, who, it may be, would be contented with the passing this bill, who would otherwise be importunate for more violent remedies; and that there was reason to believe that the Lords, who had rejected the former bill, were very sorry for it, and would give this a better reception; and if they did not, it would meet with the same fate the other had done, and we should have the satisfaction of having discharged our own consciences.' The content many men had to see the former violence declined and more moderate counsels pursued, prevailed so far, that the bill was received and read; and the same reasons, with some subsequent actions and accidents, prevailed afterward for the passing it in the House of Commons, though it received a greater opposition than it had done formerly. And the Lord Falkland then concurring with his friend Mr. Hyde in the opposing it, Mr. Hampden said that he was sorry to find a noble lord had changed his opinion since the time the last bill to this purpose had passed the House; for he then thought it a good bill, but now he thought this an ill one. To which the Lord Falkland presently replied, that he had been persuaded at that time by that worthy gentleman to believe many things which he had since found to be untrue, and therefore he had changed his opinion in many particulars, as well as to things as persons."

Very true and candid was this, but not very startling, since Pym and Hampden knew it well already; and "Mr. Hyde" had taken good care that, by this time, the king should know it too. "I may not forbear to let your matie knowe," wrote Sir Edward Nicholas, under date of the 29th of October, "that the Lo. Falkland, Sr. Jo. Strangwishe [Strangeways], Mr. Waller, Mr. Ed. Hyde, and Mr. Holborne have lately stood as champions in maintenance of your prerogative, whereof yr matie shall doe well to take some notice (as yor matie shall thinke best) for their encouragement." The king answered, eagerly and earnestly, "I command you to doe it in

* See Rushworth, vol. iv., p. 390.

† Rushworth, vol. iv., p. 392.

‡ Evelyn, vol. ii., part ii., p. 45.

* Oxford ed. of 1826, vol. ii., p. 75, 76, note.

† Hampden had returned from Scotland some few days before.

my name, telling them that I will do it myself at my return." From the date of this correspondence, at least, these men were retained on behalf of Charles. But Pym watched them more and more narrowly as the great struggle drew nigh.

News of the Irish rebellion and massacre now burst upon London. Following so closely upon the Scottish "incident," and coupled with the evidence of still more striking circumstances against the king, this shocking event increased to a fearful degree the prevailing excitement. The cold and laconic remark of Charles to Sir Edward Nicholas respecting it has not been noticed. "I hope," he merely wrote, "I hope this ill newes of Ireland may hinder some of theas follies in England."*

The "follies" and their authors only moved more resolutely forward. A petition had been in agitation for some time in the lower House, "to be presented" (I quote Sir Edward Nicholas's description) "to yo^r matie, to receive the Parliament's approbation of such officers, councillors, &c., as yo^r majtie shall choose, for better preventi^on of the great and many mischiefs that may befall yo^r Commonwealthe, by yo^r choice of ill councillors, officers, amb'dors, and ministers of state." Nothing could exceed the king's alarm at this proposed measure, or the earnestness of his commands that it should by some means or other be "stopp'd." Hyde and Falkland, as may naturally be supposed, with their present prospects, opposed it bitterly, step by step; but Pym and Hampden actively urged it on. At last, on the 10th of November, according to the Lords' journals, Pym appeared at the head of the Commons, in conference with the upper House, and proceeded to explain to their lordships the several steps, as they are there called, by which evil counsels had wrought such danger to the kingdom, and demanded remedy so loudly.

"First. That the dangers which come to the state by ill counsels are the most pernicious of all others. Since it is usual to compare polittick bodies with natural, the natural body is in danger divers ways: either by outward violence, that may be foreseen or prevented, or else by less appearing maladies, such as grow upon the body by distempers of the air, immoderate exercise, or diet; and when the causes of the disease are thus clear, the remedy is easily applied; but diseases which proceed from the inward parts or the more noble parts—it is a hard thing to apply a cure to such diseases. Ill counsels are of that nature; for the mischiefs that come by evil counsel corrupt the vital parts, and overthrow the public government.

"Secondly. That there have been lately, and still are, ill counsels in this kingdom and about the king. That there have been lately, you will not doubt, when the main course of the government hath been so employed as popery thereby hath been maintained, the laws subverted, and no distinction kept between justice and injustice; and that there are ill counsels still is apparent by the courses taken to advance mischievous designs: his majesty's wisdom and goodness kept them from his heart, tho' they were not kept out of his courts. So most principal and mischievous designs have been practised by such as had near access unto his majesty, tho' not to his heart, and the apologists and promoters of ill counsels are still preferred."

The singular and grave caution of these distinctions is not the least remarkable characteristic of Pym. No man could so thoroughly keep within the nice bounds of Parliamentary phrase while urging the bitterest things.

"Thirdly. The ill counsels of this time are in their own nature more mischievous and more dangerous than the ill counsels of former times: former counsels have been to please kings in their vices, from which our king is free; and sometimes for racking of the prerogative. If it had gone no farther, it had brought many miseries, but not ruin and destruction. But the ill counsels of this time are destructive to religion and laws, by altering them both, and therefore more mischievous in their own nature than those of former times.

"Fourthly. That these ill counsels have proceeded from a spirit and inclination to popery, and have had a dependance on popery, and all of them tend to it. The religion of the Papists is a religion incompatible with any other religion; destructive to all others, and not enduring any thing that opposeth it. Whosoever doth withstand their religion, if they have power, they bring them to ruin. There are other religions that are not right, but not so destructive as popery, for the principles of popery are destructive of all states and persons that oppose it. With the progress of this mischievous system of evil counsel they provide counsellors, fit instruments and organs, that may execute their own designs, and so turn all counsels to their own ends. You find now, in Ireland, that those designs that have been upon all the three kingdoms do end in a war for the maintenance of popery in Ireland. They would do the like here if they were able, so intent are they to turn all to their own advantage.

"Fifthly. That unless these ill counsels be changed, it is impossible that any assistance, aid, or advice that the Parliament can take to reform will be effectual, for the public orders and laws are but dead if not put in execution. Those that are the ministers of state put things into action; but if acted by evil men, and while these counsels are on foot, we can expect no good. It is like a disease that turns nutritives into poison.

"Sixthly. That this is the most proper time to desire of his majesty the alteration and change of the evil counsellors, because the Commonwealth is brought into distemper by them, and so exhausted that we can endure no longer. Another reason why we cannot admit of them is to show our love and fidelity to the king in great and extraordinary contributions and aids. When God doth employ his servants, he doth give some promise to rouse up their spirits; and we have reason now to expect the king's grace in great abundance. This is the time wherein the subjects are to save the kingdom of Ireland with the hazard of their lives and fortunes, and therefore expect it from his majesty in a more large and bountiful manner than at other times. This is a time of great agitation and action, when other states being ready, by preparation, to annoy us, ill and false counsels at home may quickly bring us to ruin. As we have weakness at home, so we ought to discern the actions abroad, where great provisions are made; and a carelessness and improvidence herein, when our neighbours are so provided, and have great fleets at sea, will open a way to sudden ruin and destruction, before we can be prepared; and therefore it is now the fittest time to move the king.

* Evelyn, part ii., vol. ii., p. 45.

"Seventhly and lastly. That this alteration of counsels will bring great advantages to the king in his own designs. In all our actions, our prayers to God should be that his name may be glorified; so our petitions to his majesty should bring honour, profit, and advantage to him, by a discouragement to the rebels, a great part of their confidence resting in the evil counsels at home, as by the examinations appeareth. It will be a great encouragement to the king's good subjects at home, who hazard their lives, and give aid and contribution, to have things governed for the public good. It will make men afraid to prefer servants to the king that are ill counsellors, when they shall come to the examination of the Parliament; for many times servants are preferred to princes for the advantage of foreign states. This will put an answer into the king's mouth against all importunities, that he is to prefer none but such as will be approved of by Parliament. Those that are honourable and most ingenuous are aptest to be troubled in this kind, and not to deny; therefore the king may answer, 'He hath promised his Parliament not to admit of any but by advice of Parliament.' This will silence them all. These are domestick advantages; but it will also make us fitter to enter into union and treaty with foreign nations and states, and to be made partakers of the strength and assistance of others: it will fortify us against the designs of foreign princes. There hath been one common counsel at Rome and in Spain, to reduce us to popery: if good counsel at home, we shall be the better prepared to preserve peace and union, and better respect from Ireland. It will also make us fit for any noble design abroad."

Secretary Nicholas, after describing to the king the effect of this grave and condensed statement, adds: "Yo^r ma^{tie} may perceave of what extreame necessitie and importance yo^r ma^{tie}'s speedy returne is, w^{ch} I beseech y^r ma^{tie} by all meanes to hasten." Its effect in other quarters was like to have proved of immediate personal danger to Pym. Some few days after he entered the House with an open letter in his hand, and told the speaker that he had just received a letter from a porter at the door of the House, and that, upon the opening of it, a covering which had come from a plague wound* dropped out of it, and that the letter itself contained many menaces, and much railing against him. The porter, being examined, said "a gentleman on horseback, in a gray coat, gave him twelve pence for the speedy delivery of it." "Whatever the matter was," observes Nalson, "it made a mighty noise both in the House and out of the House, in the city and country; for Mr. Pym was then one of the greatest idols of the faction. All the art imaginable was used to find out the author of this dangerous attempt to infect Mr. Pym with the plague, but to no purpose." In a curious pamphlet published four days after Pym's death, and called "A short View of his Life and Actions,"* I find a literal copy of this letter, superscribed "To my honoured friend John Pym, Esquire," and in-written thus: "Master Pym, do not think that a guard of men can protect you, if you persist in your courses and wicked designs. I have sent a paper messenger to you, and if this do not touch your heart, a dagger shall, so soon as I am recovered of my plague. In the mean time, you may be forborn, because no better man may be endangered for you. Repent, traitour." In the same pamphlet it is said, that soon after this occurrence a gentleman, "mistaken for Mr. Pym," was stabbed in Westminster Hall by a ruffian who escaped, so that it is probable the amiable letter-writer kept his word!

Nor was this all. Sir Edward Nicholas, in the same letter which details the above attempts to the king, adds, that "on Monday last, in y^e evening, another as desperate and dangerous a conspiracy against Mr. Pym was discovered by a poor zealous taylor." And by other conspiracies besides these against his life† were the public virtues and services of this great person acknowledged and sought to be repaid. A series of harassing suits were commenced against him, with a view to deprive him, if possible, of his Parliamentary privilege, till at last, so eagerly were they followed, the House itself thought fit to interfere, and protect him by a special order.‡

It was a vain persuasion that by such means as these the spirit of Pym could be broken or subdued. It rose to its duties with greater resolvedness; and in a subsequent conference with the Lords, who still held back from any thing like willing co-operation, he suddenly threw out a very plain and very memorable warning, which produced a deep impression at the time, and had, no doubt, the practical effect its author intended; since, while it brought the divisions that now, under the management of Hyde and his friends, distracted the Commons themselves, to what might be called the extreme point of difference, it settled also the terms of the struggle, and the conditions of the victory, in the great party contest now instantly impending. When a great fight is to be fought for great results, it is better to take up position upon an extreme ground of certain and defined principle, than on the half covered way of policy. Pym recommended the upper House to consider that "the Commons were the representative body of the whole kingdom, while

* See No. 135 of King's Pamphlets, Brit. Mus.

† Clarendon alludes to them with his usual want of ingenuously. "Men being thus disquieted, and knowing little, and so doubting much, every day seemed to them to produce a new discovery of some new treason and plot against the kingdom. One day, 'a letter from beyond seas, of great forces prepared to invade England;' another, 'of some attempt upon the life of Mr. Pym.'"—Vol. ii., p. 24.

‡ "It was this day ordered that Mr. Pym, being sued for tythe wood, shall have the privilege of Parliament, and that Lewis Lushford and others, the solicitor and attorney on the other side, be hereby enjoined to forbear to prosecute, or further to proceed in that suit, or any other that concerns the said Mr. Pym."—(Nalson's Collections, vol. ii, p. 393.)

* The plague still lingered in various places in and about London.

their lordships were but as particular persons, and present in Parliament in a particular capacity.* The trimmers shrank from his side at this; but the trimmers were held of little value by Pym and Hampden.

On the 22d of November their great measure was presented to the House by Pym—their final appeal to the nation on behalf of liberty against despotism—the Grand Remonstrance on the state of the kingdom. It was a “severely elaborate” review of Charles’s misgovernment in Church and State from the commencement of his reign; it summed up all the grievances under which the people had suffered in language of great energy and power, and it pointed out the redress already achieved, and what still remained to be done. Great securities for the people were yet to be struggled for; and the patriots, in directing their present appeal emphatically to the people, exercised a wise and just policy of enlightening them, and guiding them to the future by severe reference and warning to the past. By other means their object must have failed of accomplishment. They did not scruple to declare frankly “that, without a seasonable care to disappoint some councils still entertained, all the good acts which they had obtained were in danger of being lost.” And stronger and plainer than this was their allusion to the Lords, that they had no hope of settling the kingdom’s distractions, for want of a concurrence on the part of the upper House.

“What can we the Commons do,” said the words of the remonstrance itself, “without the conjunction of the House of Lords! And what conjunction can we expect there, where the bishops and recusant lords are so numerous and prevalent that they are able to cross and interrupt our best endeavours for reformation? They have already hindered the proceedings of divers good bills, passed in the Commons’ House, concerning the reformation of sundry great abuses and corruptions both in Church and State.” One passage, memorable for its effect upon the people, will illustrate the tone and purpose of the statement of grievances. Referring to the dissolution of the third Parliament, the remonstrants proceed: “The privileges of Parliament broken, by imprisoning divers members of the House, detaining them close prisoners for many months together, without the liberty of using books, pen, ink, or paper; denying them all the comforts of life, all means of preservation of health, not permitting their wives to come unto them, even in time of their sickness; and, for the completing of that cruelty, after years spent in such miserable durance, depriving them of the necessary means of spiritual consolation, not suffering them to go abroad to enjoy God’s ordinances in God’s house, or God’s ministers to come to them, to administer comfort unto them in their private chambers; and to keep them still in this oppressed condition, not admitting them to be bailed according to law, yet vexing them with informations in inferior courts; sentencing and fining some of them for matters done in Parliament, and extorting the payments of those fines from them; enforcing others to put in security for good behaviour before they could be released. The imprisonment of the rest, who refused to be bound, still continued (which might have been been perpetual, if necessity had not, the last year, brought another Parliament to relieve them), of whom one (Sir John Eliot) died by the cruelty and harshness of his imprisonment, which would admit of no relaxation, notwithstanding the imminent danger of his life did sufficiently appear by the declaration of his physician, and his release, or at least his refreshment, was sought by many humble petitions. AND HIS BLOOD STILL CRIES FOR VENGEANCE! or repentance of those ministers of state who at once obstructed the course both of his majesty’s justice and mercy!” The document closed with a general petition that the bishops should be deprived of their votes, and that none should be intrusted with the public affairs whom the Parliament might not approve of.

A violent and long debate arose on its introduction. The House had commenced its sitting at eight o’clock in the morning; at twelve at noon the debate commenced; at twelve at midnight the remonstrance was carried by a majority of eleven. Hampden then openly disclosed the purpose of the remonstrants by moving that the remonstrance should be printed. Hyde opposed this with a counter motion; denied the right of the House of Commons to print any thing without the concurrence of the Peers,* (!) and asserted for himself the right of protesting against the vote of the majority. In this he was joined by several members, and a desperate effort was made to enter a formal protest of the minority against the decision of the House. The conflict of voices and of passions became tremendous, and bloodshed, Sir Philip Warwick says, was like to have ensued. “We had caught at each other’s locks, and sheathed our swords in each other’s bowels, had not the sagacity and great calmness of Mr. Hampden, by a short speech, prevented it, and led us to defer our angry debate until the next morning.” Meanwhile, at about two o’clock, Hampden’s motion for the printing had been carried, and now, at three in the morning, the House adjourned.

Clarendon shall tell what occurred on the meeting of the following day. It may serve to explain one of the reasons of his personal, no less than public hatred of the memory of Pym. “About three of the clock, when the House met, Mr. Pym lamented the disorder of the night before, which, he said, might probably have engaged the House in blood, and had proceeded principally from the offering a protestation, which had been never before offered in that House, and was a transgression that ought to be severely examined, that mischief might not result hereafter from that precedent; and therefore proposed that the House would the next morning enter upon that examination, and in the mean time men might recollect themselves, and they who used to take notes might peruse their memorials, that the persons who were the

* Nalson’s Collections, vol. ii., p. 712.

† Clarendon’s History, vol. ii., p. 606, restored text. His words, though they convey a misrepresentation, are striking: “On Monday, the 22d of November (the king being within two miles of London), Mr. Pym brought in the remonstrance, which was read; having no direction to the king, or mention of the House of Peers, but being a plain declaration from the House of Commons to the people.”

* Hist., vol. ii., p. 43. The word “never” is replaced in this edition for the substituted “seldom.”

*chief causers of the disorder might be named, and defend themselves the best they could; and with this resolution the House rose, the vexation of the night before being very visible in the looks and countenance of many.

During this stormy and eventful scene the king was on his way from Scotland. He arrived on the 25th of November, "brooding in secret over his purposed vengeance on the popular leaders."† His first act was to reward the deserters from the people. He made Falkland secretary, and Colepepper chancellor of the Exchequer, while Hyde proposed to waive office for himself at present, on the ground that "his services would be more useful without it," or, in other words, that he had not yet lost the hope of secretly betraying the cause. Charles's next step was to remove the guards, which, since the Scotch incident and the Irish rebellion, had protected both Houses. The Commons strongly objected, and the king answered that his presence was a sufficient protection!

On the 1st of December the grand remonstrance was presented to him at Hampton Court. He evaded an immediate answer, and promised to send one. The Commons at once published the remonstrance, "contrary," says Whitelocke,‡ "to the king's desire, and before his answer made to it." In a few days, however, an answer, secretly drawn up by Hyde,§ was made public in the name of Charles. Every thing was rushing to a crisis.

A bill now depended in the lower House for raising soldiers by impressment. Charles suddenly intimated that he should pass it only with an express saving of his prerogative, and added that he was "little beholding to him, whoever at this time began this dispute." Pym at once proceeded to the House of Lords, at the head of a conference, and proposed the following resolutions: "It is our opinion, that the privileges of Parliament are broken, 1. By his majesty's taking notice of the bill for pressing, it being in agitation in both Houses, and not agreed on. 2. In that his majesty should propound a limitation and provisional clause to be added to the bill before it was presented to him by the consent of both Houses. 3. In that his majesty did express his displeasure against some persons for matters moved or debated in Parliament during the debate and preparation of that bill. 4. That a declaratory protestation be entered into by both Houses for the claim of these privileges and liberties; and that a petitionary remonstrance be drawn up and presented to his majesty about them." An "humble petition" was immediately presented, embodying the stern request that "he (the king) should take notice that the privilege of Parliament was broken, and to desire him that it may not be done so any more hereafter." Charles made an "ample apology."

The remonstrance, meanwhile, was doing its work among the people, and the popular discontents against the bishops were loudly heard. ||

Upon this Williams, who had recently made his peace with Charles, and succeeded to the archbishopric of York, committed that act which, considered as a rashness, was such a strange departure from his character, but, viewed as a first step to the king's cherished purpose of revoking all that had been done in the past year, on the ground that the Parliament had not been free, was in perfect keeping with the huge intrigue of his life. He drew up a declaration, and prevailed with eleven other prelates to join him in it, to the effect that the bishops could no longer, without danger to their lives, attend their duty in Parliament, and that they therefore protested against the validity of any votes or resolutions of the House of Lords during their absence. This was delivered by the lord-keeper, and heard with extreme resentment. The Lords treated it as a breach of privilege, and communicated with the Commons; when the latter, after a debate with closed doors, impeached the twelve bishops of high treason. On the 30th of December they appeared as culprits on their knees at the bar of the upper House. Ten were committed to the Tower, and two, on the score of age and infirmity, to the usher of the black rod.

Thus closed 1641, the most eventful year of the English history, and upon the first day of 1642 blood was shed. A dissolute Royalist officer drew his sword at Westminster, and, inventing a term which afterward became very famous, threatened death to "the Roundheads who bawled against the bishops." Colonel Lunsford, too, who had been appointed to the Tower by Charles, in defiance of the wishes of the Commons, drew his sword upon the populace; several of his friends followed his example; and some of the citizens were wounded, while one, Sir Richard Wiseman, was killed.

The next scene took place in the House of Commons. The question of a guard was again debated, with halberts in the House for their defence. Pym had presented to the Lords the following condensed and most significant statement of reasons for the protection claimed. "The great number of disorderly, suspicious, and desperate persons, especially of the Irish nation, lurking in obscure alleys and victualing-houses in the suburbs, and other places near London and Westminster. The jealousy conceived upon discovery of the design in Scotland for the surprising of the persons of divers nobility and members of the Parliament there, which had been spoken of here some few days before it broke out, not without some whispering intimation that the like was intended against divers persons of both Houses, which found the more credit by reason of the former attempts of bringing up the army to disturb and enforce this Parliament. The conspiracy in Ireland, him out, "Hereupon the Lords sent to the House of Commons, and many members of that house complained 'that they could not come with safety to the House; and that some of them had been assaulted, and very ill entreated, by those that crowded about that door.' But this conference could not be procured, the debate being still put off to some other time, after several speeches had been made in justification of them, and commendation of their affections, some saying 'they must not discourage their friends, this being a time they must make use of all friends;' Mr. Pym himself saying, 'God forbid the House of Commons should proceed in any way to dishearten people to obtain their just desires in such a way.'"—History of the Rebellion, vol. ii., p. 87.

* History, vol. ii., p. 45, 46.

† History from Mackintosh, vol. v., p. 283.

‡ Memorials, p. 48.

§ Consult the restored text of the History.

|| Clarendon says that the temporal peers had become equally objects of popular odium. And he proceeds to say, but without any authority of the reports or journals to bear managed with so much secrecy that, but for the happy discovery at Dublin, it had been executed in all parts of the kingdom upon one and the same day, or soon after, and that some of the chief conspirators did profess that the like course was intended in England and Scotland, which being found in some degree true in Scotland, seemed the more probable to be likewise designed for England. Divers advertisements beyond the sea, which came over about the same time, 'That there should be a great alteration of religion in England in a few days, and that the necks of both the Parliaments should be broken.' Divers examinations of dangerous speeches of some of the popish and discontented party in this kingdom. The secret meetings and consultations of the Papists in several parts: their frequent devotions for the prosperity of some great design in hand. These several considerations do move the Parliament to desire a guard, which for the most part should be under the command of the Earl of Essex; and they do conceive that there is just cause to apprehend that there is some wicked and mischievous practice to interrupt the peaceable proceedings of the Parliament still in hand; for preventing whereof, it is fit the guard should be continued under the same command, or such other as they should choose; but to have it under the command of any other not chosen by themselves, they can by no means consent to, and will rather run any hazard than admit of a precedent so dangerous both to this and future Parliaments. And they humbly leave it to his majesty to consider whether it will not be fit to suffer his high court of Parliament to enjoy that privilege of providing for their own safety which was never denied other inferior courts, and that he will be pleased graciously to believe that they cannot think themselves safe under any guard of which they shall not be assured that it will be as faithful in defending his majesty's safety as their own, whereof they shall always be more careful than of their own." And now Pym rose to add additional reasons, drawn from the recent practices and menaces of the English "malignant party."

The House of Commons was still in debate—the 3d of January, 1642—when Herbert, the attorney-general, appeared at the clerks' table of the House of Lords, and said that "the king had commanded him to tell their lordships that great and treasonable designs and practices against him and the state had come to his majesty's knowledge, for which the king had given him command to accuse, and he did accuse, the Lord Kimbolton, Mr. Pym, Mr. Hampden, Mr. Hollis, Sir Arthur Hazlerigge, and Mr. Strode, of high treason." He then read the articles, which sufficiently indicate how the blow would have been followed up in case it had succeeded thus far.

They were couched in these words: "First. That they have traitorously endeavoured to subvert the fundamental laws and government of this kingdom, and deprive the king of his regal power, and place in the subjects an arbitrary and tyrannical power. Second. That they have traitorously endeavoured, by many foul aspersions upon his majesty and his government, to alienate the affections of his people, and to make his majesty odious to them. Third.

That they have endeavoured to draw his majesty's late army to disobedience to his majesty's commands, and to side with them in their traitorous designs. Fourth. That they have traitorously invited and encouraged a foreign power to invade his majesty's kingdom of England. Fifth. That they have traitorously endeavoured to subvert the rights and very being of Parliaments. Sixth. That for the completing of their dangerous projects they have endeavoured, as far as in them lay, by force and terror, to compel the Parliament to join with them in their traitorous designs; and to that end, have actually raised and countenanced tumults against the king and Parliament. Seventh. That they have traitorously conspired to levy, and actually have levied, war against the king." Herbert added a desire on the part of his majesty, "First. That a select committee, under a command of secrecy, may be appointed to take the examination of such witnesses as the king will produce in this business, as formerly hath been done in cases of like nature, according to the justice of this House. Second. Liberty to add and alter if there should be cause. Third. That their lordships would take care for the securing of the persons, as in justice there should be cause."

Had this monstrous attempt of tyranny ended here, it would have stood a lasting evidence of the perfidy and folly of the king. The oldest rights of the subject were insolently violated by it. The attorney-general had not a shadow of right to impeach Pym or Hampden, any more than the House of Lords had the right to try them. The only mode of legal trial, upon such a suit preferred by the king, was by a petty jury on a bill found by a grand jury. But thus far we have only seen the beginning of the end!

The lower House were told of the attempt against them by a message from the Lords, and in the same moment heard that persons were sealing up the trunks, papers, and lodgings of the accused members. They sent the speaker's warrant on the instant to break the seals and apprehend the persons by whom they were put on; ordered, at the same time, that any members upon whom similar seizures were attempted should stand upon their defence; and finally desired an immediate conference with the Lords, as parties interested no less than themselves.

Mr. Francis, sergeant-at-arms, having been meanwhile admitted without his mace, delivered the following message to the House: "I am commanded by the king's majesty, my master, upon my allegiance, that I should come and repair to the House of Commons, where Mr. Speaker is, and there to require of Mr. Speaker five gentlemen, members of the House of Commons, and that these gentlemen being delivered, I am commanded to arrest them, in his majesty's name, of high treason. Their names are, Mr. Pym, Mr. Hampden, Mr. Hollis, Sir A. Hazlerigge, and Mr. William Strode." The House sent a deputation to the king in reply, saying that the matter was too serious to be decided without consideration, but that the accused would be ready to answer any legal charge. Pym and Hampden were present at the moment, and the speaker, in the name of the House, formally requested them to attend, with the other three members, on the morning of the following day.*

The scene must now change, early on the morning of the 4th of January, to the king's apartments at Whitehall, for a page of the secret history of this memorable event has recently been opened to us.

The project of seizing the accused members in person from within the walls of the House was probably Charles's own, but had certainly been canvassed earnestly with the queen till late on the preceding night. From a curious manuscript account, left by Sir W. Coke of Norfolk, to Mr. Anchetil Grey, it would then appear that the king, apprehensive of the hazard of the attempt that had been agreed on at night, went the next morning to the queen's apartment, and finding Carlile with her majesty, he retired with the latter into her closet, and there discoursed with her about the consequence of the design, urged many reasons against it, and expressed a resolution not to put it into execution; upon which the queen could no longer contain, but broke into these angry and passionate words: "Allez! poltron! go, pull these rogues out by the ears, on ne me renvoyez jamais!"† The king left the room. Madame de Motteville supplies the sequel in describing the queen, while waiting with violent impatience, rejoined by Lady Carlile. "She was impatiently," says that celebrated gossip and waiting-woman, "awaiting news from the House; at length, thinking that the hour was past, and the stroke made or missed, she said to Lady Carlile, 'Rejoice! for I hope that the king is now master in his states, and such and such are in custody.' Lady Carlile immediately sent intelligence to Mr. Pym, where it arrived in time. The queen owned her indiscretion, with great penitence, to her husband, who forgave her."‡

Pym, Hampden, and the other members were in their places in the House of Commons very early on the 4th of January, and as soon as prayers were said, Pym had risen, and addressed the speaker on the articles of impeachment presented against him the day before by the king's attorney. The clearness, force, and beauty of his speech will be felt by all. "What," we may say with Æschines, "what if we had heard him!"

"Mr. Speaker, these articles of high treason, exhibited by his majesty against me, and the other gentlemen in the accusation charged with the same crime, are of great consequence and much damage to the state. The articles in themselves, if proved, are, according to the laws of the land, high treason.

"First. To endeavour to subvert the fundamental laws of the land is, by this present Parliament, in the Earl of Strafford's case, adjudged high treason. Secondly, to endeavour to introduce into this kingdom an arbitrary and tyrannical form of government, is likewise voted high treason. Thirdly, to raise an army to compel the Parliament to make and enact laws, without their free votes and willing proceedings in the same, is high treason. Fourthly, to invite a foreign force to invade this land, to favour our designs agitated against the king and state, is high treason. Fifthly, to animate and encourage riotous assemblies and tumults about the Parliament, to compel the king to assent to votes of the House, is treason. Sixthly, to cast aspersions upon his majesty and his government, to alienate the affections of his people, and to make his majesty odious unto them, is treason. Seventhly, to endeavour to draw his majesty's army into disobedience, and to side with us in our designs, if against the king, is treason.

"I desire, Mr. Speaker, the favour of this House to clear myself concerning this charge. I shall only parallel and similize my actions since the sitting of this Parliament with these articles.

"First, Mr. Speaker, if to vote with the Parliament as a member of the House, wherein all our votes ought to be free (it being one of the greatest privileges thereof to have our debates, disputes, and arguments in the same unquestionable), be to endeavour to subvert the fundamental laws, then I am guilty of the first article.

"Secondly. If to agree and consent with the whole state of the kingdom, by vote, to ordain and make laws for the good government of his majesty's subjects, in peace and dutiful obedience to their lawful sovereign, be to introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical form of government in the state, then am I guilty of this article.

"Thirdly. If to consent, by vote with the Parliament, to raise a guard or train'd band to secure and defend the persons and the members thereof, being environed and beset with many dangers in the absence of the king; and, by vote with the House, in willing obedience to the royal command of his majesty, at his return, be actually to levy arms against the king, then am I guilty of this article.

"Fourthly. If to join with the Parliament of England, by free vote, to crave brotherly assistance from Scotland (kingdoms both under obedience to one sovereign, both his loyal subjects) to suppress the rebellion in Ireland, which lies gasping every day in danger to be lost from his majesty's subjection, be to invite and encourage a foreign power to invade this kingdom, then am I guilty of high treason.

"Fifthly. If to agree with the greatest and wisest council of state to suppress unlawful tumults and riotous assemblies; to agree with the House, by vote, to all orders, edicts, and declarations for their repelling, be to raise and countenance them in their unlawful actions, then am I guilty of this article.

"Sixthly. If, by free vote, to join with the Parliament in publishing of a remonstrance; in setting forth declarations against delinquents in the state; against incendiaries between his majesty and his kingdom; against ill counsellors which labour to avert his majesty's affection from Parliament; against those ill-affected bishops that have innovated our religion—oppressed painful, learned, and godly ministers

* Journals of the Commons. In the afternoon of the 4th, there is a memorandum entered, "that all the five members aforementioned did appear in the House, according to yesterday's injunction."

† Sir Arthur Hazlerig himself, in an account he gave of this affair, in Cromwell's Parliament of 1658, uses these words in part. His account is loose, but fair corroborating evidence on the whole. See some extracts from his speech in Appendix D.

‡ Margure, p. 429.

with vexatious suits and molestations in their unjust courts—by cruel sentences of pillory and cutting off their ears—by great fines, banishments, and perpetual imprisonments: if this, Mr. Speaker, be to cast aspersions upon his majesty and his government, and to alienate the hearts of his loyal subjects, good Protestants and well affected in religion, from their due obedience to his royal majesty, then am I guilty also of this article.

"Seventhly. If to consent, by vote with the Parliament, to put forth proclamations, or to send declarations to his majesty's army to animate and encourage the same to his loyal obedience; to give so many subsidies, and raise so many great sums of money willingly for their keeping on foot to serve his majesty upon his royal command on any occasion; to apprehend and attack as delinquents such persons in the same as are disaffected both to his sacred person, his crown and dignity, to his wise and great counsel of Parliament, to the true and orthodox doctrine of the Church of England, and the true religion, grounded on the doctrine of Christ himself, and established and confirmed by many acts of Parliament in the reigns of King Henry VIII., King Edward VI., Queen Elizabeth, and King James of blessed memory: if this, Mr. Speaker, be to draw his majesty's army into disobedience, and siding with us in our designs, then am I guilty of this article.

"Now, Mr. Speaker, having given you a touch concerning these articles, comparing them with my actions ever since I had the honour to sit in this House as a member thereof, I humbly crave your consideration and favourable judgment of them, not doubting—they being weighed in the even scales of your wisdom—I shall be found innocent and clear from these crimes laid to my charge."

Nor, in the triumph of this masterly self-vindication, did Pym forget the higher duty which then waited upon his position as leader of the House—upon his virtue, and on his never-quailing courage. As the members expected him to resume his seat, he gravely and earnestly, amid loud cheering from various quarters, added these words:

"Mr. Speaker, I humbly crave your further patience to speak somewhat concerning the exhibiting of this charge, which is to offer to your consideration these questions, viz.: First, whether to exhibit articles of high treason by his majesty's own hands in this House agrees with the rights and privileges thereof? Secondly, whether for a guard armed to come into the Parliament to accuse any of the members thereof be not a breach of the privilege of Parliament? Thirdly, whether any of the members of Parliament, being so accused, may be committed upon such accusation without the whole consent? Fourthly, whether a Parliament hath not privilege to bail any member so accused? Fifthly and lastly, whether, if any of the members of Parliament so charged, and by the House discharged, without release from his majesty may still sit in the House as members of the same?

"And thus, Mr. Speaker, I humbly crave pardon for my presumption in so far troubling this honourable House, desiring their favourable consideration of all my actions, and that I may have such trial as to this wise council shall seem meet, cheerfully submitting myself and actions to the righteous judgment of the same."

The rest of the accused members afterward rose successively, and refuted the alleged charges against themselves. The dinner hour's adjournment then took place; and the House had scarcely resumed when, between three and four o'clock, Pym received Lady Carlile's intelligence, and at once stated it to the House. The five members were requested to withdraw, to avoid the bloodshed which it was felt would be the necessary consequence of their remaining, and after some difficulty they did so. Then the House, having ordered Mr. Speaker to keep his seat, with the mace lying before him, awaited in awful silence the approach of their strange and unwelcome visitor.*

A loud knock threw open the door; a rush as of many armed men was heard; and above it the voice of Charles, commanding "upon their lives not to come in."† He entered the moment after, accompanied only by his nephew, the prince palatine; and as he advanced up to the chair—uncovering himself, and the members standing up uncovered—he darted a look "on the right hand, near the bar of the House, where Mr. Pym used to sit, but not seeing him there (knowing him well), went up to the chair."‡ This the speaker yielded to him, but he continued standing on the step. Again his eye glanced around, searching once more for the portly person of the popular leader. The multitude of faces that met his own, and the sullen and awful silence that prevailed, confused him. He spoke at last, but in a subdued tone, and with an abruptness which made more evident than usual the painful defect in his enunciation. He assured them hastily "that no king that ever was in England should be more careful of their privileges; but in case of treason, he held that no person hath a privilege." He took "this occasion again to confirm, that whatever he had done in favour and for the good of his subjects, he would maintain." Then again "he called Mr. Pym by name."§ None answered. He asked the speaker if he was in the House. Lenthall, inspired by the greatness of the occasion, kneeled, and desired him to excuse his answer, for "in this place I have neither eyes to see nor tongue to speak but as the House is pleased to direct me, whose servant I am." "The birds, then, are down!" said Charles, passionately; and, abruptly insisting that the accused members must be sent to him, or "he must take his own course," left the place where he stood, "pulling off his hat till he came to the door."|| A low and ominous murmur of "Privilege! privilege!" sounded in his ears as he retired. His hired and tumultuous bands of bravoos, who, while he was in the House, had been waiting in the lobby for "the word," cocking their pistols, and crying "Fall on,"¶

* The subsequent entry on the Journals is simply this: "Jan. 4, P.M. The king came into the House of Commons and took Mr. Speaker's chair."

† Gentlemen, I am sorry to have this occasion to come unto you * * * * ‡ Resolved, upon the question, that the House shall adjourn itself till to-morrow one of the clock."

† Verney's Pencil Notes.

‡ Rushworth.

§ Verney's Pencil Notes. Hallam, vol. ii., p. 172.

|| Ibid.

¶ The following passage is taken from the subsequent "declaration" of the Commons. "It did fully appear that now followed him shouting to Whitehall, from whence he issued a proclamation in the course of that night, directing that the ports should be stopped, and that no person should, at his peril, venture to harbour the accused members.

During the whole of this extraordinary and unparalleled scene, one person only sat quiet and unmoved. This was Rushworth, the celebrated historical collector, then assistant clerk to the Commons. I will here subjoin the account which he has left, since it is remarkable for many reasons, and not least for containing the very words that were spoken by Charles and Lenthall, and which the indefatigable clerk coolly wrote down as they broke upon the terrible silence. The closing paragraph carries us, too, a step beyond the sketch given above, which is taken, it should be added, in the points of difference or addition to Rushworth, from the pencil notes of Sir Ralph Verney, who was also in the House at the time.

"When the five accused members came this day, after dinner, into the House, they were no sooner sat in their places but the House was informed by one Captain Langrish, lately an officer in arms in France, that he came from among the officers and soldiers at Whitehall, and understanding by them that his majesty was coming with a guard of military men, commanders and soldiers, to the House of Commons, he passed by them with some difficulty to get to the House before them, and sent in word how near the said officers and soldiers were come; whereupon a certain member of the House* having also private intimation from the Countess of Carlile, sister to the Earl of Northumberland, that endeavours would be used this day to apprehend the five members, the House required the five members to depart the House forthwith, to the end to avoid combustion in the House if the said soldiers should use violence to pull any of them out, to which command of the House four of the said mem-many soldiers, Papists and others, to the number of about 500, came with his maj. on Tuesday, the 4th instant, to the said House of Commons, armed with swords, pistols, and other weapons; and divers of them pressed to the door of the said House, thrust away the doorkeepers, and placed themselves between the said door and the ordinary attendants of his maj., holding up their swords; and some holding up their pistols, ready cocked, near the said door, and saying, 'I am a good marksman; I can hit right, I warrant you;' and they not suffering the said door, according to the custom of Parliament, to be shut, but said 'they would have the door open; and, if any opposition were against them, they made no question but they should make their party good, and that they would maintain their party.' And when several members of the House of Commons were coming into the House, their attendants desiring that room might be made for them, some of the said soldiers answered, 'A pox of God confound them;' and others said, 'A pox take the House of Commons; let them come, and be hanged; what a-do is here with the House of Commons!' And some of the said soldiers did likewise violently assault, and by force disarm, some of the attendants and servants of the members of the House of Commons, waiting in the rooms next the said House; and, upon the king's return out of the said House, many of them, by oaths and otherwise, expressed much discontent, that some members of the said House, for whom they came, were not there; and others of them said, 'When comes the word? and no word being given, at his majesty's coming out, they cried, 'A lane! a lane!' Afterward, some of them, being demanded 'what they thought the said company intended to have done,' answered, 'that, questionless, in the posture they were set, if the word had been given, they should have fallen upon the House of Commons.'"

* There seems a sort of delicacy here implied, as if the assistant clerk did not care to announce publicly Pym's connexion with Lady Carlile.

bers yielded ready obedience; but Mr. Strode was obstinate, till Sir Walter Earle (his antient acquaintance) pulled him out by force, the king being at that time entering into the new palace-yard in Westminster. And as his majesty came through Westminster Hall, the commanders, reformadoes, &c., that attended him, made a lane on both sides the hall through which his majesty passed, and came up the stairs to the House of Commons, and stood before the guard of pensioners and halberters, who also attended the king's person; and the door of the House of Commons being thrown open, his majesty entered the House, and as he passed up towards the chair, he cast his eye on the right hand, near the bar of the House, where Mr. Pym used to sit; but his majesty, not seeing him there (knowing him well), went up to the chair, and said, 'By your leave, Mr. Speaker, I must borrow your chair a little;' whereupon the speaker came out of the chair, and his majesty stepped up into it. After he had staid in the chair a while, he cast his eye upon the members as they stood up uncovered, but could not discern any of the five members to be there; nor, indeed, were they easy to be discerned, had they been there, among so many bare faces all standing up together.

"Then his majesty made this speech. 'Gentlemen, I am sorry for this occasion of coming unto you. Yesterday I sent a sergeant-at-arms, upon a very important occasion, to apprehend some that, by my command, were accused of high treason, whereunto I did expect obedience, and not a message; and I must declare unto you here, that albeit no king that ever was in England shall be more careful of your privileges, to maintain them to the uttermost of his power, than I shall be, yet you must know that in cases of treason no person hath a privilege, and therefore I am come to know if any of these persons that were accused are here; for I must tell you, gentlemen, that so long as these persons that I have accused, for no slight crime, but for treason, are here, I cannot expect that this House will be in the right way that I do heartily wish it; therefore I am come to tell you that I must have them wheresoever I find them. Well, since I see all the birds are flown, I do expect from you that you will send them unto me as soon as they return hither. But I assure you, on the word of a king, I never did intend any force, but shall proceed against them in a legal and fair way, for I never meant any other. And now, since I see I cannot do what I came for, I think this no unfit occasion to repeat what I have said formerly, that whatsoever I have done in favour and to the good of my subjects, I do mean to maintain it. I will trouble you no more, but tell you I do expect, as soon as they come to the House, you will send them to me, otherwise I must take my own course to find them.'

"When the king was looking about the House, the speaker standing below by the chair, his majesty asked him whether any of these persons were in the House—whether he saw any of them—and where they were. To which the speaker, falling on his knee, thus answered: 'May it please your majesty, I have neither eyes to see nor tongue to speak in this place but as the House is pleased to direct me, whose servant I am here ; and humbly beg your majesty's pardon that I cannot give any other answer than this to what your majesty is pleased to demand of me.*

"The king, having concluded his speech, went out of the House again, which was in great disorder, and many members cried out aloud, so as he might hear them, Privilege ! privilege ! and forthwith adjourned till the next day at one o'clock.

"The same evening his majesty sent James Maxwell, usher of the House of Peers, to the House of Commons, to require Mr. Rushworth, the clerk assistant, whom his majesty had observed to take his speech in characters at the table in the House, to come to his majesty ; and when Maxwell brought him to the king, his majesty commanded him to give him a copy of his speech in the House. Mr. Rushworth humbly besought his majesty (hoping for an excuse) to call to mind how Mr. Francis Nevil, a Yorkshire member of the House of Commons, was committed to the Tower for telling his majesty what words were spoken in the House by Mr. Henry Bellasis, son to the Lord Fauconberg ; to whom his majesty smartly replied, 'I do not ask you to tell me what was said by any member of the House, but what I said myself ;' whereupon he readily gave obedience to his majesty's command, and in his majesty's presence, in the room called the jewel-house, he transcribed his majesty's speech out of his characters, his majesty staying in the room all the while, and then and there presented the same to the king, which his majesty was pleased to command to be sent speedily to the press, and the next morning it came forth in print.

Pym, Hampden, Hollis, Hazlerig, and Strode had taken refuge in Coleman-street, in the city. The city, it has been well observed, was at this time the fastness of public liberty, and "a place of at least as much importance as Paris during the French Revolution."† Instead of being, as now, a huge collection of immense warehouses and counting-houses, frequented by clerks and traders during the day, and left almost deserted during night, it was then "closely inhabited by 300,000 persons, to whom it was a place of constant residence," and who had as complete a civil and military organization as if it had been an independent republic. The troops they afterward furnished turned the tide of many an action at the opening of the civil war. The municipal offices were filled by the most opulent and respectable merchants of the kingdom, and "the pomp of the magistracy of the capital was second only to that which surrounded the person of the sovereign." Finally, the numbers, the intelligence, the wealth of the citizens, the democratic form of their local government, that had educated them to notions of liberty, and their vicinity to the court and to the Parliament, made them "one of the most formidable bodies in the kingdom."

Into the city Charles proceeded on the following morning in search of the five members. He was received with marked signs of discontent. The multitude cried aloud, "Privileges of Parliament ! privileges of Parliament !" and one of them, more zealous than the rest, flung into the window of his carriage a paper, on which was written the famous words of the ten tribes when they forsook the foolish and wantonly tyrannical Rehoboam : "To your tents, O Israel !" Meanwhile, the houses, the purses, the pikes of the citizens were freely placed at the command of the Commons. They kept themselves all night in arms, and on the following day all signs of business were suspended, the shops closed, and the streets thronged. A committee had been appointed to sit in the city for investigating the outrage ; a deputation of the common council welcomed its members ; several of the halls of the companies (then formidable clans) were offered for its sittings ; guards were furnished in abundance ; and the sheriffs watched over the safety of Pym and his friends, and conducted them to and from the committee with every mark of honour.

Nor was this all. While four thousand Buckinghamshire men rode up from their county to watch over the safety of Hampden, an immense body of the common people assembled to "defend Mr. Pym." From a curious pamphlet, to which reference has already been made,* I find that a petition and defence of Pym was on this occasion drawn up by these faithful and strong friends, and meant for presentation to the king. Whether it was ever so presented I cannot ascertain ; but some extracts, which have not yet found a place in any record of the time, are appropriate and interesting.

Waiving any allusion to the other members accused, the petitioners confine themselves to the alleged guilt of Pym. "We doe unanimously suppose," they say, "that your majestie hath beene either misinformed, or else suggested by some malicious persons who are ill affected to the said Mr. Pym ; the man we have experimentally found to bee a chiefe pillar of religion ; who, when the pure sanctitie thereof had sunke too low into the vault of heresie in the late turbulent times, and when it almost languished in so disastrous a manner, was the chieftest supporter thereof, and did alwayes study with carefull vigilancie to erect and elevate the same." Again, adverting to the first article, "that Mr. Pym hath traitorously endeavoured to subvert the fundamentall lawes and government of England," the following remark is made : "This seemes contrary, in regard that hee solely did alwayes oppose any man whom hee either found or could suspect guiltie of the same crime, and hath laboured rather to ratifie and confirme the fundamentall lawes, than either subvert or confound the same ; for in his diurnall speeches in the Parliament was alwayes specified his reall intent in the institution, and not diminution or subversion of any law which was not detrimental to the safetie and prosperitie of this kingdom." The allegations in the fourth and fifth articles are answered thus : "It is declared that hee hath traitorously invited and encouraged a forraigne power to invade his majestie's kingdom of England. To this your petitioners dare boldly say, that this nefarious invitation and encouragement of a forraigne power was never undertooke by him ; for hee hath beene very vigilant to preserve and defend this kingdom, in as great fortification as possibly might be, to the flourishing prosperitie of this whole realme; and therefore hee hath oftentimes expressed his affection towards the safetie of this nation, and of stronger forces that should be raised, to keepe out any forraigne enemy or power, least, peradventure, they steale upon us unawares. In the fifth article hee is impeached thus: That hee hath traytorously indeavoured to subvert the rights and very being of Parliaments. To this we may answer with great facilitie, Hee was the chiefe cause that this Parliament was assembled, and it seemes very incongruous that hee should subvert the same. Moreover, hee is the sole man that stands for the ancient rights and liberties of the Parliaments, and it seemes a stupendious thing that hee should confound the same. In this respect your petitioners dare speake with confidence, that there was not one man in the Parliament House who did stand more strongly for the rights of Parliament than Mr. Pym did."

* Rushworth's Collections, vol. iv., p. 477, 478.

† See a brilliant article on Lord Nugent's Memorials of Hampden, in the Edinburgh Review.

* See p. 176 of the present volume, note : "The Commons' petition to the king."

What need to pursue this subject farther? The House of Commons, having declared the king's "warlike entrance" a gross breach of privilege, and his proclamation of the five members as traitors a "false, scandalous, and illegal paper," completed their open defiance of Charles by adjourning till the 11th of January, and ordering the accused members on that day to attend in their places at Westminster, and resume their public duties. Charles sought to effect a compromise; offered a "free pardon;" and said he found now "good cause wholly to desert any prosecution;" but it was too late. The resolute determination of the Commons, the proceedings which were afterward taken to dare the utmost investigation, and, finally, the punishment of the king's attorney, belong to history.

The 11th of January was a brilliant day, and the Thames appeared covered with boats, and its bridges and banks crowded with spectators. Armed vessels, and barges manned by sailors, and carrying ordnance with matches lighted, attended the embarkation of the sheriffs, with a portion of the city guard. Two brilliant lines of flags and colours ranged themselves from London Bridge to Westminster Hall, and through these Pym and Hampden, and their friends, in a vessel manned by sailors who had volunteered their services, returned to the scene of their dangers and glories. A farther division of the trainbands of the city had meanwhile marched up the Strand, attended by vast crowds of shouting people, for the purpose of guarding the avenues to the House of Commons; and as the patriots landed, the enthusiastic applauses of the multitude, outringing the clattering discharges of ordnance, followed them in their passage to the lobby. Pym rose immediately after taking his old seat, and fervently thanked the citizens of London. Hampden, Hollis, Hazlerig, and Strode stood uncovered while Pym spoke. In conclusion, the sheriffs were thanked by a unanimous vote of the House; and orders given that a guard, selected from the trainbands of the city, "should attend daily to watch over the safety of the Parliament."

Late on the night before this public triumph, the king, his queen, and their children left London and proceeded to Hampton Court. When Charles returned again, he returned a prisoner.

The crisis had now arrived, and the last appeal alone was waited for. Clarendon says that Pym and Hampden returned to their places in Parliament altered and fiercer men. Fiercer they probably were, but they were not altered. The times had changed, not they. Their hopes of any intermediate reconciliation were now forever blasted; and it was clear that no mutual terms could be held again, until one of the parties had thoroughly subdued the other.

The Commons pursued their measures with singular energy. Major-general Skippon was placed, with a sufficient guard, over the Tower; and a memorable order was at once issued, that Lord Newport, master-general of the ordnance, and Sir John Byron, lieutenant of the Tower, should suffer no removal of ordnance or ammunition "without the king's authority, signified by both Houses of Parliament." Goring was sent to hold Portsmouth under the same authority, and Sir John Hotham to Hull. The king remained irresolute and inactive meanwhile.

The Commons wanted money beyond all things, and now negotiated a loan with the city. The authorities, by petition, declined lending, except upon certain conditions, which they delivered in the form of twelve specific grievances to be at once redressed. These conditions are supposed to have been the suggestion of Pym. The Commons instantly desired a conference with the Lords respecting this London petition, and divers others of a similar character from the counties of Middlesex, Essex, and Hertford. Pym managed the conference, and the speech he delivered there is a masterpiece of eloquence; solid, concise, and vigorous, nervous and simple. It may remain, with the language itself, an everlasting evidence of the wisdom and courage of the orator.

"My lords, I am commanded by the knights, citizens, and burgesses, assembled for the Commons in Parliament, to present to your lordships divers petitions which they have received from several parts concerning the state of the kingdom, whereunto they are chiefly moved by that constant affection which they have always expressed, of maintaining a firm union and good correspondence with your lordships, wherein they have ever found much advantage and contentment, but never held it more important and necessary than at this time, when the wisdom and resolution of Parliament have as many great dangers and difficulties to pass through as ever heretofore.

"We are united in the public trust, which is derived from the Commonwealth, in the common duty and obligation whereby God doth bind us to the discharge of that trust; and the Commons desire to impart to your lordships whatsoever information or intelligence, whatsoever encouragement or assistance, they have received from those several counties which they represent, that so likewise we may be united in the same intentions and endeavours of improving all to the service of his majesty, and the common good of the kingdom.

"The petitions which I am directed to communicate to your lordships are four: from London, Middlesex, Essex, and Hertfordshire. We have received many more, but it would take up too much time and be too great a trouble to peruse all; and in these four you may perceive the effect and sense of all. First, I am to desire your lordships to hear them read; and then I shall pursue my instructions in propounding some observations out of them."

"These petitions," the report continues, "being read by four several members of the House, Mr. Pym resumed his discourse.

"My lords, in these four petitions you may hear the voice, or rather the cry, of all England; and you cannot wonder if the urgency, the extremity of the condition wherein we are, do produce some earnestness and vehemence of expression more than ordinary. The agony, terror, and perplexity in which the kingdom labours are universal; all parts are affected with them; and therefore in these you may observe the groans and miserable complaints of all.

"Divers reasons may be given why those diseases which are epidemical are more dangerous than others. First, The cause of such diseases is universal and supernal, and not from an evil constitution, or evil diet, or any other accident; such causes, therefore, work with more vigour and efficacy than those which are particular and inferior. Secondly, In such diseases there is a communicative quality, whereby the malignity of them is multiplied and enforced. Thirdly, They have a converting, transforming power, that turns other diseases and ill affections of men's bodies into their own nature.

"First, The common and epidemical disease wherein this Commonwealth now lies gasping hath a superior and universal cause from the evil counsels and designs of those who, under his majesty, bear the greatest sway in government. Secondly, It hath a contagious and infectious quality, whereby it is diffused and dispersed thro' all parts of the kingdom. Thirdly, It is apt to take in the discontents, evil affections, and designs of particular persons, to increase and fortify itself.

"I shall take occasion, from several branches of those petitions which your lordships have heard, to observe, First, The variety of dangers to which this kingdom is now subject. Secondly, the manifold distempers which are the cause of those dangers. Thirdly, The multiplicity of those evil influences which are the causes of those distempers.

"The first danger is from enemies abroad. This may seem a causeless and impertinent observation at this time, seeing we are in peace with all nations about us. But, my lords, you may be pleased to consider that the safety of the kingdom ought not to depend upon the will and disposition of our neighbours, but upon our own strength and provision. Betwixt states there are often sudden changes from peace to war, according to occasion and advantage. All the states of Christendom are now armed, and we have no reason to believe but that those of greatest power have an evil eye upon us in respect of our religion; and if their private differences should be composed, how dangerously, how speedily might those great armies, and other preparations now ready, be applied to, some enterprise and attempt against us! If there were no other cause, this were sufficient to make us stand upon our guard. But there are divers more especial symptoms of dangers of this kind.

"We may perceive by several advertisements from abroad that they did foresee our dangers many months before they broke out. They could foretell the time and manner of them, which is a clear evidence they held intelligence with those who were the contrivers and workers of the present troubles.

"We have, in truth, many dangerous traitors and fugitives now in other parts, who can discover the weakness and distemper of the kingdom, who hold intelligence with the ill-affected party here, and, by all cunning and subtle practices, endeavour to incite and provoke other princes against us.

"Some of the ministers of our neighbour princes, my lords, may be justly suspected to have had a yet more immediate hand and operation in the insurrection and rebellion in Ireland; many of the commanders, and most of the soldiers levied for the service of Spain, are now joined with the rebels there; and those Irish friars which were employed by the Spanish ambassador for the making of those levies are known to have been the chief incendiaries of this rebellion, and are still very active in the prosecution and encouragement of it. The rebels have, moreover, a ready and speedy supply from some of our neighbours. Two convoys of munition and arms we are certainly informed of—one from Dunkirk, the other from Nantes in Brittany; and certainly those that are so forward to enable others to hurt us, will not forbear to hurt us themselves, as soon as they shall have means and opportunity to do it.

"Another danger is from the Papists and ill-affected party at home. The Papists here are actuated by the same principles with those in Ireland. Many of the most active of them have lately, indeed, been there, which argues an intercourse and communication of councils. They have still store of arms and munition at their disposing, notwithstanding all our endeavours to disarm them; they have a free resort to the city and to the court; they want no opportunity to consult together; they have the same or greater encouragements, from above and from about them, than ever, in respect of the example and success of the rebels in Ireland, and the great confusions and divisions which, by their cunning and subtle practices, are raised and fomented amongst ourselves at home.

"A third danger is of tumults and insurrections of the meaner sort of people, by reason of their ill vent of cloth and other manufactures, whereby great multitudes are set on work, who live for the most part on their daily gettings, and will, in a very short time, be brought to great extremity if not employed. Nothing is more sharp and pressing than necessity and want; what they cannot buy they will take; from them the like necessity will quickly be derived to the farmers and husbandmen, and so grow higher, and involve all in an equality of misery and distress, if it be not instantly prevented! And, at this time, such tumults will be more dangerous, because the kingdom is full of disbanded soldiers and officers, who will be ready to head and to animate the multitude to commit violence with more strength and advantage; and if they once grow into a body, it will be much more difficult to reduce them into order again, because necessity and want, which are the causes of this disturbance, will still increase as the effects increase.

"A fourth danger is from the rebels in Ireland, not only in respect of that kingdom, but in respect of this. They have seized upon the body of that kingdom already; they abound in men of very able persons; they increase in arms and munition; they have great hopes of supplies from abroad and of encouragement here, and are sure of good entertainment from the popish party, so that they begin to speak already there of transporting themselves hither, and making this kingdom the seat of the war.

"The distemper, my lords, which hath produced these dangers is various and exceeding violent. Whosoever Nature is hindered in her proper operations and faculties, distempers will necessarily follow. The obstructions, my lords, which have brought us into this distemper are very many, so that we cannot wonder at the strength and malignity of it. Some of the chiefest of these obstructions I shall endeavour to remember.

"First. The obstruction of reformation in matters of religion. No grievances are sharper than those that press upon the tender consciences of men! and there was never church or state afflicted with more grievances of this kind than we have been; and though they are, by the wisdom of this Parliament, partly eased and diminished, yet many still remain; and as long as the bishops and the corrupt part of the clergy continue in their power, there will be little hope of freedom, either from the sense of those which continue, or the fear of those which are removed. And of this obstruction, my lords, I must clear the Commons. We are in no part guilty of it. Some good bills have passed us, and others are in preparation, which might have been passed before this if we had not found such ill success in your Lordships' House. Whatever mischief this obstruction shall produce, we are free from it: we may have our part of the misery, we can have no part in the guilt or dishonour.

"Secondly. An obstruction in trade. It is trade that brings food and nourishment to the kingdom; it is that which preserves and increases the stock of the whole, and distributes a convenient portion of maintenance to every part of it, therefore such an obstruction as this must needs be dangerous; the freedom of trade being so necessary, the benefit so important, that it gives life, strength, and beauty to the whole body of the Commonwealth. But I must protest the House of Commons hath given no cause to this obstruction; we have eased trade of many burdens and heavy taxes, which are taken off; we have freed it from many hard restraints by patents and monopolies; we have been willing to part with our own privileges to give it encouragement; we have sought to put the merchants into security and confidence in respect of the Tower of London, that so they might be invited to bring in their bullion to the mint, as heretofore they have done; and we are no way guilty of the troubles, the fears, and public dangers which make men withdraw their stocks, and keep their money by them, to be ready for such sudden exigencies as in these great distractions we have too much cause to expect.

"Thirdly. The obstruction in the relief of Ireland. It must needs be accounted a great shame and dishonour to this kingdom that our neighbours have showed themselves more forward to supply the rebels than we have been to relieve our distressed brethren and fellow-subjects. But I must declare we are altogether innocent of any neglect herein. As soon as the first news of the rebellion came over, we undertook the war, not by way of supply and aid, as in former rebellions the subjects have used to do, but we undertook the whole charge of it, and we suffered not twenty-four hours to pass before we agreed to a great levy of money and men, to be employed against the rebels, even in a larger proportion than the lords, justices, and council there did desire; and from time to time we have done all for the furtherance thereof, though in the midst of many distractions and diversions. But the want of commissions for levying of men, for issuing arms, and divers other impediments, have been the causes of that obstruction: and I wish we had not only found impediments to ourselves; we have found also encouragements to them. Many of the chief commanders, now at the head of the rebels, after we had, with your lordships' concurrence, stop't the ports against all Irish Papists, have been suffered to pass by his majesty's immediate warrant, much to the discouragement of the lords-justices and the council there; and this procured, as we believe, by some evil instruments too near his royal person, without his majesty's knowledge and intention.

"Fourthly. The obstruction in prosecution of delinquents. Many we have already brought up to your lordships, divers others we have been discouraged to transmit, such difficult proceedings have we met withal, such terrors and discountenance have been cast upon ourselves and our witnesses. My lords, those who have showed themselves the friends and patrons of delinquents have found it the most ready way to preferment! Yea, his majesty's own hand hath been obtained, and his majesty's ships employed, for the transporting of divers of those who have fled from the justice of Parliament!

"Fifthly. A general obstruction and interruption of the proceedings in Parliament by those manifold designs of violence which, thro' God's mercy, we have escaped; by the great and frequent breaches of privilege; by the subtle endeavours to raise parties in our House, and jealousies betwixt the two Houses.

"Sixthly. The obstruction in providing for the defence of the kingdom, that we might be enabled to resist a foreign enemy, or to suppress all civil insurrections. What a pressing necessity there is of this, the exceeding great decays in the navy, in the forts, in the power of ordering the militia of the kingdom, and means of furnishing them with munition, are sufficient evidences, known to none better than your lordships. And what endeavours we have used to remove them, but hitherto without that success and concurrence which we expected, and where the stop hath been, and upon what good grounds we may claim our own-innocency and faithfulness, we desire no other witnesses but yourselves.

"Lastly, I come to the evil influences which have caused this distemper; and I shall content myself with mentioning those which are most important. 1. I shall remember the evil counsels about the king, whereof we have often complained. Diseases of the brain are most dangerous, because from thence sense and motion are derived to the whole body. The malignity of evil counsels will quickly be infused into all parts of the state. None can doubt but we have exceedingly laboured under most dangerous and mischievous counsels. This evil influence hath been the cause of the preparation of war with Scotland—of the procuring a rebellion in Ireland—of corrupting religion—suppressing the liberty of this kingdom—and of many fearful and horrid attempts to the subverting the very being of Parliaments, which was the only hopeful means of opposing and preventing all the rest. The last, indeed, doth appear to be a most predominant evil of the time, whereat we need not wonder when we consider how counsellors have been preferred and prepared; and I appeal to your lordships' own consciences whether the giving and countenancing of evil counsel hath not been almost the only way to favour and advancement. 2. The discouragement of good counsel. Divers honest and approved counsellors have been put from their places, others so discountenanced as that the way of favour hath been shut against them, and that of danger and destruction only open to them. 3. The great power that an interested and factious party hath in the Parliament by the continuance of the votes of the bishops and popish lords in your Lordships' House, and the taking in of others, both out of the House of Commons and otherwise, to increase their strength. 4. The fomenting and cherishing of a malignant party throughout the whole kingdom. 5. The manifold jealousies betwixt the king, his Parliament, and good subjects, whereby his protection and favour hath in a great measure been withheld from them, and their inclination and resolution to serve and assist him hath been very much hindered and interrupted."

The force and boldness of all this were equal to the great emergencies of the hour; and as the orator proceeded, we may suppose him more than repaid by the expression of proud and affectionate admiration that rested on the countenances of Hampden and Fiennes, who were sitting by his side. His closing passages were simple and noble in the extreme. They condensed into a few words all the ominous warnings which, throughout his great task, he had addressed to the upper House; and the inspiration of a memorable lesson, announced not less for the present than as a precedent and example for remoter times, was stamped upon them.

"We have often suffered under the misinterpretation of good actions, and false imputation of evil ones which we never intended, so that we may justly purge ourselves from all guilt of being authors of this jealousy and misunderstanding. We have been, and are still, ready to serve his majesty with our lives and fortunes, with as much cheerfulness and earnestness of affection as ever any subjects were; and we doubt not but our proceedings will so manifest this, that we shall be as clear in the apprehension of the world as we are in the testimony of our own consciences.

"I am now come to a conclusion. I have nothing to propound to your lordships by way of request or desire from the House of Commons. I doubt not but your judgments will tell you what is to be done. Your consciences, your honours, your interests will call upon you for the doing of it. The Commons will be glad to have your concurrence and help in saving of the kingdom; but, if they fail of it, it shall not discourage them in doing their duty. And whether the kingdom be lost or saved (I hope, through God's blessing, it will be saved!), they shall be sorry that the story of this PRESENT PARLIAMENT SHOULD TELL POSTERITY THAT, IN SO GREAT A DANGER AND EXTREMITY, THE HOUSE OF COMMONS SHOULD BE ENFORCED TO SAVE THE KINGDOM ALONE, and that the Peers should have no part in the honour of the preservation of it, having so great an interest in the good success of those endeavours in respect of their great estates and high degrees of nobility.

"My lords, consider what the present necessities and dangers of the Commonwealth require, what the Commons have reason to expect, to what endeavours and counsels the concurrent desires of all the people do invite you; so that, applying yourselves to the preservation of the king and kingdom, I may be bold to assure you, in the name of all the commons of England, that you shall be bravely seconded!"

The first effect of this speech, which was enthusiastically hailed by the Commons,* was in the passing of the bill for taking away the bishops' vote, with three dissentient voices only. The king refused his assent to it, but subsequently yielded, and in this gave great offence to his party. It may be supposed, however, that some subsequent explanation was satisfactory to them, since the following notable disclosure has escaped from Lord Clarendon's pen: "I have some cause to believe that the argument, which was unanswerable, for the rejecting that bill, was applied for the confirming it; an opinion that the violence and force used in procuring it rendered it absolutely invalid and void, made the confirmation of it less considered, as not being of strength to make that act good which was in itself null; and I doubt this logic had an influence upon acts of no less moment than these." There is scarcely an act in the life of Charles I. that does not bear the stain of some such perfidy. Where were the leaders of the English people now to lean, if not upon their own strength, the wisdom of their

* "The foregoing speech of Mr. Pymme's was so agreeable to the Commons, that the same day they ordered 'that Mr. Speaker, in the name of the House, shall give thanks unto Mr. Pymme for his so well performing the service he was employed in, by the commands of this House, at this conference. And it was further ordered, that Mr. Pymme be desired to put the speech he made at this conference into writing, and to deliver it into the House, to the end that it may be printed.' This was done accordingly."—Parliamentary History. The copy in the text is taken from a large paper copy of this authorized version now in possession, "printed for John Bothwell," 1641.

long and hard experience, and the confidence of the people who trusted them?

The second great effect of Pym's speech was exhibited by the king himself. He wrote to the speaker and complained of it, more especially of that passage which stated several of the Irish rebels to have passed the ports "by his majesty's immediate warrant." The Commons vindicated the speech, and the king replied; it was again defended more strongly still; and the many conferences and declarations that passed served to widen the breach between the Parliament and the king.* The tributes which it had meanwhile brought pouring in, of faith and affection to the Parliament, most materially strengthened the cause.†

The king now directed all his resources, whether of force or stratagem, to the acquisition of the two great magazines of the kingdom, Hull and the Tower. His various attempts, and their thorough defeat, are told in all the histories. The result was, that Charles proclaimed Hotham a traitor by sound of trumpet, and sent two angry messages to the House demanding reparation for the repulse he had met with. "If," he added, "we are brought into a condition so much worse than any of our subjects, that whilst you all enjoy your privileges, and may not have your possessions disturbed or your titles questioned, we only may be spoiled, thrown out of our towns, and our goods taken from us, 'tis time to examine

* Charles's pertinacity about this speech was curious. Whenever, for some weeks after, the Commons sent him any message, his remark would be, "I must tell you, that I rather expected a vindication for the imputation laid on me in Mr. Pym's speech," and as the war approached more nearly, his reference to it grew less respectful: "Concerning Pym's speech—you will have found by what the Lord Compton and Mr. Baynton brought from us in answer to that message they brought to us, that, as yet, we rest nothing satisfied in that particular."

† Even the London women, wives of tradesmen, became infected with the popular enthusiasm, and sent in a long petition of affection to the House of Commons, and prayers that they would redress all grievances. Butler is supposed to have alluded to this in his couplet:

"The oyster-women lock'd their fish up, and the satire was allowable enough. The Journals of the House state, however, that "this petition was presented by Mrs. Anne Stagg, a gentlewoman and brewer's wife, and many others with her of like rank and quality; and that, after some time spent in reading of it, the House sent them an answer by Mr. Pym, which was performed in this manner. Mr. Pym came to the Commons' door, and called for the women, and spake unto them in these words: 'Good women, your petition, with the reasons, hath been read in the House, and is thankfully accepted of, and is come in a seasonable time. You shall, God-willing, receive from us all the satisfaction which we can possibly give to your just and lawful desires. We intreat you, therefore, to repair to your houses, and turn your petition which you have delivered here into prayers at home for us; for we have been, are, and shall be, to our utmost power, ready to relieve you, your husbands, and children, and to perform the trust committed unto us towards God, our king, and country, as becometh faithful Christians and loyal subjects.'" This speech is no bad evidence of Pym's popular and easy address. Nothing could have been more happily turned. I should add, also, from the journals of the same period, another kind of testimony to the present influence of Pym. "Information being given to the Lords that Edw. Sandeford, a tailor, of London, had said 'that the Earl of Essex was a traitor; that all the Parliament were traitors; that the Earl of Warwick was a traitor, and he wished his heart in his boots; and that he cursed the Parliament, and wished Mr. Pym (calling him King Pym) and Sir John Hotham both hanged:' the said Edw. Sandeford was brought to the bar, and asked what he had to alledge in his defence; but not being able to disprove the charge, he and the witnesses against him were ordered to withdraw, and a sharp sentence of punishment was decreed against him."
And trudged away to cry 'no bishop!'"

how we have lost those privileges, and to try all possible ways, by the help of God, the law of the land, and the affection of all our good subjects, to recover them, and to vindicate ourselves from those injuries; and if we shall miscarry herein, we shall be the first prince in this kingdom that hath done so—having no other end but to defend the true Protestant profession, the law of the land, and the liberty of the subject. And God so deal with us as we continue in those resolutions." And in a subsequent more elaborate paper, drawn forth by an order of the Commons justifying Hotham, and "suppressing" the forces the king had raised against Hull, Charles writes, or, rather, "Mr. Hyde" writes for him, "We are not unwilling to join issue with them in this way, and to let all the world know how necessary, just, and lawful all our proceedings have been in this point; and that the defence of these proceedings is the defence of the law of the land, of the liberty and property of the subject; and that by the same rule of justice which is now offered to us, all the private interest and title of all our good subjects to all their lands and goods are confounded and destroyed. Mr. Pym himself tells you, in his speech against the Earl of Strafford (published by the order of the House of Commons), 'The law is the safeguard, the custody of all private interests; your honours, your lives, your liberties, and estates are all in the keeping of the law: without this, every man hath a like right to any thing.' And we would fain be answered, What title any subject of our kingdom hath to his house or land, that we have not to our town of Hull? Or what right hath he to his money, plate, or jewels, that we have not to our magazine or munition there? If we had ever such a title, we would know when we lost it. . . . We conclude with Mr. Pym's own words: 'If the prerogative of the king overwhelm the liberty of the people, it will be turned to tyranny; if liberty undermine the prerogative, it will grow into anarchy;' and so we say into confusion."

Now mark the answer of the Commons, in perhaps the boldest and most remarkable state document of the time. The hand of Pym may be traced in every line of it. The commencement of the extract which follows is indeed almost literally copied from one of his finest speeches. "If," say the Commons of England to their king, "if we have done more than ever our ancestors have done, we have suffered more than ever they have suffered; and yet, in point of modesty and duty, we shall not yield to the best of former times; and we shall put this in issue. Whether the highest and most unwarrantable proceedings of any of his majesty's predecessors do not fall short of, and much below, what hath been done to us this Parliament; and, on the other side, whether, if we should make the highest precedents of other Parliaments our patterns, there would be cause to complain of 'want of modesty and duty in us,' when we have not so much as suffered such things to enter into our thoughts which all the world knows they have put in action? Another charge which is laid very high upon us (and which were indeed a very great crime if we were found guilty thereof) is, 'that, by avowing this act of Sir J. Hotham, we do, in consequence, confound and destroy the title and interest of all his majesty's good subjects to their lands and goods; and that, upon this ground, that his majesty hath the same title to his own town of Hull which any of his subjects have to their houses or lands; and the same to his magazine or munition there, that any man hath to his money, plate, or jewels; and therefore that they ought not to have been disposed of without or against his consent, no more than the house, land, money, plate, or jewels of any subject ought to be without or against his will.'

Here that is laid down for a principle which would indeed pull up the very foundation of the liberty, property, and interest of every subject in particular, and of all the subjects in general, if we should admit it for a truth 'that his majesty hath the same right and title to his towns and magazine (bought with the public moneys, as we conceive that at Hull to have been) that every particular man hath to his house, lands, and goods; for his majesty's towns are no more his own than his kingdom is his own; and his kingdom is no more his own than his people are his own; and if the king had a property in all his towns, what would become of the subjects' property in their houses therein? and if he had a property in his kingdom, what would become of the subjects' property in their lands throughout the kingdom? or of their liberties, if his majesty had the same right in their persons that every subject hath in their lands or goods? and what would become of all the subjects' interest in the town and forts of the kingdom, and in the kingdom itself, if his majesty might sell, or give them away, or dispose of them at his pleasure, as a particular man may do with his lands and with his goods? This erroneous maxim being infused into princes, that their kingdoms are their own, and that they may do with them what they will (as if their kingdoms were for them, and not they for their kingdoms), is the root of all the subjects' misery, and of all the invading of their just rights and liberties; whereas, indeed, they are only intrusted with their kingdoms, and with their towns, and with their people, and with the public treasure of the Commonwealth, and whatsoever is bought therewith. By the known law of this kingdom, the very jewels of the crown are not the king's proper goods, but are only intrusted to him for the use and ornament thereof; as the towns, forts, treasure, magazine, offices, and people of the kingdom, and the whole kingdom itself, are intrusted unto him for the good, and safety, and best advantage thereof; and as this trust is for the use of the kingdom, so ought it to be managed by the advice of the houses of Parliament, whom the kingdom hath trusted for that purpose, it being their duty to see it be discharged according to the condition and true intent thereof, and as much as in them lies, by all possible means to prevent the contrary; which if it hath been their chief care and only aim in the disposing of the town and magazine of Hull in such manner as they have done, they hope it will appear clearly to all the world that they have discharged their own trust, and not invaded that of his majesty's, much less his property, which, in this case, they could not do."

A second answer was returned by the king, more weak and more elaborate than the first, and a vigorous remonstrance, recommended in an earnest and forcible speech by Pym,* was forwarded to Charles. It opened with these words: "We, your majesty's most humble and loyal subjects, the lords and commons of this present Parliament assembled, do hereby call God, this kingdom, and the whole world to witness, that we have, ever since our first meeting in this present Parliament, with fidelity to your majesty and the state, with much patience and constancy in respect of the great affronts and interruptions, the pernicious plots and attempts wherewith we have been encountered, distracted, and opposed, employed our counsels and endeavours to maintain God's true religion, the honour and rights of your crown, the peace and safety of your royal person and your kingdoms, and the just liberties of your people; that so we might ease them of their great grievances, and prevent the fears and dangers, yea, the imminent ruin and destruction, which have been contrived and fostered, not only in your court, but even very near your own person; and however our liberties have been invaded, many of our lives endangered, and such attempts made upon us as might have subverted the very being of Parliament, yet have we so kept ourselves within the bounds of modesty and duty, that we have given no just occasion of your majesty's absence at this time." In reference to a complaint in the king's last paper, the following remark is made: "And whereas his majesty saith 'he could wish that his own immediate actions, which he avows on his own honour, might not be so roughly censured under that common style of evil counsellors,' we could also heartily wish we had not cause to make that style so common; but, how often and undutifully soever these wicked counsellors fix their dishonour upon the king, by making his majesty the author of those evil actions which are the effects of their own evil counsels, we, his majesty's loyal and dutiful subjects, can use no other style, according to that maxim in the law, 'The king can do no wrong;' but if any ill be committed in matter of state, the council must answer for it; if in matters of justice, the judges."

Every step in this paper war now brought the combatants nearer and nearer to a more real and a more fatal field. The great question on which all else depended was at last in vehement agitation—the command of the militia of the kingdom. The very condition of the parties between whom the discussion arose precluded from the first the possibility of agreement. Some idea of the labour and research which Pym, notwithstanding, devoted to this memorable question, will be gathered from a curious document in the appendix at the end of this article,† and which is highly characteristic of the man.

The disposal of the militia, however, cannot be argued, in the present case, on abstract grounds, though Pym has made out the most forcible case, even in that view, which has been yet attempted. The Parliament had been undoubtedly forced into a position to make the demand they did,* when, as a ground of trust, they required that the king should place the army and navy under the command of officers possessing the confidence of both Houses. On refusal of this, he was asked whether, for a time, the militia might not be granted? "No, by God!" his sacred majesty, according to Rushworth,† swore; "not for an hour! You have asked that of me in this was never asked of any king, and with which I will not trust my wife and children."

* See this speech in Cobbett's Parl. Hist., vol. ii., p. 1102.

† Appendix C.

On a subsequent motion of Pym, the Commons unanimously passed their ordinance for disposing the militia, and sent it up to the Lords. Meanwhile they again memorialized his majesty, who, in return, vapoured upon them thus: "We will propose no more particulars to you, having no luck to please or to be understood by you. Take your own time for what concerns our particular, but be sure you have an early, speedy care of the public; that is, of the only rule that preserves the public, the law of the land: preserve the dignity and reverence due to that. It was well said in a speech made by a private person (it was Mr. Pym's speech against the Earl of Strafford, and formerly quoted by us), 'The law is that which puts a difference betwixt good and evil, betwixt just and unjust. If you take away the law, all things will fall into a confusion; every man will become a law unto himself, which, in the depraved condition of human nature, must needs produce many great enormities. Lust will become a law, and envy will become a law; covetousness and ambition will become laws; and what dictates, what decisions such laws will produce, may easily be discerned.' So said that gentleman, and much more, very well, in defence of the law, and against arbitrary power. It is worth looking over and considering; and if the most zealous defence of the true Protestant profession, and the most resolved protection of the law be the most necessary duty of a prince, we cannot believe this miserable distance and misunderstanding can be long continued between us; we have often and earnestly declared them to be the chiefest desires of our soul, and the end and rule of all our actions." And again, in one of his subsequent productions, he returned to the same strain. "We remembered them long ago, and we cannot do it too often, of that excellent speech of Mr. Pym's: The law is that which puts a difference," &c. And Mr. Hallam can say of these tedious and evasive documents that they excel the manly, earnest, and straightforward productions of the popular leaders!

The next motion of the Commons "shook Charles's throne and title to the centre."‡ After obtaining, by a masterly stroke of vigorous policy, possession of the fleet, they passed the three following resolutions: "1. That it appears that the king, seduced by wicked counsel, intends to make war against the Parliament, who, in all their consultations and actions, have proposed no other end unto themselves but the care of his kingdoms, and the performance of all duty and loyalty to his person. 2. That whensoever the king maketh war upon the Parliament, it is a breach of the trust reposed in him by his people, contrary to his oath, and tending to the dissolution of his government. 3. That whosoever shall serve or assist him in such wars, are traitors by the fundamental laws of this kingdom, and have been so adjudged by two acts of Parliament, and ought to suffer as traitors."

The king now, in his turn, denounced the militia ordinance as illegal, and began to issue his commissions of array. On the 12th of July the Commons voted the raising of an army, to be commanded in chief by the Earl of Essex. Some days after, a proclamation from the king declared Essex a traitor.

At this point a temporary pause may be made, for the purpose of introducing a speech by Pym,* of a style very different from any that has yet been given, but conceived and expressed in exactly that sort of exquisite gravity of humour which such a subject was likely to call forth from such a speaker. On the publication of the militia ordinance, Sir Edward Dering—whose fantastic vanity, before adverted to, had already separated him from the popular party and banished him from the House—bethought himself of a new project for notoriety, and, "albeit a justice of the peace," presented himself, with some equally dignified friends, as candidates to serve on the grand jury of the county of Kent (which he had before represented in the Commons), which being allowed, he wheedled all the jurors into his purpose; or, in the words of the charge preferred against him, having drawn up the heads of a strong petition against the militia ordinance and the House of Commons, he "did tender the said heads to the said grand jury, and did then and there wickedly and unlawfully persuade, labour, and solicit the rest of the grand jury to agree to the same, and have them drawn into a petition to the Parliament, to be presented by the said grand jury to the judge of the said assizes and the rest of the bench there, to be by them assented to and approved of; and did then and there wickedly conjure the said grand jury to secrecy, and not to discover any thing touching the said petition, till it should be by them agreed upon and presented as aforesaid, falsely persuading them that they were thereunto bound by their oath." Some of the jury consented, some refused; but Sir Edward persisted, ultimately managed to present his petition to the judges, and was proposing to do a vast deal more, when "Mr. Pym" interfered, lodged an information against him, and supported it, before the House of Lords, in the following admirable speech of grave satirical humour:

"Your lordships see by this that hath been read unto you, that nondum recentis Illi fatum stetit; that, notwithstanding the many strange and variable attempts against the Parliament, and their wonderful and miraculous preservations, yet mischief is so fruitful and generative as to produce a new brood of serpents, which

* Even Lord Clarendon admits, on the passing of the militia ordinance, that "when this bill had been, with much ado, accepted and first read, there were few men who imagined it would ever receive farther countenance, but now there were few who did not believe it to be a very necessary provision for the peace and safety of the kingdom; so great an impression had the late proceedings made upon them."

† Vol. iv., p. 533.

‡ History from Mackintosh, vol. v., p. 304.

* This speech appears anonymously in the common Parliamentary histories, but in the Journals it is given to Pym.

are continually hissing, maligning, and practising against the pious and noble endeavours of both Houses, and against the peace, prosperity, and happiness of this afflicted kingdom. If the evil and seducing spirit which doth animate those designs were asked from whence he comes, doubtless his answer would be, 'from compassing the earth,' having removed his scene into many several parts, and found so many friends and patrons of his audacious achievements, amongst whom this gentleman, Sir Edward Dering, is one: a man of mark and eminency; of wit, learning, and zeal, at least in show and appearance; and yet all these miserably shipwreck'd upon the shelves and sands of the Kentish shore! The thing itself appears to your lordships to be a manifest breach of the rules of law, justice, and religion; and yet, under the cloak of all three, a fast must be proclaimed to take away Naboth and his vineyard! The yeomanry of Kent, heretofore in great esteem, is now become vile and contemptible; an extraordinary grand jury must be prepared of knights, gentlemen, and justices of the peace, for some extraordinary service—what it is your lordships have heard. They must descend from their places on the bench, and from themselves too, not to serve their country (for that were no disparagement), but to serve their own unworthy, ambitious, and seditious ends.

"This gentleman, a ringleader, late a member of the House of Commons, the grand jury of the whole kingdom (and there so highly esteeming of his wisdom), is contented now to descend so low as to become one of the common jury of the county. Such is the meanness and pusillanimity of high thoughts, as, for compassing of their own ends, to stoop to any condition, how low soever it may be!

"Having set the cards, however, he plays the game very foully. He leads his fellows out of the way, and makes them, like ill hunters, instead of following the chase, at the quest of one ill mouth to fall upon a flock of sheep! Their duty was to have inquired diligently of the matters given them in charge. Surely this was out of the charge, because the judge had told them it was out of his commission. And yet they leave other matters which they were charged with as accidents and trifles, and insist upon this, which they had nothing to do with, as the principal business.

"He obtrudes on them also, be it observed, divers monstrous and seditious heads, and by sinister suggestions, labours, and solicitations, which ought not to be used to a jury, and by a kind of violence offered them, seeks to enforce them to a consent, contrary to their own reason, judgment, and consciences, when they refused, opposed, and protested against it. Failing of this,

"Flectere si nequeam superos, acheronta movebo! instead of inquiring upon the statute of witchcraft and conjuration, he useth his conjurations and enchantments upon them to conjure them to secrecy, falsely persuading them that they will be bound unto it by their oath. When all this would not serve, he then applies himself to the bench; and by the enchantments and conjurations used there, prevails so far as to have it there voted and assented to by such as were present, and, to give the more strength and countenance to it, wants not the aid and concurrence of some appearing reverend divines, and of civilians also; and sticks not to affirm that he can have 40,000 persons to attend the petition! proclaims a meeting at Blackheath, a place fatal and ominous for actions of this nature! and all this under colour of a petition—being, in truth, a challenge, an adjuration, and a scandal upon the Parliament, and purporting nothing else but a desperate design to put not only Kent, but, for aught is known, all Christendom into combustion, carrying sails full swollen with spite, arrogance, and sedition.

"The particular instances I forbear to trouble your lordships with, because you will find some of them upon perusal of the petition. Many arguments might be used in aggravation of them, from the eminency of the power of the person, and the arrogance of his mind; from the acrimony of his spirit, and from the topping place of Kent, which former ages have found obnoxious to these infelicities;* which this gentleman, so well read in story, should have been mindful of in these troublesome times! But all these, and other circumstances, I leave to your lordships' noble and judicious consideration, desiring, amongst other motives, that your lordships will be pleased to reflect upon the acts of your own justice in a case of like nature, which, being first begun here, near at hand, might have spread the flame and contagion over all England, had not the great wisdom and justice of both Houses in due time prevented it.

"I shall add no more at this time but what I have read of a people in Africa, who sent a challenge to the wind, whereupon, at the meeting, the wind blew down mountains upon them and overwhelmed them. I hope those bold and insolent adventurers, who have presumed to send a challenge or defiance to the great Houses, shall find a like stroke of their wonted power and justice, and that they shall meet with such a wind as will blow down their high thoughts upon themselves, return their votes into their own bosoms, and their mischievous designs upon their own heads!

"All which I am warranted, in the name of the House of Commons, and of all the commons of England, to desire of your lordships; and that you will be pleased to make this gentleman, the principal author of this foul act, a spectacle and pattern of exemplary justice to present and future times."

On the 22d of August, Charles I. erected his standard at Nottingham. The day was stormy and tempestuous, says Clarendon, and the king appeared more melancholic than he used to be. "The standard itself was blown down, the same night it had been set up, by a very strong and unruly wind, and could not be fixed again in a day or two, till the tempest was allayed." Essex was in the field almost equally soon; and the green-coat regiments of Hampden, the London red-coats of Hollis, the purple of Lord Brook, the blue of Lord Say, were soon seen gathering over the English fields. Sir William Waller, the firm friend of the Parliament, wrote to his "noble friend" Sir Ralph Hopton, entirely devoted to the king, in these words: "My affections to you are so unchangeable, that hostility itself cannot violate my friendship to your person; but I must be true to the cause wherein I serve. The old limitation of usque ad aras holds still. . . . The great God, who is the searcher of my heart, knows with what reluctance I go upon this service, and with what perfect hatred I look upon a war without an enemy. But I look upon it as opus Domini, and that is enough to silence all passion in me. The God of peace in his good time send us peace, and in the mean time fit us to receive it! We are both on the stage, and we must act the parts that are assigned us in this tragedy. Let us do it in a way of honour, and without personal animosities." It stands on record, to the immortal honour of the English character, that in this noble and affecting spirit, with very rare exceptions, our great civil war was to the last fought out on both sides.

* Pym here makes allusion to what has been commemorated so nobly by our great poet Wordsworth, in his sonnet beginning "Vanguard of Liberty, ye men of Kent!"

None of its details, however, belong to this memoir. To Pym was intrusted the momentous duty of watching over and conducting the affairs of Parliament and the executive while the majority of his friends were absent in the war. The executive power had been vested in what was styled a "Committee of Safety," comprising five peers, Essex, Northumberland, Pembroke, Holland, and Say, and ten commoners, Pym, Hampden, Hollis, Marten, Fiennes, Pierrepont, Glyn, Sir William Waller, Sir Philip Stapleton, and Sir John Meyrick. But all its most arduous duties fell upon Pym, and to their performance, with his old and unwearied energy, he entirely devoted what was left of his great and useful life.

With a view to that solemnity which was thought befitting the capital of a country through which civil war now raged, one of the first acts of the Houses was the issue of an order that, during the present period of calamity, "when humiliation and prayer better became the state of public affairs than mirth and levity," all public stage-plays should cease and be forborne. There is something grand in this, with which the liveliest and most liberal imagination among us now need not fail to sympathize. The players, however, were not discomfited. Scorning plain prose, they sent up a rhymed petition to the Houses, and then followed the army of the king. From the petition itself a line or two may serve:

* * * * * "We vow
Not to act any thing you disallow.
We will not dare at your strange votes to jeer,
Or personate King Pym with his state fear."^{*}

"King" Pym was a favourite and scarcely objectionable term of Royalist reproach against one who reigned with absolute power over the affections of the great mass of the English people.

As the players went out, pamphlets and newspapers, a new, and many may think a somewhat less exceptionable series of "abstract and brief chronicles of the time," came in. Now "News from Hull," "Truths from York," and "Warranted Tidings from Ireland," coursed the country side; now the "Scots' Dove" assaulted and tore to pieces the "Parliament Kite" or the "Secret Owl;" and the "Weekly Discoverer" suddenly found himself "The Discoverer stript naked." The principal regular newspapers, however, were, on the side of the Parliament, the Mercurius Britannicus, written by the famous Marchamont Needham, or "foul-mouthed Ned," as his polite opponents styled him; and, on the king's side, the Mercurius Aulicus, published under the classic auspices of Oxford, and written, as Needham used to say, "by Birkenhead the scribe (afterward Sir John), Secretary Nicholas the informer, George Digby the contriver," and that very reverend divine, Doctor Peter Heyl.[†] The wars of these rival journalists were carried on without much scruple on either side, though the court undoubtedly carried off the palm for indecency; and they served to disseminate, in every possible shape, the fiercest hate and malice. I have examined them all (I believe) with the utmost care, and shall be able to illustrate the remaining part of my subject with an occasional extract.

The exertions which Pym found requisite to maintain the interest and honour of Parliament at this time are almost incredible; and as the checkered fortunes of the Parliamentary army darkened into positive losses, the difficulties of his position were only less extraordinary than the resources they called forth from him. "From three of the clock in the morning to the evening, and from evening to midnight," says an unimpeachable witness, Dr. Marshall,* who stood by his side, he laboured in the service of the Commonwealth. Now on the field of action, consulting with Hampden; now in the tent of Essex, strengthening his failing purpose; again at Westminster; and then among the London citizens—it was Pym, and Pym alone, who held at this awful crisis the frame of the executive together.

And, what in this was probably the most extraordinary, his influence sustained itself in defiance of all the violent changes and affections of the shortsighted multitude. In the opening months of the war, for instance, a negotiation with the king was opened, and became highly unpopular. Pym acknowledged its propriety, however, and, with some of the committee, presented himself at the Guildhall, and thus addressed the authorities:†

"My lord-mayor and gentlemen, I and my colleagues are here to represent to you (to you of this famous city of London, who will make it much more famous by these noble affections, which you have showed still to the public good, and by yielding so much aid and so much encouragement as you have done to the Parliament in maintaining it!) the state of both

* Funeral Sermon, p. 36.

† This speech is not in Rushworth. I copy from an edition printed "for Peter Cole."

* King Pym has been personated at last, however, or, if not personated, at least delineated, by Mr. Browning, with infinite force, expression, and beauty, in the recent tragedy of "Strafford." But the offences against Pym at this time were not all so harmless as that alluded to in the text. I copy from the Old Parl. Hist., vol. ii., p. 266: "Two were tried this day at the Lords' bar; one of them, Mr. Windebank, for saying 'that Mr. Pym had taken a bribe of £30, sitting in the chair in Easter term; that he had as many sngarilaves given for bribes as he had sold for 6 or £700. That before he was a Parliament man he was worth little, but he had now cozened the king of as much money as he had bought a good estate, and given £10,000 of the king's money to the marriage of his daughter.'"

Houses, and the reasons and motives upon which they did desire peace; motives, indeed, that have wrought with us from the beginning of this war to this time; for we should never have stepped one step towards war if we might have had, or hoped for, such a peace as might have secured religion and liberty, and the public good of the kingdom. But truly ill counsel did exclude us from such hope.

"We now conceive that the king, having seen the courage of his subjects, having seen the danger of his own person, and so much blood shed about him, will be more tractable to good conditions of peace than he would have been before, and that is the reason why we do think fit to try him once more, after this battle that hath been lately fought, before it come to another battle.

"It is true that this may seem a resolution contrary to that which was opened to you within these few days; but you will conceive that all great councils are subject to alter their resolutions, according as matters alter, and as the apprehensions of matters alter; for if things appear more clear and hopeful to them at one time than another, it is no dishonour for them to vary according to their appearance, judgments, and best reasons, so long as they do it with affections to the best purpose, which you may rest assured the Parliament hath done. And though we desire peace very much, yet a peace to betray religion or to betray our liberties we shall always esteem worse than war; therefore we shall put it to a very quick issue, if the king receive the petition, to make such propositions as you may see.

"First, whether you shall be secured in your religion; in your religion with a hope of reformation; such a reformation as may maintain the power of religion, and the purity of religion, as well as the name of religion; for we shall not be contented with the name, nor without a reformation that shall maintain the power of it. Next, we shall pursue the maintenance of our liberties—liberties that may not only be in laws and statutes, but liberties that may be in practice and in execution—and to take such course that you may have the effects of them in truth; for to have printed liberties, and not to have liberties in truth and reality, is but to mock the kingdom; and I hope we shall take care for that in the second place. Thirdly, we shall take care to maintain the dignity and the honour of Parliament, for that is what will be a lasting security to you in your liberty and religion. We shall take care, in the fourth place, to answer the affections of the city of London, that we will not consent to anything that shall be prejudicial to them. We will preserve them in the highest degree of honour that ever this city of London was in; and truly it is now in the highest degree of honour that ever it was, for you have carried yourselves in such a regard to the public as never any of your predecessors did before, and therefore we shall, in a peace, be as careful of you as of ourselves; and you may be assured of this, that if we have not this peace, our lives, our pains, our estates, they shall all join with you in maintaining that with the sword which we can not get in an humble way by petition. And this, I again say, we shall bring to a quick issue.

"Therefore I shall only move you, as I am commanded to do from the Parliament, that you will not think there is any fainting on our parts; that we are more cold or less affectionate to any of these good ends than heretofore we have been, but that we would compass them with more secure advantage; for if you can get these by peace, you will have great advantages by it: you will hinder foreign invasions from beyond the seas; you will quickly be able to master the rebels in Ireland; you will quickly be able to suppress the Papists that begin to rise in England; then you shall have a perpetual security that they shall never be able to hurt you more. Therefore, if we can have such a peace without further hazard and blood-shedding, we shall praise God, and esteem it as a great blessing; but if not, pray lay not down the same spirits, for we have the same hearts, and multitudes of spirits, and the kingdom inclinable to us. Where the king has been, many, to save their estates and lives, have showed themselves but men, for it was not to be thought that single counties should maintain themselves against an army; but they have hearts as they had theretofore, and no doubt but they will join with us, with more alacrity, when they see we have desired peace by all the ways we could, and cannot have it.

"We shall, by this means, satisfy our own consciences; we shall satisfy many members of Parliament that desired it might be put on this way; we shall satisfy many of the kingdom, too, that have held themselves indifferent; but when they see there is no hope of peace in such a way without blood, certainly they will stand to us for religion and liberty, which must be destroyed if we cannot secure them without war. Therefore I shall commend to you that you would not let fall any part of your contributions, for it is that which must maintain the army, nor entertain ill apprehensions of the Parliament, but go on so as you have done. The end of all, I hope, will be such that God may have all the glory, and you all the comfort!"

Two little months after, however, when war, again less successfully resumed, was not so popular, he presented himself in the same place, and requested from the same authorities a farther assessment of supply upon the citizens.

"My lord-mayor and gentlemen," he said, "we come not to tell your lordship and these worthy citizens only our wants and dangers, but we come to speak the thanks of the Parliament to you for that which you have already done; for that you have showed so much affection to the public, and that it hath produced so good effects throughout the whole kingdom. Now you have indeed an army raised, most out of this city, able to defend (with God's blessing) the religion and liberty of the kingdom, if it may be upheld! And we come not only to give you thanks for that which you have done, but to stir you up to join with us in giving thanks to God that hath given such a blessing to our endeavours, that when, by letters sent into all parts almost, our enemies did presume beforehand to triumph in the ruin and plundering of this city, God prevented it, and hath kept you safe; kept your houses, your walls, your suburbs, safe from that that was intended against you! And now, truly, as we have sought for this blessing by fasting and by prayer, so it is fit that we should testify our thanksgiving for it; and this is a necessary part of our errand which we are sent about. And that we may be serviceable to God's providence still, as he hath stirred up your hearts to do so much already, so that he would stir you up still to continue to do that which is fit to be done for the future, and that you will do it in such a way as may be most pleasing to yourselves.

"We come not hither, that, by any consent here in public, you should bind yourselves in particular, but we come to let you know the dangers of the kingdom, with the sense the Parliament hath of it, and of the city especially, that you may not lose that which hath been already done, but that you may go on still cheerfully to do the full work. And we come to tell you that the Parliament doth intend the burden shall not lie upon you that are well affected and come in voluntarily, but that they have thought upon a way, and have begun it already, and I hope, within two or three days at the most, it shall be published to you, that all that are indisposed shall be forced to do that which, out of readiness and cheerfulness to the public good, they will not do of themselves. Neither limit we it to the city and suburbs, but we are in a course to draw in all the counties of the kingdom, that as the burden is universal, so the aid may be universal. These are the thoughts of the Parliament.

"If it please God to bless your forces that are already raised and continued, we hope you shall not only see peace again in the kingdom, and security for your religion, but see that the burden shall lie upon those who have been the engines and actors of the mischiefs and troubles that are come upon us. They shall then recompense the charges you have been at already!

"This is the intention of the Parliament. Only for the present do somewhat! Every man, as God shall enable him, do somewhat! Thus we may meet the present necessities, and prevent the dangers that require a present subsistence and present supply of the army; without which, what is it will follow but the danger of the city, the ruin of the countries about, the stopping up of the river, which is almost taken from you, and the loss of the seacoasts! You cannot have better hearts than you have; God hath enabled many of you with purses. I hope it will be so readily disposed that we shall have a full joy in the recompense of it and of the retribution. This let us all pray to God to bring to pass."

A supply followed this speech, which is an exquisite specimen of those "wonderful popular arts" which Clarendon ascribes to Pym. It would, indeed, be difficult to imagine any thing better adapted to the occasion—so forcible, yet worded with such nice subtlety, as the passages which have just been quoted. Meanwhile the king, heated with his imagined successes, addressed a paper to the city of London in the highest style of a conqueror. Their recent actions he represented herein as outrages of so tremendous a nature that they called down the immediate vengeance of God, unless the city would purge itself of guilt by delivering up to him their pretended lord-mayor and other leaders, whom he had particularly marked as traitors in his proclamations;* he graciously offered pardon to the rest, and added that he would give them the honour of his presence when they should put themselves in a proper posture to receive him; with a warning that whosoever should henceforward contribute, by the payment of tonnage and poundage, or any other tax, on what pretence or authority soever, to the maintenance of the army under the Earl of Essex, must expect the severest punishment the law could inflict. He concluded with an express command that this his manifesto should be read out publicly in the city of London. This command, at least, was obeyed. The Parliament was communicated with, and a committee of both Houses were present when it was read.

"Methinks I see him," says Mr. Godwin, in reference to this period, "methinks I see Charles, in his principal entrance into London, surrounded by all his minions and myrmidons, his horse's hoofs wet with his country's blood."

But this was not to be while Pym lived. The king's manifesto was read, and a deep silence followed, when "Mr. Pym, that worthy member of the House of Commons and patriot of his country," as Peter Cole styles him in his edition of the speech, rose and commented, elaborately, but with singular force and clearness, on the various allegations of Charles. He acknowledged the generous and magnanimous conduct of the city, and their steady adherence to the principles of liberty; he avowed that all those actions with which they had been reproached by the king had been done in obedience to the commands of Parliament; he vindicated those commands, and showed that the king's answer was a libel, stuffed with scandalous, injurious aspersions on the two respectable bodies of Parliament and city; as to the king's assertion that he was driven by tumults out of the city, Pym remembered the company of the king going, the day after his attempt to seize the members, into the city without a guard, and his residing divers days at Whitehall, Hampton Court, and Windsor, without any attempt which could give him apprehension of fear. On Charles's accusation against the two Houses of destroying the property of the subject by taking away the twentieth part by an arbitrary power, Pym observed that there was little reason for this objection on his majesty's behalf, when it was well known that from the subjects who were within the power of his army he did take the full yearly value of their lands, and in some cases more; that not only particular houses, but whole towns, had been plundered by command and design; and that by proclamations men were declared to forfeit all their estates because they would not obey arbitrary commands. To the king's declaration that he expected to be kept from tumults and affronts, Pym observed, that his majesty's expressions, in his answer, tending to the making a division in the city, and to the raising a party which might make disturbances in the orderly government now established in it, would be more prejudicial to his quiet abode in London than any thing which had ever been acted by the houses of Parliament, or the present governors of the city. In conclusion, as to the threatening part of the matter, Pym added, with a stern indifference, that the danger arising from these ill councils which influenced the king could not be kept off but by the power of arms; and that the Lords and Commons were so far from being frightened by his menaces, that they had just declared farther contribution towards the maintenance of the army; that they hoped for the continuance of the good affections of the city, and indeed desired that they would add at once some farther contributions towards the support of the forces which were now in existence for all their safeties.

* These were Ven, Foulke, and Mainwaring.

The effect of this speech is strikingly described by the reporter. "At the end of every period the applause was so great that he was fain to rest till silence was again made; and at last (the company ready to be dissolved), after some pause and consultation with the committee of Lords and Commons then present, silence being made, he closed all with the words following: 'Worthy citizens, you have understood the sense of both houses of Parliament concerning my lord-mayor here, and those worthy members of your city that are demanded; you have heard the Parliament declare that they will protect them in that which they have done by direction of both Houses; and they expect that you should express it yourselves likewise, that if any violence be offered to them, you will secure and defend them with your uttermost force; and you shall always find that this protection of the Parliament shall not only extend to these, but to all others that have done any thing by their command;' which words were no sooner uttered, but the citizens, with one joint harmony of minds and voices, gave such an acclamation as would have drowned all the former, if they had been then breathing; which, after a long continuance, resolved itself into this more articulate and distinct voice, 'We will live and die with them! We will live and die with them!' and the like. So that," concludes Mr. Peter Coles, "in the managing of this day's work, God was so pleased to manifest himself, that the well affected went away, not strengthened only, but rejoicing; and the malignants (as they have been called), some convinced, others silenced, many ashamed, it fully appearing how little power they had to answer their desires of doing mischief. Instead of dividing the city, the city were more exceedingly united; instead of a dissipation, thousands were unexpectedly brought, as it were, into an unthought-of association, to live and die in the defence of those zealous and honourable assertors of their peace and liberties, all which we may sum up in that triumph of the man of God, 'In the thing wherein they dealt proudly, God was above them.'"

Proud indeed was Pym's bearing through these great extremities of the cause, which, however, now threatened to deepen daily. Sir William Waller suffered a serious check from his old friend Sir Ralph Hopton, and was subsequently completely routed by Wilmot. Exeter and Bristol at about the same time surrendered to the king. The London people began to murmur, and the danger was imminent indeed.

Again Pym saved the Commonwealth. The formidable conspiracy against the Parliament, and the life of Pym, its principal member, known by the name of Waller's Plot, was now discovered by the unwearied and unwinking vigilance of the patriot, and the feeling produced by its disclosure reanimated the sympathies of the people. The plot had been got up by Edmund Waller the poet, in concert with two associates named Challoner and Tomkins. The object was to seize the persons of Pym and the leading members of the Commons, and deliver up the city to the king. The proceedings were nearly ripe, when, says Clarendon, "a servant of Mr. Tomkins, who had often cursorily overheard his master and Mr. Waller discourse of the argument, placed himself behind a hanging at a time they were together, and there, whilst either of them discoursed the language and opinion of the company they kept, overheard enough to make him believe his information and discovery would make him welcome to those whom he thought concerned, and so went to Mr. Pym, and acquainted him with all he had heard. The time when Mr. Pym was made acquainted with it is not known, but the circumstances of the publishing it were such as filled all men with apprehensions. It was on Wednesday the thirty-first of May, their solemn fast-day, when, being all at their sermon in St. Margaret's Church at Westminster, according to their custom, a letter or message is brought privately to Mr. Pym, who thereupon, with some of the most active members, rise from their seats, and, after a little whispering together, remove out of the church. This could not but exceedingly affect those who stayed behind. Immediately they sent guards to all the prisons, as Lambeth House, Ely House, and such places where their malignants were in custody, with directions 'to search the prisoners,' and some other places which they thought fit should be suspected. After the sermons were ended the Houses met, and were only told 'that letters were intercepted going to the king and the court at Oxford that expressed some notable conspiracy in hand to deliver up the Parliament and the city into the hands of the Cavaliers, and that the time for the execution of it drew very near.' Hereupon a committee was appointed 'to examine all persons they thought fit, and to apprehend some nominated at that time;' and the same night the committee apprehended Mr. Waller and Mr. Tomkins, and the next day such others as they thought fit.*

The utmost available use was made of this discovery by Pym, and the most striking was the introduction of a vow against this or any similar design, which, though nominally optional, served all the purposes of a test. Tomkins and Challoner were tried and executed, and died acknowledging the justice of their punishment. Waller had disclosed so much, that on the payment of a fine of £10,000 and a year's imprisonment, he was suffered to carry his ignominy to France. The whole course and management of the plot, and its discovery, were enlarged on in the city with Pym's usual adroitness and popular power, and a copy of the elaborate speech he delivered at the Guildhall, "corrected by his own hand," will be found in the Appendix.*

* Hist., vol. iv., p. 66, 67. In No. 112 of King's Pamphlets, part xiv., p. 200, is a preposterous account of this plot, stating that it was merely a "commission issued by Charles against traitors," and that certain members of the House of Commons, assuming themselves to be the traitors, having found in whose hands the commission was, "on Wednesday, May the 31st, when the rest of their body were at church to observe the fast, some fifty of them went into the House of Commons, and delegated the whole power of the House to Master Pym, Master Glyn, Mr. St. John, Sir Harry Vane the younger, and Sir Gilbert Gerard; who, raising the trained bands, seized upon such persons as they thought were likely to cross their purposes, and filled the town with all the noise and clamour before remembered," &c., &c. The only effect of this is to implicate the king more deeply in the treachery.

Still the king's successes continued, and still the inadequacy and slackness of Essex became more and more apparent. A proclamation appeared from Charles, promising free pardon to all, with some few exceptions,† on the laying down of arms. The exceptions included Pym and Hampden as principal traitors. Some of the moderate Presbyterians‡ in the House showed signs of wincing. The answer of Pym was one of the boldest and most decisive measures yet adopted. He carried up an impeachment against the queen,§ which Hollis has commemorated in his memoirs as the first great victory gained by the Independents over the Presbyterians. It is clear to me that the great patriot resorted to this as a stroke of immediate policy alone, and without any view to serious measures against Henrietta. (I am equally certain that, had Pym survived, poor feeble Laud would not have died upon the scaffold.) Any hope of compromise with the House of Commons, as a body, after the queen's impeachment, was utterly hopeless.

The abuses poured out from Oxford upon Pym were commensurate with these services to the "good old cause." "Mercurius Aulicus" of March the 8th, 1643, observes: "It was carried from London by letters of the 2d of March, that in the House of Commons, the day before, there had been a great adoe about his majestie's proclamation prohibiting the association projected and agreed upon by them* betweene the counties of Kent, Surrey, Sussex, and Hampshire, which was inveighed against with all possible acrimony by Mr. Pym, who spake against it no lesse than seven times, and that with so much violence and passion that hee was faine to take breath." Some passages follow that may not with propriety be quoted, concerning the "hums and plaudites" bestowed upon "this Mr. Pym." The same respectable journal of a few weeks later, after describing the shift to which the Commons had been put for want of money, and a warrant circulated by Lady Waller to arrest the deserters from her husband's army, proceeds thus: "This warrant a gentleman of goode credit saw this weeke, which you must suppose was drawn up at the honourable she-committee, which is ever full of feares and sadnesse lest that goode fat man, Master John Pym, should lose his vote by going to Master Hampden upon some earnest businesse." "He tells us," rejoins Needham to this in the "Mercurius Britannicus," "he tells us of our she-committee again. Aulicus, let our ladies alone; they love not to be handled like yours at Oxford," Pym's change of residence has the honour of mention in a succeeding "Aulicus": "It is signified in the same letters that the committee for disposing of delinquent estates have appointed the Earle of Derby's house in Westminster to bee a dwelling for Pym, with especial directions that hee bee not too modest or reserved in the use thereof; and that others of the houses and householde staffe about the Tower are like to bee disposed by the same authoritie (to whose share, think you, will Whitehall fall in this distribution?)." On the other hand, an opposition journal states a very handsome tribute to the patriot, as paid by the court at Oxford: "It is credibly affirmed that the Cavaliers do usually drink this wicked and blasphemous health, viz., '1. A health to his majestie, by whom we live, move, and have our being. 2. A health to the confusion of Pym, his God, and his gospel.'" One extract more from the Oxford court journal: "From London we are certified that one Master Carleton hath so frequently feasted the worthy members, one whereof was Master Pym (who, the world knowes, is a man of quick dispatch), that they have eaten the said Carleton into a prettie broken fortune, and rendered him fit to bee a new common councilman; but, to make him whole againe, the worthies have preferred him to a captain's place in his excellencie's army, where, if hee thrive apace, hee may rise to bee as high as Mainwaring or Ven, at least as great as the Earle of Essex."

Nor was this the only kind of attack now made upon the patriot. Clarendon boldly affirms "that his power of doing shrewd turns was extraordinary, and no less in doing good offices for particular persons; and that he did preserve many from censure who were under the severe displeasure of the Houses, and looked

* Appendix A.

† See Parl. Hist., vol. xii., p. 311, 312.

‡ By the aid of this very party, Pym was foiled more than once in a moderate and generous policy as to the conduct of the war. From one of the newspapers of a few months before, for instance, I take the following: "It was advertised from London, that upon Wednesday, May 17, at the recommendation of the Earle of Essex, a motion was made in the House of Commons that the Countesse of Rivers might have her coach-horses restored, which had before beene taken from her by some of the horse-takers for the two houses of Parliament; which, though it was a very easie courtesie, considering that she had beene rifled by them (as themselves confessed) to the value of £40,000, and that it was proposed by Master Pym (no meane man, I hope), would by no means passe."

§ "A message being sent up from the lower House to desire the Lords to sit a while, for they had a matter of great importance to communicate to them; soon after came up Mr. Pym to acquaint their lordships that the Commons had discharged their consciences by the following vote, which they had passed: 'That the queen had levied war against the Parliament and kingdom; and having discharged their consciences, they think it fit to discharge their duty too; and said, he was commanded by the House of Commons assembled in Parliament, in the name of themselves, and of all the commons of England, to accuse and impeach, and he did accordingly now accuse and impeach, Henrietta Maria, queen of England, of high treason. And they desired their lordships to issue forth proclamations to summon her to appear before them, and receive a trial and due sentence for the same. It is observable that these votes were carried in the House of Commons nem. con. The queen had just before met the king at Edge Hill with a re-enforcement of 3000 foot, 30 troops of horse and dragons, and six pieces of cannon, besides great store of other warlike ammunition, which made the House of Commons so exasperated against her."—Parl. Hist., vol. xii., p. 265.

* By Hampden and Pym. See Life of Hampden, post, p. 252.

upon as eminent delinquents; and the quality of many of them made it believed that he had sold that protection for valuable considerations." This latter deduction may be supposed to rest on the same authority to which Lord Clarendon has confessed himself indebted for other slanders against the patriot—that of "an obscure person or two."* The incident, without the deduction, would have better deserved mention, as an evidence of Pym's generosity and kindness; but the wonder would have been, if such a forward and eminent person as Pym, in times of such exasperation, had escaped these fiercest slanders. They passed unnoticed by himself; but the Commons themselves interfered at last. When Sir John Hotham, for instance, brought to the bar of the House for desertion to the king, was asked "whether he knew of any members of that House, or of the Lords, that had conveyed any treasure beyond seas, he answered, he knew of none, if he were to die that instant. And being again asked whether he knew that Mr. Pym had conveyed any treasure in like manner, with some astonishment he asked if that question was asked him in earnest; protested he knew nothing of it, and that he had never reported any such thing." I will quote the sequel of this, as it is given in the Parliamentary History.† "In the course of these examinations, the reader may observe that Mr. Pym is mentioned as charged with some indirect practices. To do justice to that great man, on the same day, Sir Edward Bainton, a member of the House of Commons, was sent for, charged with saying that the Lord Say and Mr. Pym had betrayed the west and north; and being demanded whether he had spoke those words charged upon him, answered, he did not speak them as they were there laid down. Being then demanded what he had spoken to that purpose, answered that he had learned, since he had sat here, that he ought not to speak any thing here that reflected to the prejudice of another member, and therefore desired to be excused, unless he were enjoined and commanded. Whereupon he was enjoined to speak the whole truth; and then he said that he did not say that Mr. Pym had betrayed the west, but that he had betrayed his county, which he did by being a means of detaining him in prison who only was able to maintain and preserve that county till the said county was quite lost, notwithstanding many orders made for his bringing up. As for betraying the north, he knew nothing more of that than he had heard in the House, which sounded bad enough, viz., that the offer of the Lord Savile and Sir William Savile to deliver up to the Parliament's forces York and that whole county, if they might not be prejudiced in their persons and estates, was prevented; adding, that he had heard it said and affirmed, with solemn and deep oaths and protestations, that the Lord Cottington had treated with his majesty for the pardon of the Lord Say and Mr. Pym, and that, if they had had the preferments they expected, we had not been brought to the condition we now are in. Being demanded from whom he heard this, answered, it was from the Lord Grandison's brother, Lieutenant-colonel Brett, and Sergeant-major Juques, all officers in the king's army, and prisoners with him at Gloucester. Mr. Pym, in answer to the charge, protested solemnly that he never had intercourse with the Lord Cottington, by one means or other, since the difference between the king and Parliament: that he never received but two messages from him since this Parliament began; the one was by Sir Arthur Ingram, long before he died; the other by Sir Benjamin Rudyard. Upon the whole, the Commons voted the charge laid upon Mr. Pym by Sir Edward Bainton to be false and scandalous, and that the said Sir Edward should be forthwith sent to the Tower, there to remain a prisoner during the pleasure of the House."

Increasing in malignity, however, Pym's slanderers now fixed upon his religious faith and personal relation to the king, and levelled such monstrous charges against him in regard to both, that he thought it necessary at last to issue a "declaration and vindication," which will be found at length in the Appendix.* In this, with great modesty of language and feeling, he compares his fate with that of "the orator and patriot of his country, Cicero." "I will not," he says, "be so arrogant as to parallel myself to that worthy; yet my case, if we may compare lesser things with great, hath to his a very near resemblance; the reason I am so much maligned and reproached by ill-affected persons being, because I have been forward in advancing the affairs of the kingdom, and have been taken notice of for that forwardness; they, out of their malice, converting that to a vice which, without boast be it spoken, I esteem my greatest virtue." He concluded with affirming his continued attachment to a form of limited and constitutional monarchy in England. Such a monarchy,† had his life and that of Hampden been spared, would, in all probability, have resulted from the war; and the settlement of its conditions, and of the true extent of the power and authority of the people, would doubtless have put to shame the feeble and uncertain settlement of 1688. But this hope was already vain.

News of Hampden's death had reached London, and Pym felt himself sinking under a gradual and wearing illness. His labours had overtasked his strength. Still he appeared in the House of Commons, however, and had still one of the greatest achievements of his life to perform.‡

* Appendix E.

† Shortly before the death of Pym, the elector-palatine sent letters to the Parliament, declaring his satisfaction with the covenant, and bemoaning the conduct of his brother, Prince Rupert, in fighting against the legislative body. This very constitutional allegiance obtained, eventually, for the elector, a pension from the Parliament, more than equivalent to that which he had been accustomed to receive from the king. The elector himself arrived in England just after Pym's decease. Is it possible that something more than this grant, frustrated by the patriot's death, had been secretly in agitation, and that Pym had originally contemplated the introduction of this electoral prince as the founder of a new royal dynasty, if it became necessary to depose Charles I.?

‡ In a recent compilation, entitled "Memoirs of Selden," Pym receives casual mention, at this period, as having singular influence. "Mr. Baillie," says the compiler, "gives this instance of the popularity of Mr. Pym in 1643: 'On Wednesday, Mr. Pym was carried from his house to Westminster on the shoulders of the chief men in the lower House, all the House going in procession before him.'"

* See the text restored in Clarendon, vol. i., p. 493.

† Parl. Hist., vol. xii., p. 379.

Sanguine hopes prevailed at Oxford that the way to London was open at last. Waller was routed in the west, and the strong places were in Charles's hands. Gainsborough was recaptured, and Hull in imminent danger. The queen joined the king with a re-enforcement, and London was without an army or fortifications for its defence. But Pym was there! The Mercurius Aulicus had heard of his illness, however, and took occasion to throw out the following significant hint: "We are heare very glad to heare that the French ambassadour is most certainly arrived, and doth now reside at Sommerset House; the king and queen doe both desire that he may be the happy meanes to settle peace in this kingdome, and that Pym, if he be sicke, for so we are certifie by letters, may live to see the king againe, and, by asking God forgiveness, may die in his bed: a mercy which he does not deserve." This perfidious suggestion availed nothing. Pym was not yet so ill but that he retained his intellect, and, with that, his power; and now he used them both, with a last and memorable effect, against the king.

Essex, despairing, or willing to compromise, wrote to the House of Lords,* advising accommodation. A petition was voted accordingly, and was taken into consideration by the Commons after a vehement struggle; but ultimately, by the unparalleled efforts of Pym and St. John, a majority of two was obtained against it. All the pulpits of London were brought into requisition, and the people wrought to the last pitch of political and religious enthusiasm. Yet the danger of the defenceless state of the capital remained unprovided against, and the discontent of Essex himself threatened the worst of dangers. Then it was that Pym nobly discharged himself of his last duty to the Commonwealth, and, oppressed with illness as he was, presented himself, with St. John, at the tent of Essex, and there, as Clarendon says,†

Poor Mr. Baillie little thought the use his description of the patriot's funeral would be put to! It was, alas! the dead body of Pym thus carried by his old friends to its last resting-place, in testimony of their affectionate respect.

* Many of the lords, originally left in the executive, were now sighing once more for the court, and several unseemly exhibitions had already taken place between them and the more resolute members of the Commons. The following is from a curious pamphlet of the time: "The committee for the House of Commons, which came from Oxford, made a relation to the House of his majestie's answer, which was much commended and extolled by all moderate men, and thought to bee both full and satisfactorie; but that upon the other side it was so farre from pleasing the engaged malignant partie, that Master Martyn said expressly yt it was rather to bee scorned than answered; and finally, that at a conference the same day betwixt the Houses for giving some answer to his majestie's messages, in the painted chamber, the Earle of Northumberland, standing by the fire, asked Master Martyn (whom he found there) why hee brake open certaine letters which were sent to him to Oxford (for such a saucy trick had been put upon him), and finding little reason for it in his reply, gave him a bastinado with his cane, and a blow with his fist; whereupon Martyn, getting neare him, caught him by the collar of his doublet, or, as some say, by his George, which occasioned divers of the standers-by to draw their swords, amongst whom the Earle of Pembroke is said to bee one, and Master Pym another. And it was certified, with all, that the quarrell is so much resented, that the Commons have voted it to bee a breach of their privilege, and the Lords of theirs."

† "Mr. Pym," he observes, "always opposed all overtures of peace and accommodation; and when the Earle of Essex was disposed, the last summer, by those lords, to an inclination towards a treaty, as is before remembered, Mr. Pym's power and dexterity wholly changed him, and wrought him to that temper which he afterward swerved by "his power and dexterity, wholly changed him, and wrought him to that temper which he afterward swerved not from." In other words, he assured Essex of the support and confidence of the House, opened his eyes to the king's particular resentments and personal character, and confirmed him in his duty. It has been truly said, in reference to this self-possessed sagacity and courage, that "men actuated by either extreme of violent temper or vulgar prudence would have removed from the command a general whom they had reason to distrust." Pym's nobler policy held together the army without a flaw, and, from that hour, the tide of fortune gradually turned.

He did not live to see this, but the wise consciousness of what he had done was consolation sufficient for such a mind. The hand of death was now upon him. Some disgraceful riots broke out at this time, in consequence of the wants and deprivations incident to the war; and, according to Rushworth, a great multitude of the wives of substantial citizens, assisted by a large body of men in women's clothes, came to the House of Commons with a petition for peace, and blocked up the door for two hours. "Give us the traitor Pym," they cried, "that we may tear him in pieces! Give us the dog Pym!" but a troop of horse dispersed them. The traitor or the patriot Pym—the words may be probably thought synonymous here—was then lying on his deathbed.

The House of Commons, anxious to give their great leader one proof of confidence more, had conferred on him, in November, the all-important office of lieutenant-general of the ordinance of the kingdom; but from this moment he sank rapidly. With gloating expectation, his death was waited for by the Royalists. "From London we hear that Pym is crawling to his grave as fast as he can," writes Trevor to the Marquess of Ormonde, in a letter dated from Oxford in December.* A yet more striking evidence of this feeling is supplied in the following extract from the Parliament Scout, published some days before: "We have given the enemy a great and notable defeat this week, if our news hold true; for whereas they have for many weeks expected the death of Master Pym, and horses have stood ready in several stables, and almost eaten out their heads, for those that were to go with the news to Oxford, and had promise of great reward and knighthood that brought it first, now he is like to recover, and to sit in the House of Commons again, to facilitate business there, and see an end of the miseries of England; and this will trouble the other party more, by far, than he is mending, than the rout that Sir William Waller gave to Sir Ralph Hopton on Tuesday last."

Very vain was this hope; for on the 8th of December, 1643, Pym died at Derby House. An account of the last moments of his sickness has been left by one who knew him intimately through life, and attended his deathbed. From that we learn that he maintained the same "evenness of spirit which he had in the time not from. He was wonderfully solicitous for the Scots coming to their assistance, though his indisposition of body was so great that it might well have made another impression on his mind."—History, vol. iv., p. 440, 441.

* Carte's Letters, vol. i., p. 26.

† Dr. Marshall, in his funeral sermon, 1644.

of his health, professing to myself that it was to him a most indifferent thing to live or die: if he lived, he would do what service he could; if he died, he should go to that God whom he had served, and who would carry on his work by some others; and to others he said, that if his life and death were put into a balance, he would not willingly cast in one dram to turn the balance either way. This was his temper all the time of his sickness." The same interesting memorial tells us that "such of his family or friends who endeavoured to be near him (lest he should faint away in his weakness), have overheard him importunately pray for the king's majesty and his posterity, for the Parliament and the public cause, for himself begging nothing. And a little before his end, having recovered out of a swoon, seeing his friends weeping around him, he cheerfully told them: 'he had looked death in the face, and knew, and therefore feared not, the worst it could do, assuring them that his heart was filled with more comfort and joy which he felt from God than his tongue was able to utter;' and (whilst a reverend minister was at prayer with him) he quietly slept with his God." After reading this calm and affecting account of the last moments of this immortal advocate of civil and religious freedom, no one will feel disposed to deny the justness of that prophecy in which the good and amiable Baxter has indulged in translating Pym into heaven: "Surely" (I quote from the "Saint's Everlasting Rest" of that good man), "surely Pym is now a member of a more knowing, unerring, well-ordered, right-aiming, self-denying, unanimous, honourable, triumphant senate than that from whence he was taken!"

On the news of Pym's death,* say the authors of the Parliamentary History, "the House of Commons showed a respect to his memory that is without precedent in the whole course of these inquiries; for we find in the journals 'that a committee there named was appointed to consider of the estate of Mr. Pym, deceased, and to offer what they think fit to be done in consideration of it to the House; likewise to take care to prepare a monument for him at the charge of the Commonwealth.' It was also ordered 'that the body of Mr. Pym be interred in Westminster Abbey, without any charge for breaking open the ground there; and that the speaker, with the whole House, do accompany his body to the interment.' †"

* Welcome news, of course, at Oxford. I extract from The Kingdom's Weekly Post, "with his packet of letters publishing his message to the city and country." "It is everywhere remarkably observed concerning the taking of Alton (the particulars whereof are suffi commund to the kingdom already, our Post not using to relate what hath bene printed before), that the very same day there was a great feast at Oxford; and great preparations made for bonfires that night, which was done accordingly. The reason was, for that they heard that Master Pym was dead; and it was observed that many Cavaliers at Oxford drank that day the confusion of the Roundheads, and particularly Sir William Waller."

† Parl. Hist., vol. xii., p. 462. From the "Kingdom's Weekly Intelligencer" I take the following: "The Parliament so highly honours the memorie of Master Pym, that they have ordered a monument to bee erected in the Abbey at Westminster, where hee is to bee interred; and the House of Commons have appointed themselves to accompanie the corpse to the grave, so highly doe they value and esteeme the merits and deservings of so good, so excellent a patriot and Commonwealth's man. They have also taken

On the 15th of December, what remained of the great patriot "was buried," says Clarendon,* "with wonderful pomp and magnificence, in that place where the bones of our English kings and princes are committed to their rest." The body, followed by Charles and Alexander Pym, was carried from Derby House to Westminster Abbey on the shoulders of the ten chief gentlemen of the House of Commons, in the deepest mourning: Denzil Hollis, Sir Arthur Hazlerig, Sir Henry Vane the younger, Oliver Saint John, Strode, Sir Gilbert Gerard, Sir John Clotworthy, Sir Nevil Poole, Sir John Wray, and Mr. Knightley; "and was accompanied" (says the authority I quote, the 'Perfect Diurnall' of the following week) "by both houses of Lords and Commons in Parliament, all in mourning, by the Assembly of Divines, by many other gentlemen of quality, and with two heralds of armes before the corpse bearing his crest. His funeral sermon was made by Mr. Marshall, who took his text out of the 7th of Micah, part of the first and second verses, in these words: 'Wo is me, for the good man hath perished out of the earth.'"

A few extracts from this noble and affecting sermon may fitly close this attempt to do tardy justice to the life and memory of Pym.†

order, in regard Master Pym hath not onely spent his life in the service of the kingdom, but lost his estate, that a speciall care bee taken for a subsistence for his sons, who are likewise in the service of the Parliament and kingdom; it being a thing very considerable and remarkable, that the father's care was so totally taken up for the good of the publike, that hee even neglected a necessario care to provide for his children."

* I may here subjoin one or two points from this writer's character of Pym. The main part of it has already been noticed in these pages. "No man had more to answer for the miseries of the kingdom, or had his hand or head deeper in their contrivance. And yet, I believe, they grew much higher, even in his life, than he designed. . . Besides the exact knowledge of the forms and orders of Parliament, which few men had, he had a very comely and grave way of expressing himself, with great volubility of words, natural and proper; and understood the temper and affections of the kingdom as well as any man; and had observed the errors and mistakes in government; and knew well how to make them appear greater than they were. . . He seemed to all men to have the greatest influence upon the House of Commons of any man; and, in truth, I think he was the most popular man, and the most able to do hurt, that hath lived in any time."

† A volume might be filled with the various characters of the patriot with which the various publications now, and for many weeks after, teemed. I will only quote, as a specimen, an "Elegie" which appeared "in deep mourning" in the Mercurius Britannicus.

"No immature nor sullen fate
Did his immortal soule translate;
Hee passed gravely hence, even Kept his old pace, from earth to heaven!
Hee had a soule did always stand
Open for businessse, like his hande.
Hee took in so much, I could call Him more than individual;
And so much businessse waited by,
Would scarcely give him leave to die.
Hee knew the bounds, and every thing
Betwixt the people and the king;
Hee could the just proportions draw
Betwixt prerogative and law;
Hee lived a patriot here so late,
Hee knew each syllable of state,
That had our charters all bene gone,
In him we had them every one.
Hee durst bee good, and at that time
When innocence was half a crime.
Hee had seene death before hee went,
Once had it as a token sent;
Hee surfeited on state affaires,
Did'd on a pleurisie of caires;
Nor doth hee nowe his mourners lacke,
We have few soules but goe in blacke,

"Our Parliament is weakened," said this eloquent and earnest preacher, "our armies wasted, our treasure exhausted, our enemies increased; and of those few able hearts, heades, and handes who abode faithfull to this great cause and worke in hande, it might even stab us to the very heart to thinke how many of them the Lord hath even snatcht away, in the midst of their worke, and our greatest neede! That excellent-spirited lord, the Lord Brooke; that rare man, Master John Hampden; that true-hearted Nathaniel, Master Arthur Goodwin (pardon me, I beseeche you, though I mention them amongst these friends, who cannot thinke of them without bitterness)—'How are these mighty men fallen in the midst of the battell, and the weapons of warre perished! the beautie of our Israel is slaine in the high places!' . . . And now we meete to lament the fall of this choice and excellent man, in whose death the Almighty testifies against us, and even fills us with gall and worm-woode. I knowe you come hither to mourne; so fully prepared for it, that although I am but a dull oratour to move passion, I may serve well enough to drawe out those teares wherewith your hearts and eyes are so big and full. There is no neede to call for the 'mourning women, that they may come, and for cunning women, that they may take up a wailing, to helpe your eyes to runne downe with teares, and your eyelids to gush out with waters;' the very looking downe upon this beere, and the naming of the man whose corpes are here placed, and a very little speech of his worth, and our miserable losse, is enough to make this assembly, like Rachel, not onely to lift up a voice of mourning, but even to refuse to bee comforted. . . . I am called to speake of a man so eminent and excellent, so wise and gracious, so goode and usefull, whose workes so praise him in every gate, that if I should altogether holde my tongue, the children and babes (I had almost said, the stones) would speake: upon whose herse could I scatter the sweetest flowers, the highest expressions of rhetorike and eloquence, you would thinke I fell short of his worth; you would say, this very name, JOHN PYM, expresseth more than all my words could doe. Should I say of him, as they of Titus, that hee was 'amor et deliciae generis humani;' should I say of his death, as once the Sicilians upon the Grecians' departure, 'Totum ver periit ex anno Siciliano;' should I say hee was not onely as one of David's thirtie worthies, but one of the three, one of the first three, even the first and chiefe of them, the Tachmonite who sate in the seat; should I say our whole lande groaneth at his death, as the earth at the fall of a great mountaine, I might doe it without envie in this assembly."

"I shall forbear," Doctor Marshall continued, "to speake any thing of his family, education, naturall endowments; his cleare understanding, quick apprehension, singular dexteritie in dispatch of businesse; his other morall eminences, in his justice, patience, temperance, sobrietie, chastitie, liberalitie, hospitalitie; his extreame humanitie, affabilitie, curtesie, chearfulness of spirit in every condition; and (as a just reward and sweet just fruit of all these) the high and deare esteeme and respect which hee had purchased in the hearts of all men of every ranke who were acquainted with him, such onely excepted of whom to bee loved and well reported is scarce compatible with true vertue. All men who knew him either lov'd or hated him in extremitie: such as were goode, extremely delighted in him, as taken in a sweet captivitie with his matchlesse worth; the bad as much hated him, out of their antipathy against it. . . . His excellent, usefull spirit was accompanied with three admirable properties, wherein hee excelled all that ever I knew, and most that ever I read of. First, such singleness of heart, that no by-respect could any whit sway him; no respect of any friend: hee regarded them in their due place, but hee knew neither brother, kinsman, nor friend, superiour nor inferiour, when they stood in the way to hinder his pursuit of the publike goode—'magis amica respublica;' and hee used to say, 'Such a one is my entire friend, to whom I am much obliged; but I must not pay my private debts out of the publike stock.' Yea, no self-respect, no private ends of his owne or family, were in any degree regarded, but himselfe and his were wholly swallowed up in the care of the publike safetie; insomuch that when friends have often put him in mind of his family and posteritie, and prest him, that although hee regarded not himselfe, yet hee ought to provide that it might bee well with his family (a thing which they thought hee might easily procure), his ordinary answer was, 'If it went well with the publike, his family was well enough.' Secondly, such constancy and resolution, that no feare of danger or hope of reward could at any time so much as unsettle him. How often was his life in danger? What a world of threats and menaces have beene sent him from time to time? Yet I challenge the man that ever saw him shaken by any of them, or thereby diverted from, or retarded in, his right way of advancing the publike goode. Nor could the offers of the greatest promotions (which England could afford) in any way bee a block in his way: in that hee was as another Moses (th' only man whom God went about to bribe), who desired that hee and his might never swim, if the cause of God and his people did ever sinke; his spirit was not so low as to let the whole world prevaile with him so farre as to hinder his worke, much lesse to bee his wages. Thirdly, such unweariableness, that from three of the clock in the morning to the evening, and from evening to midnight, this was his constant employment (except onely the time of his drawing nigh to God), to bee some way or other helpfull towards the publike goode, burning out his candle to give light to others. Who knowes not all this to bee true who knew this man's conversation? Not onely since the time of this Parliament, but for many yeares together, hath hee beene a great pillar to up-

And for his sake have nowe put on
A solemne meditation.
Teares are too narrow droppes for him,
And private sighes too strait for Pym;
None can completely Pym lament,
But something like a Parliament!
The publike sorrow of a state
Is but a grieve commensurate.
We must enact passions have,
And lawes for weeping at his grave."

hold our sinking frame; a master workman, labouring to reparaire our ruinous House; and under the weight of this worke hath the Lord permitted this rare workman to bee overthrowen."

Allusion was now made to one of the Royalist fabrications* which had assailed the great statesman's memory, and which is worth extracting, since it remains treasured up in the pages of Clarendon: "It may bee some of you expect I should confute the calumnies and reproaches which that generation of men who envied his life doe already begin to spread and set up in libells concerning his death, as that hee died raving, crying out against that cause wherein hee had bene so great an instrument; charging him to dye of that loathesome disease which that accursed Balsack, in his booke of slanders against Mr. Calvin, charged him to dye of. But I forbear to spend time needlessly, to wipe off those reproaches which I knowe none of you believe. And this will satisfy the world against such slanders, that no lesse than eight doctors of physike of unsuspected integritie, and some of them strangers to him (if not of different religion from him), purposely requested to bee present at the opening of his body; and well neare a thousand people, first and last, who came, many of them out of curiositie, and were freely permitted to see his corpse, can and doe abundantly testify the falshood and foulnesse of this report."

"Verily," concluded this fearless and virtuous divine, "when I consider how God hath followed us with breach upon breach, taken away all those worthy men I before mentioned, and all the other things wherein the Lord hath brought us low; and nowe this great blow, to follow all the rest, I am readie to call for such a mourning as that of Hadadrion in the Valley of Megiddon. But mistake me not! I doe not meane that you should mourne for him, you his deare children; you right honourable Lords and Commons, who esteeme him little lesse than a father; I meane not that you should mourne for him! his worke is done, his warfare is accomplished; hee is delivered from sin and sorrow, and from all the evils which we may feare are coming upon our selves: hee hath received at the Lord's hande a plentiful reward for all his labours. I beseeche you, let not any of you have one sad thought touching him. Nor would I have you mourne out of any such apprehension as the enemies have, and for which they rejoyce, as if our cause were not good, or wee should lose it for want of handes and heades to carry it on: NO, NO, BELOVED, THIS CAUSE MUST PROSPER; AND ALTHOUGH WEE WERE ALL DEAD, OUR ARMIES OVERTHROWN, AND EVEN OUR PARLIAMENTS DISSOLVED, THIS CAUSE MUST PREVAILE."

Alexander Pym died some short time after his father, but Charles survived him many years; and on the Restoration, though he had continued in the ranks of the Parliamentary army, was created a baronet. It may be added, that, on an investigation by the committee of the House of Commons appointed to inquire into the patriot's estate, it was found necessary not only to vote £10,000 for the settlement of the debts it was discovered to be involved in, but also to pension this son, Charles, upon the Parliament. No precedent existed for such votes as these, but the House justly decided that so specially eminent a case was not likely to have occurred before. In these proceedings, at least, the lie was peremptorily given to those slanders on the patriot's public virtue, which had represented him, some years before his death, privately amassing the public money for his own peculiar ends.

Since the early sheets of this memoir went to press, some information respecting the family and estate of the Pym has been kindly communicated to me by a gentleman who was recently connected with their native county of Somersetshire, and whose interest in the subject of these researches is another testimony to his distinguished zeal in the public cause. Mr. Leader tells me that the estate of the Pym must originally have been very extensive, but that, of the old mansion house, a large porch, with a pointed Gothic doorway and Gothic pinnacles, is all that remains to attest its splendour or picturesqueness. In addition to their estate of Brymore, which the family held, in direct issue, from the reign of Henry III. to that of Charles II., my informant acquaints me, on the authority of the present owner of Brymore (the Hon. Mr. Bouverie, Lord Radnor's brother), that they held also the estate of Woollavington in the same county, which is still occasionally called "Woollavington Pym." From a patent of baronetcy now in Mr. Bouverie's possession, it would appear, moreover, that Charles Pym's dignity was first conferred upon him in 1658 by Richard Cromwell, immediately upon the death of Oliver, and received subsequent confirmation from Charles II.

The following detailed account of the family of the Pym is kindly furnished to me by Mr. Leader, from Collinson's History of Somersetshire, under the title of the "Hundred of Cannington."

"On the west side of this parish is an ancient estate called Brymore, formerly part of the lordship of Radway above mentioned, and held from thence by the service of the tenth part of a knight's fee. Geoffrey de Bramora held it in the beginning of the reign of Henry III.; soon after which it was possessed by Odo, son of Durand de Derleigh, who conveyed the same to William Fitchet, and he to Elias Pym.

"This Elias Pym was father of several children, William, John, and Roger, his eldest son and heir, who possessed this estate 27 Edward I.

"The eldest son and successor of this Roger was of his own name, and bore on his seal a saltire between four quatrefoils. He died 23 Edward III., and was succeeded by Elias his brother; after whose death, without children, the inheritance devolved to Philip the third son, who, 50 Edward III., being then parson of Kentisbury, in Devonshire, conveyed all his right herein to Philip Pym, son of Henry his brother, and to the heirs of the said Philip.

* See Clarendon, vol. iv., p. 436. An official statement, signed by the famous Sir Theodore Mayerne, subsequently appeared, and will be found in Appendix F. Whitelocke says, after a singular mistake as to the date of the death, "it was believed that the multitude of his business and cares did so break his spirit and health that it brought his death."

"Philip Pym was dead before 1 Henry IV. He had two sons by his first wife Emmota, daughter and coheir of Alexander de Camelis, whose names were Roger and William; by his second wife he had also a son called Elias, to whom he gave several estates in Dulverton and Brumpton-Regis.

"Roger Pym, the eldest son, married Joan, daughter and coheir of John Trivet, of Sidbury in Devonshire, a younger branch of the family of Trivet of Durborough. This Roger was possessed of Brymore from the 1st year of Henry IV. to 13 Henry VI., in which last year he was succeeded by Philip, his eldest son. The coat of this Philip was a bull's head within a wreath. He was living 16 Edward IV., and had two sons, Roger, his successor, and Philip.

Roger Pym married Joan, daughter and heir of John Gilbert, of Woollavington, by Alianor, daughter and coheir of William Doddisham. He was living the last year of Edward IV., at which time he made over all his estate lying at Brymore, Woollavington, and other places, to his son Alexander;

"Which Alexander married Thomasine, daughter of William Stainings, Esq., and died 8 Henry VII. He was succeeded by Reginald Pym, his eldest son, who, by Mary, daughter of Thomas Dabridgecourt, was father of Erasmus Pym, and grandfather of the famous John Pym, Esq., member for the borough of Tavistock.

"This John, by Anna, daughter of John Hooker, Esq., was father of several children; the eldest of whom, Charles, was, on the Restoration, made a baronet, and was succeeded in his honour and estates by a son of his own name; who dying without issue, the estate fell to his sister Mary, the wife of Sir Thomas Hales, Bart., progenitor of the present Sir Philip Hales, Bart."

This was at the close of the last century. Since that period the estate of Brymore has passed, by will, from Miss Hales, the last descendant of the Pym, to Mr. Bouverie, its present possessor.

APPENDIX

TO THE LIFE OF JOHN PYM.

A.

A Discovery of the great Plot for the utter Ruine of the Citty of London and the Parliament, as it was at large made knowne by John Pym, Esq., on Thursday, being the 8th of June, 1643, at a Common Hall, and afterward corrected by his owne Hande for the Presse.

JOHN PYM, ESQ., HIS SPEECH.

MY LORD-MAJOR, and you, worthy citizens of this famous and magnificent Citty,—We are sent hither to you from the House of Commons, to make knowne to you the discovery of a great and a mischievous designe, tending not onely to the ruine and destruction of the citty and of the kingdome, but which, in those ruines, would likewise have buried religion and libertie. I might call it a strange designe, though in these late times designes of this kinde have bene very frequent, because it exceeds others in divers considerable circumstances of it—in the malice of the intention, in the subtiltie of contrivance, in extente of mischiefe, and nearnesse of execution; all which arose from the wickednesse of the authors. Two others may bee added, that is, the clearnesse of the discovery and prooffe, and the greatnesse of the deliverance proceeding from the great mercies of God.

I shall, in the opening of this designe, take this course for my owne memory and yours.

Observe, first, what was in their aymes. Secondly, the varietie of preparations. Thirdly, the degrees of proceeding. Fourthly, the maturitie and readinesse for execution.

The Parliament, the citty, and the army seeme to bee the three vitall parts of this kingdome, wherein not onely the well-being, but the very life and being of it doth consist: this mischiefe would have seized upon all these at once.

The citty should have bene put into such a combustion as to have your swordes imbrued in one another's blood; the Parliament should have bene corrupted and betrayed by their owne members; the army destroyed, if not by force, yet for want of supply and maintenance, that so they might have had an open and a clearer way to the rest, which they had in proposition, especially to that maine and supreme end, the extirpation of religion.

I shall tell you, first, out of what principles this did rise. It was from the ashes of another designe that failed—that mutinous petition which was contrived in this citty. The actors of that petition being therein disappointed, they fell presently into consultation how they might compass their orner end in another way, that is, under pretence of securing themselves by force against the ordinances of Parliament. Thus, under pretence of procuring peace, they would have made themselves masters of the citty, yea, of the whole kingdome, and they would have ruined and destroyed all those that should have interrupted them in their mischievous intentions.

The first step in their preparation was to appointe a committee that might often meete together, and consult how they might compass this wicked end. Their next was, that they might inable that committee with intelligence from both the armies, as well those on the king's side (as they call themselves, tho' we bee of the king's side indeed) as those that are raised by the Parliament; especially they were careful to understand the proceedings of Parliament, that so by the advantage of this intelligence they might the better effect that which they had in project, and finde the readiest and the nearest wayes to it. After they had thus provided for intelligence, how they might procure power and countenance to this action by some appearing authoritie of his majestie was next considered; for which purpose, they projected to get a commission from the king, whereby many of themselves, and of those that were of their owne consort, should bee established a councill of warre in London and parts adjacent, with power to raise forces, make provisions of ammunition, and of other kinde of armes, and to give authoritie for the leading and conducting of those forces, and to raise money for the maintenance of them, and, as it is express'd in the commission, for the destruction of the army under the command of Robert E. of Essex, raised by authoritie from the two houses of Parliament.

Having layd these grounds, I shall, in the next place, discover to you those that should have bene actors and agents in this businesse, their severall qualifications and relations.

The first sort was some members of the citty, whereof there were divers (you shall heare the names out of the prooffe); and the next was (in their pretence, as they gave out) members of the two houses of Parliament; and the third sort was two gentlemen, Master Waller, and a brother-in-law of his, Master Tomkins, that were to bee agents betwixt the Parliament and the citty, as they pretended; then a fourth sort was those that were to bee messengers to convey intelligence from this place to the courte at Oxford, and to other places where there should bee occasion; and the fifth and last consisted but in one man, that we yet discover, and that was the Lord of Falkland, that kept correspondence with them from the courte. These were to bee the actors in this mischievous designe.

They began then to thinke upon some other courses of very great advantage to themselves.

The first was of combination, how they might bee more closely conjoynd one to another, and how they might bee more secure from all others that were not of the same partie. And for this purpose there was devis'd a protestation of secrecy, whereby, as they were Christians, they did binde themselves to keepe one another's counsell, not to reveall that which they had knowledge of, or which they were trusted with. And the second was a warinesse in discovering the businesse to any of those who were to bee brought into the plot, though they came in amongst them to bee of them. They would not trust all of their owne body, but they took this wary and subtle course, that no man should acquainte above two in this businesse; that so, if it came to examination, it should never goe further than three by the same partie that discovered it; and then those two had the like power, that any one of them might discover it to two others, that so still it might bee confined within the number of three; then there was a special obligation (as was pretended by Mr. Waller), which hee had made to those that hee said were members of both houses of Parliament, and consenting to this plot; but that is yet but a pretence—no names or parties are knowne.

After they had provided thus for their combination and for their securitie, then, in the next place, they thought of some meanes of augmentation—how they might increase their numbers, and drawe in others to come to bee of their partie; and for this they did resolve to use all the art and subtiltie to irritate men's mindes against the Parliament. They found out those that thought themselves most heavily burdened with the taxes; they did cherish all that had any discontents about the assesment, advising them to repaire to the committee for ease, which they knew would bee difficult to obtaine, and that they, being disappointed, would bee more enraged, and the apter to joyne them in this plot.

From this care of augmentation, they went, in the next place, to finde out some meanes of discovery, that they might knowe how farre their partie did extende, who were of their side, and who were against them; and for this purpose they did devise that there should bee a survey of all the wards, nay, of all the parishes within the citty of London, the suburbs and places adjoining in every parish, to observe those that were for them, whom they called right men, and others that were against them, whom they called averse men; and then a third sort, whom they called neutralls and indifferent men; and they appointed severall persons that were trusted with this survey and enquiry to finde out these severall degrees and sorts in every parish.

Thus farre this designe seemes to bee but a worke of the brain—to consist onely in invention and subtiltie of designe; but the other steps and degrees which I shall now observe to you will make it to bee a worke of the hande, to bring it somewhat nearer to execution.

The first step that came into action and execution was, that they procur'd this commission which they had before designed, and endeavour'd to obtaine. Nowe they had obtained a commission (as I told you before) to establish certaine men, seventeen in number; their names are there expressed, and you shall heare them read to you. They were to bee a councill of warre here within the citty. These seventeen men had power to name others to themselves to the number of twenty-one, and both were to bee inabled to appointe, not onely colonells and captaines, and other inferior officers of an army, but to appointe and nominate a generall; they had power to raise men, to raise armes, ammunition, and to doe all those other things that I told you before; and to lay taxes and impositions to raise money; and to execute martiall law.

When they had gone thus farre, in the next place they did obtaine a warrant from the king, and this was to Mr.

Challoner, that hee might receive money and plate of all those that, either by voluntary contribution or loan, would furnish the king (as they called it) in this necessitie of his; and thereby the king was obliged to the repayment of it. This was obtained.

By this cometh in the list, and what was before part of the designe cometh nowe into act. The citizens that were trusted with framing of this list brought it in, except in some few parishes, under those heades of discovery that I formerly told you of; that is, in every parish, who were right, and who were indifferent and neutrall, and who were averse; and those were brought to Mr. Waller's house; and after they had delivered that list, the citizens then declared themselves that nowe they had done their part; they had discovered to them a foundation of strength, they did expect from them a foundation of countenance and authority, namely, from both houses of Parliament; and they did declare that they would proceed no further till they knew the names of those members of both houses that should joyn with them, and should undertake to countenance this business. Mr. Waller made this answer: That hee did assure them that they should have members of both Houses, both lords and commons, to joyn with them; that hee himselfe was but their mouth; that hee spoke not his owne wordes, but their wordes; that hee was but their agent, and did their worke; that they should have of the ablest, of the best, and of the greatest lords, and the greatest number—nay, that they should pick and chuse; that they could not wish for a lord whom hee doubted not but to procure them: this was the vanitie of his boasting to them to draw them on, and to incourage them in this plot. This being done nowe, and propounded by the citizens on their part, so Mr. Waller propounded from the lords divers queries, questions which had bene framed (as he said) by the lords and commons, and in their name hee did present them, that were for the removal of difficulties, of some obstructions that might hinder this worke. Those queries were delivered upon Friday was se'ennight to some of the citizens, and upon the Saturday morning (that was Saturday se'ennight) they were returned back againe with answers.

I shall now relate to you both the queries, and the answers that were returned by those of the citie.

The first querye was, What number of men there were armed? The answer was, That there were a third part well armed, and a third part with halberts, and another third part with what they could get, with that that came to hande.

The second querye was, In what places the magazines were laide? The answer to that was, At Alderman Fowks's house, at Leaden Hall, and at Guild Hall.

The third querye was, Where the rendezvous should bee? The answer was, At all the gates, at the places of the magazines, in Cheapside, in the Exchange, and at what other places the lords should thinke fit.

The fourth querye was, Where the place of retreat, if there should bee occasion? The answer was, That they had Banstead Downs, they had Blackheath in proposition, but they did deferre the conclusion of the place to the lords.

The fifth was, What colours there should bee? To this it was answered, That at every rendezvous there should bee colours.

A sixth consideration was, By what markes and tokens they should bee distinguished from others, and knowe their friends from their enemies? To that it was answered, That they should have white ribands or white tape.

Then, in the seventh place, it was asked, What strength there was within the walls, and what strength without the walls? To that it was answered, That within the walls there was, for one with them, three against them; but without the walls, for one against them there was five for them.

The eighth was, What was to bee done with the Tower? The answer was, That they could conclude nothing in that point.

The ninth was, Where the chiefe commanders dwelt? To that they made this answer: That every parish could tell what new commanders and captaines they had, and who of the militia dwelt in it.

The tenth and the last was, What time this should bee put in execution? To that the answer was, That the time was wholly left to the lords.

After these queries thus propounded and answered, Master Waller told them that hee would acquainte the lords with those answers that hee had received from them to their queries, and wished them not to bee troubled, though the lords did not yet declare themselves, for they could doe them as good service in the House.

Being proceeded thus farre, they came then to some propositions which should bee put in execution, and they were these:

First, that they would take into their custodie the king's children that were here. The second was, that they would lay hold of all those persons that they thought should bee able to stand in their way, or to give them any impediment, or at least of some considerable number of them. It is unlike that all were named; but some were named. Of the Lord's House there was named my Lord Say and my Lord Wharton, and besides, my lord-major, whom they took into their consideration, as the head of the citie. There was named of the House of Commons Sir Philip Stapleton, Master Hampden, Master Strode, and they did me the honour and the favour to name me too.

When they had taken into consideration the surprizall of these members of both Houses, they did further take into their further resolution, that with my lord-major should have bene seized all your committee of militia; they would not spare one of them. They intended further, that they would release all prisoners that had bene committed by the Parliament, that they would seize upon the magazines, and that they would make a declaration to satisfy the people.

There are no designs, bee they never so ill, but they doe put on a maske of some good; for betwixt that that is absolutely and apparently ill, there is no congruities with the will of man, and therefore the worst of evils are undertaken under a shadow and a shew of goodnesse. Thus declarations must bee set out, to make the people believe that they stood up for the preservation of religion; for the preservation of the king's prerogative, of the liberties of the subject, of the priviledges of Parliament; and of these one thousand were to bee printed; they were to bee set upon postes and gates in the most considerable and open places; and they were to bee dispersed as much as they could throw the citie against the time it should bee put in execution. This was done upon Saturday last was se'ennight, in the morning.

Then, in the next place, they thought fit to give intelligence to the court of what proceedings they had made here, and thereupon Master Hazel hee was sent to Oxford that very Saturday in the afternoon from Master Waller's house. There were two messages sent by him, for this maine designe they would not trust in writing. The first message was from Master Waller: it was, that hee should tell my Lord of Falkland that hee would give him a more full notice of the great business very speedily; the other message from Master Tomkins, and that was, that the designe was nowe come to good maturity; that they had so strong a partie in the citie, that, though it were discovered, yet they would bee able to put it in execution. They promised also to give notice to the king of the very day, and, if it were possible, of the very hour, wherein this should bee put in execution; and then they did desire, that when they had seized upon the outworks, that there might some partie of the king's army come up within fifteen miles of the citie, who, upon knowledge of their proceedings, must bee admitted into the citie. These were the four pointes upon which the message did consist, which was sent from Master Tomkins to my Lord of Falkland by Master Hazel. To both these messages my Lord of Falkland returned an answer by word of mouth. They kept themselves so closely that they durst not venture to write; but hee bid the messenger to tell Master Waller, Master Tomkins, and Master Hampden (a gentleman that was sent up with a message from the king, and remained here in towne to agitate this business, and made that use of his being here in towne) that hee could not well write, but did excuse himselfe, but prayed them that they would use all possible haste in the maine business.

Master Waller, having plotted it and brought it on thus farre, nowe began to thinke of putting it further; and the Tuesday following this Saturday, which was Tuesday was se'ennight, in the evening, after hee came home to his lodgings, Master Tomkins and hee being together, hee told Master Tomkins that the very next morning, that was Wednesday, the fast day, hee should goe to my Lord of Holland and acquainte him with this plot, discover so much to him as hee thought fit, that hee himselfe would goe to some other lords, and doe the like. This was the Tuesday night, in which conference they had put on that confidence in expectation of successe in this plot, that Master Waller broke out with a great oath, to affirme, that if they did carry this throughout, then we will have any thing. This hee spake to Master Tomkins with a very great deall of earnestnesse and assurance. So farre they went on in hope and expectation; but here they were cut short. That very night there were warrants issued (upon some discoveries that were made of this plot) to the lord-major and to the sherifes here, which they did execute with so much diligence and care of the good of the citie, that the next morning, when Master Tomkins and Master Waller should have gone about their business, they were apprehended, and the rest of the citizens, divers of them; but some escaped.

Thus farre I have discovered to you the materials and the lineaments of this michievous designe; you shall nowe bee pleased to heare the proofes and the confessions out of which this narration doth arise, and that will make all this good to you that I have said; and after those are read, I shall then tell you what hath bene done since in the House of Commons, somewhat in the House of Lords, and what else is in proposition to bee offered to you from the House of Commons; but I shall desire you first that you may bee fully convinced of the great goodness of God in discovery of this plot, and the truth of these things that I have spoken to you, that you will hear the evidence of the proofes, and then we shall goe on to those other things which we have in charge.

The proofes having bene read, Mr. Pym proceeded thus: Gentlemen, we have held you long; you are now almost come to the end of your trouble. I am to deliver to you some short observations upon the whole matter, and then to acquaint you with the resolutions thereupon, taken in the House of Commons; and to conclude with a few desires from them to you.

The observations are these: First, I am to observe to you the contrarietie betwixt the pretences with which this designe hath bene mark'd and the truth. One of the pretences was peace; the truth was blood and violence. Another of the pretences was the preserving of propriety; the truth was the introducing of tyranny and slavery, which leaves no man master of any thing hee hath.

A second observation is this: The unnatural way by which they meant to compass this wicked designe: that was to destroy the Parliament by the members of Parliament, and then, by the carcasse and shadow of a Parliament, to destroy the kingdom. What is a Parliament but a carcasse when the freedom of it is suppressed? when those shall be taken away by violence that can or will oppose, and stand in the way of their intentions? The high court of Parliament is the most certaine and constant guardian of libertie; but if it be deprived of its owne libertie, it is left without life or power to keepe the libertie of others. If they should bring a Parliament to be subject to the king's pleasure, to be correspondent (as they call it) to his will, in the midst of such evill counsells which now are predominant, there would little or no cure bee left; but all things that are most mischievous would then seeme to be done by law and authoritie.

The third observation is this: With what an evill conscience these men undertooke this worke. They that pretended to take armes to defend their owne propriety, obtained a commission to violate the propriety of others; they would take the assertion of the lawes of the lande, but assumed to them such a power as was most contrary to that law—to seize upon their persons without due processe, to impose upon their estates without consent, to take away some lives by the law martiall; and besides all this, without any commission they intended to alter the government of the citie, which is now governed by your owne councill, and by a magistrate chosen by yourselves—then to be governed by violence.

The fourth observation is this: That the mischievous effect of this designe would not have censed in the first night's worke. All the godly part in the kingdom, all faithfull ministers especially, would have bene left not only to the scorn and reproach, but to the hatred, malice, and crueltie of the Papists and malignants.

The fifth and last observation I shall make to you is this: That this matter was prosecuted in part, and agitated and promoted by those that were sent from the king, and seemed to be messengers of peace; and while we should be amazed with pretences of gracious messages to propose peace, this villanous project, which should have set you all in blood, was promoted by those messengers, and should have bene put in execution very shortly after. This is all I shall trouble you with by way of observation.

The matters resolved on in the House of Commons are these things: First, that there be publike thanksgiving to God, both in the citie and throughout the kingdom, for this great deliverance; that a neare day be appointed for the citie, the Parliament, and the parts adjacent, and a convenient day for other parts of the kingdom. The next thing resolved on was, that the House of Peeres, they should be made acquainted with these proofes, and with all this discovery, which hath bene done accordingly. It was likewise resolved that there should be a covenant made, whereby we should both testify our detestation of this mischievous plot, and joyne ourselves more closely in the maintenance of the common interest of the Church and Commonwealth, in religion and libertie, which are still in great danger, and would have bene utterly subverted if this project had taken effect. It was resolved, in the fourth place, which is now partly executed, that this should be communicated to you of the citie, that so, as you have a great part in the blessing, you may doe your part in the dutie of thankfulness, together with us. It is further resolved, that it shall be communicated to the armie, that they likewise take notice of this great mercy of God, and joyne with us, both in the thanksgiving, and in the protestation and covenant, as we shall likewise desire you of the citie to doe.

Then we are commanded to give thanks to my lord-majour, to the sheriffs, and to the rest of the officers of the citie, for their great care in the apprehending of these persons, in guarding the peace and the quiet of the citie.

We are likewise to give thanks to those gentlemen that have had the custody of these prisoners. We knowe it cannot but bee a trouble to them; there was no meanes to keepe them safe from messages one to another, and from speeches, but by such a way of putting them in honest men's handes. The House of Commons have commanded us to give them speciall thanks that they would undertake this care, and to assure them that they will see them fully recompensed for all the trouble and charge they shall undergoe by it.

And we are to give you thanks, which are the citizens of this citie, for your good affections to the publike cause, and for your continuall bountie for the support of it.

Thus farre we are enjoyed by the resolution of the House. Now we are further to intreate you to heare both the covenants: you shall thereby knowe to what we have bound ourselves, and to what we desire you should be bound. There are two covenants, that is, one proper for the houses of Parliament, which hath bene taken in the House of Commons by all the members, by those gentlemen that are named in those examinations to have bene privy to this plot, which they all have disavowed; and the other covenant is to be taken by all the other part of the kingdom, by the citizens, by the armie, and the rest of the people generally in all places.

The draught of these two covenants we shall communicate to you; the House of Lords, they have had them already, and have taken them into consideration; and we heare they doe resolve that which is appointed for them shall be taken by the members of that House.

We are further to desire you that you would be serviceable to the Divine providence, to God's great mercy to this citie and the whole kingdom. God doth not only doe good, but thereby gives assurance that hee will doe good. His mercies, they are comforts for the present, they are pledges for the future; but yet our care must not cease.

We are to desire that you would keepe your guardes, and look well to your citie, and that you would finde out these evill members that are among you, as neare as may be, that so for the time to come this plot may be prevented, as hitherto hath bene stopped; for out of doubt all the malignity is not drawne out of them, though the present opportunity is hindered for the present of putting it in execution.

I am to tell you further, that in desire to winne those that shall be taken with remorse for this wicked designe and conspiracy, it is resolved, that if any man shall come in before the 15th day of this present June, and freely confesse his fault, and what hee knowes of this conspiracy, that hee shall have a full, and free, and plenary pardon for the time to come, except those that are already or fled. I say, those that come in voluntarily shall be pardoned.

Your care and our care, they will bee all little enough; we hope God's blessing will bee so upon them both, that you shall be restored to a full peace, and that in the mean time you shall enjoy such a degree of safetie and prosperitie as may make way to it.

B.

Some Extracts from THE SENSE OF THE HOUSE, or the Opinion of some Lords and Commons concerning the Londoners' Petition for Peace. Oxford; printed by the University Printer, Leonard Lichfield.

"Give ear, beloved Londoners—

Fie! fie! you shame us all!

Your rising up for peace will make

The Close Committee fall.

Wonder you should aske for that

Which they must needs deny:

Here's thirtie swears they'll have no peace,

And bid me tell you why."

A number of lords are then represented giving reasons against peace. Thus:

"First, I'll no peace," says Essex,

'For my chaplin says 'tis sinne,

To lose a £100 a day

Just when my wife lies in;

They cry, God bless your excellence;

But if I lose my place,

They'll call me rebell, popular asse,

And cuckold to my face."

&c. &c. &c.

Their lordships disposed of, the leading members of the lower House follow with similar reasons:

"My venum swells," quoth Hollis,

'And that his majestie knowes.'

'And I,' quoth Hampden, 'fetch the Scots,

Whence all this mischief growes.'

'I am an asse,' quoth Hazlerigg,

'But yet I'm deepe i' th' plot.'

'And I,' quoth Stroud, 'can lye as fast

As Master Pym can trot.'

'But I,' quoth Pym, 'your hackney am,
And all your drudgery doe,
Have made good speeches for my selfe,
And priviledges for you:
I sit, and can looke downe on men,
Whilst others bleede and fight;
I eate their lordships' meate by day,
And give it their wives by night.'

'Zounds,' said Henry Martin,
'We'll have no accommodation;
D'ye not knowe 'twas I that tore
His majestie's proclamation;
In the House I spake high treason;
I've sold both lande and lease;
Nay, I shall then have but three * * *,
A pox upon this peace.'

'Who talks of peace,' quoth Ludlow,
'Hath neither sense nor reason,
For I ne'er spake i' th' House but once,
And then I spoke high treason;
Your meaning was as bad as mine—
You must defend my speech,
Or else you'll make my mouth as fam'd
As was my father's * * *.'

'You see (belov'd Londoners)
Your peace is out of season,
For which you have the sense of th' House
And every member's reason.
Oh, doe not stand for peace, then,
For, trust me, if you doe,
Each county of the kingdom will Rise up and doe so too.'

C.

Certain Select Observations on the several Offices and Officers in the Militia of England, with the Power of the Parliament to raise the same as they shall judge expedient, &c. Collected and found among the Papers of the late Mr. John Pym, a member of the House of Commons. Writ in the Year 1641. MS.

WHEN kings were first ordained in this realm, the kingdom was divided into forty portions, and every one of those portions or counties was committed to some earl, to govern and defend it against the enemies of the realm. Mirror of Justice, p. 8.

Those earls, after they received their government in each county, divided them into centurians or hundreds; and in every hundred was appointed a centurian or constable, who had his portion and limits assigned him to keep and defend with the power of the hundred, and were to be ready, upon all alarms, with their arms, against the common enemy. These, in some places, are called wapentakes, which, in French, doth signify taking of arms. Mirror, p. 10. 12 Henry 8, folio 16, 17.

King Alfred first ordained two Parliaments to be kept every year for the government of the people, where they were to receive laws and justice. Mirror, p. 10, 11.

The Peers, in Parliament, were to judge of all wrongs done by the king to any of his subjects. Mirror, p. 9.

The ancient manner of choosing and appointing of officers was by those over whom their jurisdiction extended.

INSTANCES.

1. Tythingman: This man was, and at this day is, chosen by the men of his own tything, and by them presented to the leet, to be sworn for the true execution of his office.

2. Constable: This officer is chosen by the inhabitants, who are to be governed by him, and those of the place where his jurisdiction lieth, and presented unto the leet to be sworn.

3. Coroner: This officer hath jurisdiction within the whole county, and therefore was chosen by the freeholders of the county in the county court. Cook's Magna Charta, p. 174, 175, 559.

4. Such as had charge to punish such as were violators of Magna Charta: These were chosen in the county court, as appeareth by stat. 28 Ed. 1, c. 1, 17.

5. Sheriffs: likewise in time past, and by the common law, to be chosen likewise in the county court. Lamb. Saxon Laws, fo. 136, stat. 28 Ed. 1, c. 8, 13. Cook's Magna Charta, 175, 559. Mirror, p. 8.

6. Lieutenants of counties (anciently known by the name of Heretochs) were chosen in the county court (which Cook, upon Magna Charta, p. 69, calls the Folknote). Lamb. Saxon Laws, folio 136. Mirror, p. 8, 11, 12.

7. Majors and bailiffs, in boroughs and towns corporate, are chosen by the commonalty of the same corporation within their jurisdiction.

8. Conservators of the peace were anciently chosen by the freeholders in the county court. Cook's Magna Charta, 558, &c.

9. Knights for the Parliament are to be chosen in the county court, stat. 7 H. 4, cap. 15; 1 H. 5, cap. 1; 8 H. 6, cap. 7; 10 H. 6, cap. 2.

10. Verderers of the forest are chosen within their jurisdiction by the inhabitants. Cook's Magna Charta, 559.

11. Admirals, being the sheriffs of the counties, as Selden, in his Mare Clausum, p. 169, 188, affirms, must be chosen as the sheriffs were, viz., in the county court. But the Parliament of R. 2, folio 29, saith they are chosen in the Parliament, the representative body of the realm, because they had the defence of the realm by sea committed unto them.

12. The captain of Calais, viz., Richard, earl of Warwick, in the time of Henry 6, refused to give up his captainship of Calais unto the king because he received it in Parliament. Cowel's Interpreter, in the word Parliament.

13. The Lord-chancellor, to whom is committed the great seal of England, being the publick faith of the kingdom, was in former times chosen in Parliament. Lamb. Archeion, p. 48.

14. Dan. Chronicle, p. 139, 148, 195.

15. Lord-treasurer, an officer to whom is of trust committed the treasure of the kingdom, was, in like manner, chosen in Parliament.

16. Chief-justice, an officer unto whom is committed the administration of the justice of the realm, was chosen in Parliament. Lamb. Archeion, p. 48, ut supra.

Anno 15 Ed. 3d. The king was petitioned in Parliament that the high officers of the kingdom might, as in former times, be chosen in Parliament. To which the king yielded, that they should be sworn in Parliament. Dan. Chronicle, p. 195. Quere the Parliament roll and petitions.

And it appeareth by a printed statute, Anno 15 Ed. 3, cap. 3, that the great officers of the kingdom were sworn to maintain Magna Charta.

16. The great council of the king and kingdom, namely, the Parliament, is chosen by the Commons; for they choose the knights and citizens, and burgesses, or barons, for so the citizens were anciently called; and the cinque-ports retain that name to this day.

And this was, as I conceive, the ancientest constitution of the kingdom for choosing of their officers.

In the next place, it will be requisite to inquire which of these officers are now altered, and by what authority.

And, first, of sheriffs. The choice of sheriffs was first taken from the freeholders by the statute of 9 Edward 2, and the choice of them committed to the lord-chancellor, treasurer, the barons of the Exchequer, and the justices of every bench. Cook's Magna Charta, p. 559.

This election is to be made the morrow after All-Souls-Day, in the Exchequer, by statute 14 Edward 3, c. 7.

Quere 1. If they choose none at that day and place, but at some other time, whether the choice be good? Or if he be chosen by any other?

Objection. The king himself doth usually make and appoint sheriffs in every county by his prerogative.

Solution. If hath been agreed by all the judges that the king cannot appoint any other to be sheriff than such as are named and chosen according to the statute of Lincoln. Cook's Magna Charta, p. 559.

If so, then it is questionable whether the making of Mr. Hastings sheriff of Leicestershire be warrantable by law or not?

Quere 2. If no sheriff be legally chosen, whether the freeholders of the county shall not choose one, as they were accustomed before the making of the stat. of 9 Ed. 2, for these reasons:

1. If there be no sheriff legally chosen, there will be a failure of justice, which the law will not permit.

2. Because the statute is in the affirmative, and therefore doth not altogether take away their power of choosing, because affirmative statutes do not alter the common law.

Next, let us consider the choice of justices of the peace, who, as they are commissioners of the peace, are not officers by the common law; and therefore this case will differ in some respects from the former, it being an office created by statute.

1. I conceive that no court may be erected without the authority of Parliament; for the court of first-fruits was erected by stat. 32 Henry 8, cap. 45; the court of wards by stat. 32 Hen. 8, cap. 46; the court of justice in Wales by stat. 34 H. 8, c. 6; and power to erect courts given 1. Mar. ses. 2, cap. 10. And it was resolved in this Parliament, at the trial of the Earl of Strafford, that the court at York was against law, albeit it hath had continuance these hundred years, because it was not erected by Parliament.

And justices of the peace, being judges of record, were first ordained by statute, as appeareth by 15 Ed. 3, cap. 2, and 34 Ed. 3, cap. 1; with such other additions of power as later statutes have given unto them.

Justices of the peace, then, having their being by virtue of the statute law, they are to be ordained in the same manner as the statutes prescribed, and not otherwise.

1. After their first institution, the statutes did leave the choice of them indefinitely in the crown, as I conceive, until the statute of 12 R. 2, 27; which statute doth instruct the chancellor, treasurer, keeper of the privy seal, steward and chamberlain of the king's house, the clerk of the rolls, the justices of both benches, barons of the Exchequer, and others, to name and make them.

2. Other statutes do appoint what persons shall be chosen to be justices of the peace; namely, such as reside in the same county where they are justices of peace, as stat. 12, R. 2, c. 10. And they must be of the most sufficient knights, esquires, and gentlemen of the same county, stat. 17, Rich. 2, 10; and dwelling in the same county, 2 H. 5, stat. 2, cap. 1 (except lords and justices of assizes). Upon this last statute, it may be doubted if choice may be made of any lords and justices of assizes which have no residence or estate in the county where they are so made justices of the peace; which, if it doth, it doth repeal all former statutes which confine them to such persons as are of the same county, which I conceive is against their meaning, for that statute doth only dispense with the residence of lords and justices of assize, because men of the same county, inhabiting in the county where they are justices of peace, in regard of their other employments in the Commonwealth which necessarily requireth their absence, and so it amounteth only to a dispensation for their residency.

Objection. The common practice is, that the lord-keeper doth appoint whom he pleases, and that by virtue of the statute of 18 Henry 6, cap. 1.

Solution. True, such is the practice; but the doubt is, how warrantable his act is: for the statute of 18 H. 6 doth give the lord-chancellor (alone by himself) no other power but in case there be no men of sufficiency in the county, and where none of twenty pounds per annum are to be found; for, in such case, he hath power to appoint such as he conceives are men most fit. But, in case there are men of sufficient estates in the county to be found, he must join with the others mentioned in the statute, viz., the treasurer, privy-seal, &c., who have a joint and undivided power with him.

If this be so, then it may be doubted whether the Lord-viscount Falkland, being no peer of the realm, Sir Peter Miche, Sir Edward Nichols, of late put into the commission of the peace in many counties of this kingdom, are, by the law, capable of being justices of the peace in those counties where they do not reside. Et sic de similibus.

Querre, also, whether a justice of the peace, being once legally chosen according to the statute before mentioned, may be put out at the pleasure of the lord-keeper alone, without any just cause alleged; for, being a justice of record, whether some matter of record must not appear to displace him? for, being settled by law, he is to be displaced by law, and not upon displeasure or surmise.

3. A third officer is the lieutenants in every county, in former times known (for the name only is out of use) by the name of heretoch, Lamb. Saxon Laws, fol. 136. And here will fall into debate the ordinance in Parliament about the settling of the militia of the kingdom.

The choice of these, as was formerly mentioned, was by the freeholders in the county court; but of later times they have exercised the same power, being appointed by the king, under the shadow of his prerogative.

First, it is to be demanded whether the king's prerogative can take away that ancient right which the subjects had by law invested in them? If so, then the king, by his prerogative, may do wrong, which is contrary to a maxim in law. Fortesque, de Legibus, &c., fol. 25. If not, then whether the power of choosing a lieutenant, or heretoch, doth not yet remain in the subject, so as they may now choose one as well and by the same right they did in former times?

If freeholders of a county may yet choose, then I conceive the Parliament, being the representative body of the whole kingdom, may appoint lieutenants; because they include them, or, at least, they are not excluded from such a power, no more than where the statute, giving power unto justices of peace to inquire of a riot, doth exclude the power of the King's Bench, which no man will affirm. And therefore the ordinance of the militia is legal.

That the Parliament hath power to make an ordinance may be proved à minori. For,

If the inhabitants of a town, without any custom to enable them, may make an ordinance or bye-law for the reparation of their church, highway, or bridge in decay, or any the like thing, being for their publick good, and upon a pecuniary pain in case of neglect, and if it be made by the greater part, that it shall bind all within the town, as hath been agreed for law. 44 Ed. 3, fol. 19; Cook, lib. 5, fol. 63; the Chamberlain of London's case; Clarke's case; and Jefferyes's case, ibid., fol. 64, 65.

If a township be amerced, and the neighbours, by assent, shall assess a certain sum upon every inhabitant, and agree that it be not paid by such a day, that certain persons thereto assigned shall distrain; and, in this case, the distress is lawful. Doctor v. Student, fol. 74, 6, cap. 9.

If a bye-law that every one that holdeth land shall pay one penny towards the reparation of a church, and, for non-payment, shall forfeit to the churchwardens twenty shillings, be good and doth bind, as the book saith, 21 H. 7, fol. 20, holdeth.

If a town make bye-laws, and they shall bind every one of the town, if it be for the common good, as 11 H. 7, fol. 14, then, by the same reason, may the Parliament make ordinances and bye-laws for the common good of the kingdom, as shall bind all. For if a town may make ordinance, much more may the knights and burgesses of the Parliament, because they have their power ad faciendum et consentiendum; as appeareth of record under their hands and seals in chancery, in their return of their several elections for knights and burgesses.

Lastly, as every private man is by law bound to preserve the peace—as, in case an affray be made by two, and a third man standing by shall not use his best endeavour to part them and preserve the peace, he may be indicted and fined for it—why may not the Parliament, being entrusted with the preservation of the peace of the realm, make an ordinance for the preservation of the peace in case of apparent danger?

Ordinance made in Parliament, 8 Ed. 2, for the preservation of the alienation of the king's land, and fines set upon such as presume to break them. Rot. Parl., 25 H. 6, Art. 29.

The judges and courts at Westminster may make an ordinance for fees to be paid unto the clerk of their courts, and for bar fees taken by sheriff and gaolers. 21 H. 7, fol. 17.

An ordinance made in Parliament, 21 Ed. 3, fol. 60, for exemption of the Abbot of Bury from the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Norwich. Selden's Titles of Honour, p. 702; 12 H. 7, fol. 25.

Heyborne and Keyland's case, M. 14 Ed. 4, Rot. 60, in Banco. Reg. Crook, page 25, who had his money taken away from him by virtue of an ordinance, and was adjudged that the ordinance did bind him.

Whether an infant may be a colonel, admiral, &c.

1. None, by the intention of the law, can do knight's service before he be twenty-one years of age. And this is the reason of wardship.

2. It is an office of trust, which may not be executed by a deputy.

3. Such an office requires personal attendance, for otherwise the county may be overthrown unawares in the absence of such a governor from his charge.

D.

A Sketch of English Affairs, from the Dissolution of the third Parliament to the raising of the King's Standard at Nottingham; from a Speech by Sir Arthur Hazlerig, on the 7th of February, 1658.

THE council-table bit like a serpent, the Star Chamber like scorpions. Two or three gentlemen could not stir out for fear of being committed for a riot. Our souls and consciences were put on the rack by the archbishop. We might not speak of Scripture, or repeat a sermon at our tables. Many godly ministers were sent to find their bed in the wilderness. The oppression was little less in the lower courts and in the special courts.

Altars were set up, and bowing to them enjoyed; pictures were placed in church windows, and images set up at Durham and elsewhere; with many other exorbitancies introduced, both in Church and State. The archbishop would not only impose on England, but on Scotland, to bring in the Book of Common Prayer upon them. They liked it not; and, as luck would have it, they would not bear it. He prevailed with the king to raise an army to suppress them. The king prevailed with his nobles to conquer them into it. He went to their country, and, finding himself not able to conquer them, came back.

He called a Parliament, which was named the little, or broken Parliament; disbanded not his army, but propounded that we should give him a great sum to maintain the war against Scotland. We debated it, but the consequence of our debate made him fear we would not grant it. We had, if he had suffered us to sit. Then did Strafford and his council advise him to break us and to rule arbitrarily, and that he had an army in Ireland to make it good. For this, Strafford lost his head. The king suddenly broke that Parliament. I rejoiced in my soul it was so. He raised the gallantest army that ever was—the flower of the gentry and nobility. The Scots raised too, and sent their declaration into England, that by the law of God and nature they might rise up for their own preservation; and thus they came into England. At Newburn the armies met. We were worsted. God was pleased to disperse our army, and give them the day. The Scots passed Newburn, and advanced to Newcastle.

Then some of our nobles—Say, Essex, and Scroop—humbly petitioned his majesty for a Parliament. He, seeing danger, called a Parliament. This was the Long Parliament. The first proposition was to raise money for the Scots. We gave them a brotherly assistance of £300,000. They showed themselves brethren and honest men, and peaceably returned. Then money was pressed for our own army. The House, considering how former Parliaments had been dealt with, was unwilling to raise money till the act was passed not to dissolve the Parliament but by their own consent. It passed freely by king, Lords, and Commons. This was wonderful—the very hand of God that brought it to pass; for no man could then foresee the good that act produced.

The king then practised with the Scots, then with his army, to assist him against this Parliament, and to make them sure to his particular interest. Sir John Conyers discovered it, to his everlasting fame. Mr. Pym acquainted the House. Divers officers of the army—Lord Goring, Ashburnham, Pollard, and others—were examined here. They all absented. The House desired of the king that they might be brought to justice; but the king sent them away beyond sea.

The king demanded five members, by his attorney-general. He then came personally to the House, with five hundred men at his heels, and sat in your chair. It pleased God to hide those members. I shall never forget the kindness of that great lady, the Lady Carlile, that gave timely notice. Yet some of them were in the House after the notice came. It was questioned if, for the safety of the House, they should be gone; but the debate was shortened, and it was thought fit for them, in discretion, to withdraw. Mr. Hampden and myself being then in the House, withdrew. Away we went. The king immediately came in, and was in the House before we got to the water.

The queen, on the king's return, raged and gave him an unhandsome name, "poitroom," for that he did not take others out; and certain if he had, they would have been killed at the door.

Next day the king went to the city. They owned the members. Thereupon he left the Parliament, and went from step to step, till he came to York, and set up his standards at Nottingham, and declared the militia was in him.

From the diary of Thomas Burton, Esq.

E.

A Declaration and Vindication of John Pym, Esq.

It is not unknown to the world (especially to the inhabitants in and about London) with what desperate and fame-wounding aspersions my reputation, and the integrity of my intentions to God, my king, and my country, hath been invaded by the malice and fury of malignants, and ill-affected persons to the good of the Commonwealth; some charging me to have been the promoter and patronizer of all the innovations which have been obtruded upon the ecclesiastical government of the Church of England; others, of more spiteful and exorbitant spirits, alledging that I have been the man who have begot and fostered all the so-lamented distractions which are now rife in this kingdom. And though such calumnies are ever more harmful to the authors than to those whom they strive to wound with them, when they arrive only to the censure of judicious persons, who can distinguish forms, and see the difference betwixt truth and falsehood; yet, because the scandals inflicted upon my innocence have been obvious to people of all conditions, many of which may entertain a belief of those reproachful reports, though in my own soul I am far above such ignominies, and so was once resolved to have waved them as unworthy my notice, yet at last, for the assertion of my integrity, I concluded to declare myself in this matter, that all the world, but such as will not be convinced either by reason or truth, may bear testimony of my innocence. To pass by, therefore, the Earl of Strafford's business, in which some have been so impudent as to charge me of too much partiality and malice, I shall declare myself fully concerning the rest of their aspersions, namely, that I have promoted and fomented the differences now abounding in the English Church.

How unlikely this is, and improbable, shall, to every indifferent man, be quickly rendered perspicuous; for that I am, and ever was, and so will die, a faithful son of the Protestant religion, without having the least relation in my belief to those gross errors of Anabaptism, Brownism, and the like, every man that hath any acquaintance with my conversation can bear me righteous witness; these being but aspersions cast upon me by some of the discontented clergy, and their factors and abettors, because they might perhaps conceive that I had been a main instrument in extenuating the haughty power and ambitious pride of the bishops and prelates. As I only delivered my opinion as a member of the House of Commons, that attempt or action of mine had been justifiable both to God and a good conscience, and had no way concluded me guilty of a revolt from the orthodox doctrine of the Church of England because I sought a reformation of some gross abuses crept into the government by the cunning and perverseness of the bishops and their substitutes; for was it hot high time to seek to regulate their power, when, instead of looking to the cure of men's souls (which is their genuine office), they inflicted punishment on men's bodies, banishing them to remote and desolate places, after stigmatizing their faces, only for the testimony of a good conscience; when, not contented with those insufferable insolencies, they sought to bring in unheard-of canons into the Church—Arminian or Papistical ceremonies (whether you please to term them, there is not much difference)—imposing burdens upon men's consciences which they were not able to bear, and introducing the old abolished superstition of bowing to the altar? If it savoured either of Brownism or Anabaptism to endeavour to suppress the growth of those Romish errors, I appeal to any equal-minded Protestant either for my judge or witness. Nay, had the attempts of the bishops desisted here, tolerable they had been, and their power not so much questioned as since it hath; but when they saw the honourable the high court of Parliament had begun to look into their enormities and abuses, beholding how they wrested religion like a waxen nose to the furtherance of their ambitious purposes, then Troy was taken in—then they began to despair of holding any longer their usurped authority! and therefore, as much as in them lay, both by public declarations and private counsils, they laboured to foment the civil differences between his majesty and his Parliament, abetting the proceedings of the malignants with large supplies of men and money, and stirring up the people to tumults by their sedition sermons.

Surely, then, no man can account me an ill son of the Commonwealth if I delivered my opinion and passed my vote freely for their abolishment; which may, by the same equity, be put in practice by this Parliament, as the dissolution of monasteries, and their lazy inhabitants, the monks and friars, were in Henry the Eighth's time; for, without dispute, these carried as much reputation in the kingdom then, as bishops have done in it since; and yet a Parliament then had power to put them down. Why, then, should not a Parliament have power to do the like to these, every way guilty of as many offences against the state as the former? For my own part, I attest God Almighty, the knower of all hearts, that neither envy, nor any private grudge, to all or any of the bishops, hath made me averse to their functions, but merely my zeal to religion and God's cause, which I perceived to be trampled under foot by the too extended authority of the prelates, who, according to the purity of their institution, should have been men of upright hearts and humble minds, shearing their flocks, and not flaying them.

And whereas some will alledge it is no good argument to dissolve the function of bishops, because some bishops are vitious; to that I answer, since the vice of these bishops was derivative from the authority of their function, it is very fitting the function, which is the cause thereof, be corrected, and its authority divested of its borrowed feathers; otherwise it is impossible but the same power which made these present bishops (should the episcopal and prelatical dignity continue in its ancient height and vigour) so proud and arrogant would infuse the same vices into their successors.

But this is but a molehill to that mountain of scandalous reports that have been inflicted on my integrity to his majesty; some boldly averring me for the author of the present distractions between his majesty and his Parliament, when I take God and all that know my proceedings to be my vouchers that I neither directly nor indirectly ever had a thought tending to the least disobedience or disloyalty to his majesty, whom I acknowledge my lawful king and sovereign, and would expend my blood as soon in his service as any subject he hath. 'Tis true, when I perceived my life aimed at, and heard myself proscribed a traitor merely for my intireness of heart to the service of my country; when I was informed that I, with some other honourable and worthy members of the Parliament, were, against the privileges thereof, demanded, even in the Parliament House, by his majesty, attended by a multitude of men-at-arms and malignants, who, I verily believe, had, for some ill ends of their own, persuaded his majesty to that excess of rigour against us; when, for my own part (my conscience is to me a thousand witnesses in that behalf), I never harboured a thought which tendered to any disservice to his majesty, nor ever had any intention prejudicial to the state; when, I say, notwithstanding my own innocence, I saw myself in such apparent danger, no man will think me blame-worthy in that I took a care of my own safety, and fled for refuge to the protection of the Parliament, which, making my case their own, not only purged me and the rest of the guilt of high treason, but also secured our lives from the storm that was ready to burst out upon us.

And if this hath been the occasion that hath withdrawn his majesty from the Parliament, surely the fault can no way be imputed to me, or any proceeding of mine, which never went further, either since his majesty's departure, nor before then, so far as they were warranted by the known laws of the land, and authorized by the indisputable and undeniable power of the Parliament. So long as I am secure in my own conscience that this is truth, I account myself above all their calumnies and falsehoods, which shall return upon themselves, and not wound my reputation in good and impartial men's opinions.

But in that devilish conspiracy of Catiline against the state and senate of Rome, none among the senators was so obnoxious to the envy of the conspirators, or liable to their traduccaments, as that orator and patriot of his country, Cicero, because by his council and zeal to the Commonwealth their plot for the ruine thereof was discovered and prevented. Though I will not be so arrogant to parallel myself with that worthy, yet my case (if we may compare lesser things with great) hath to his a very near resemblance: the cause that I am so much maligned and reproached by ill-affected persons being because I have been forward in advancing the affairs of the kingdom, and have been taken notice of for that forwardness, they, out of their malice, converting that to a vice which, without boast be it spoken, I esteem as my principal virtue—my care to the public utility. And since it is for that cause that I suffer these scandals, I shall endure them with patience, hoping that God in his great mercy will at last reconcile his majesty to his high court of Parliament, and then I doubt not but to give his royal self (though he be much incensed against me) a sufficient account of my integrity. In the interim, I hope the world will believe that I am not the first innocent man that hath been injured, and so will suspend their further censures of me.

F.

A Narrative of the Disease and Death of that noble Gentleman, John Pym, Esquire, late a Member of the honourable House of Commons, attested under the Hands of his Physicians, Chyrurgions, and Apothecary.

FORASMUCH as there are divers uncertaine reportes and false suggestions spred abroad touching the disease and death of that noble gentleman, John Pym, Esquire, late a member of the honourable House of Commons, it is thought fit (for the undeceiving of some, and prevention of misconstruction and suspitions in others) to manifest to those who desire information the true cause of his lingring disease and death, as it was discovered (while hee lived) by his physitions, and manifested to the view both of them and many others, that were present at the dissection of his body after his death; for the skin of his body, it was without so much as any roughness, scarr, or scab, neither was there any breach either of the scarfe or true skin, much lesse any phthiriasis or lousie disease, as was reported; and as for that suggestion of his being poisoned, there appeared to the physitions no signe thereof upon the view of his body, neither was there any exhorbitant symptome (while hee lived) either in his animall, vitall, or naturall parts, for hee had his intellectualls and senses very entire to the last, and his sleep for the most part very sufficient and quiet. As for the vitall parts, they were all found very sound, and (while hee lived) they were perfect in their actions and uses; and as for the naturall parts contained in the lower belly, they did not otherwise suffer than from that large imposthume that was there contained; the stomack being smooth and faire in all its coates; the liver and kidnies good enough, onely much altered in their colour; the spleen faire, but little. But the most ignoble part of this lower belly, the mesentery, was found fundi calamitas, the shop wherein the instrument of his dissolution was forged; there being a large abscesse or imposthume, which wrought itselfe to such a bulke as was easily discovered by the outward touch of his physitions at the beginning of his complaining, and did increase to that capacitie as (being opened) it did receive a handle contracted, and in its growth did so oppress the gall and stop its vessels as occasioned the jaundice. Besides, this abscesse (by the matter contained in it) did so offend the parts adjacent as most of them suffered by its vicinitie, yet without any such turbulent symptome as did at any time cause him to complaine of paine, being sensible onely of some sorenesse upon the touch of the region of the part affected; and from its vapours the stomack suffered a continuall inappetency and frequent nauseousnesse, and it did so deprave and hinder the concoction, distribution, and perfection of nourishment, that it produced an atrophy or falling of the flesh; so that inappetency, faintnesse, and nauseousnesse were the great complaints hee usually made. At last, after a long languishment, this imposthume breaking, hee often fainted; and soon after followed his dissolution, December the 8th, 1643, about 7 a clocke at night.

Attested by the physitions that attended him in his sickness:

Sir THEODORE MAYERN,

Dr. CLERK,

Dr. MEREVELL, President of the Colledge of Physitions.

Dr. GIFFORD,

Dr. MICKLETHWAIT,

Dr. MOULIN,

Dr. COLLADE,

And Chyrurgions:

THOMAS ALLEN, and

HENRY AITALL, his servant.

Apothecary:

JOHN CHAPMAN, servant to WILLIAM TAYLOR

} that were present at the dissection of his body (together with two of those above mentioned).

John Hampden

HARDY & BROTHERS

JOHN HAMPDEN.—1594–1643.

AN outline of the life of Hampden is all that will now be required for the purposes of this work. So little, after the most extensive researches, is known of the man, that all may, unfortunately, be very briefly told: his history is written in the great public actions he forwarded through life, and in the assertion and defence of which he died; and these have already been minutely recorded, in the foregoing memoir of the dearest and most intimate of his friends, and the most eminent of his great fellow-labourers. Such are the only, though the sufficient records that permanently attest the wonderful influence of his character; for of all the speeches he delivered in the House of Commons, only one remains, and even its authenticity is more than doubtful.

John Hampden was born in London* in 1594, ten years after the birth of Pym. His family may be traced in an unbroken line from the Saxon times. It received from Edward the Confessor the grant of the estate and residence in Buckinghamshire, from which the name is derived, and which in Domesday Book are entered as in the possession of Baldwyn de Hampden. Escaping from the rapacity of the Norman princes, and strengthened by rich and powerful alliances, it continued in direct male succession, and increased in influence and wealth. Noble says, in his "Memoirs of the Protectoral House of Cromwell,"† with which, as well as with the old ancestors of Lord Say and Sele, the family of the Hampdens were allied, that few were so opulent in the fourteenth century as this family, but that one of them was then obliged to forfeit to the crown the three valuable manors of Tring, Wing, and Ivengo, for a blow given to the Black Prince in a dispute at tennis; and that by this only he escaped without losing his hand. A rude couplet, still remembered in that part of the kingdom, sustains the tradition:

"Tring, Wing, and Ivengo did go
For striking the Black Prince a blow."

This story, indeed, has not been suffered to pass without many doubts; but whether true or not, it has served no mean purpose in giving a name to one of the noblest works of romantic fiction in these latter times. Sir Walter Scott possessed himself of the tradition, as of every other, and the shape he received it in will be thought a corroboration of it, when compared with the versions of Noble and Lysons:

"Tring, Wing, and Ivanhoe,
For striking of a blow,
Hampden did forego,
And glad he could escape so!"

Be the story true or false, however, no doubt the property of the Hampdens at this period was very extensive. They were not only rich and flourishing in their own county, but enjoyed considerable possessions in Essex, Berkshire, and Oxfordshire. In Buckinghamshire they were lords of Great and Little Hampden, Stoke Mandeville, Kimble, Prestwood, Dunton, Hoggstone, and Hartwell, and had lands in many other parishes. They appear to have been distinguished in chivalry; they were often intrusted with civil authority, and represented their native county in several Parliaments. We find, in the Rolls of Parliament, that some lands were escheated from the family on account of their adherence to the party of Henry VI., and that they were excepted from the general act of restitution in the 1st Edward IV. Edmund Hampden was one of the esquires of the body, and privy counsellor to Henry VII.; and in the succeeding reign we find "Sir John Hampden of the Hill" appointed, with others, to attend upon the English queen at the interview of the sovereigns in the Field of Cloth of Gold. It is to his daughter, Sibel Hampden, who was nurse to the Prince of Wales, afterward Edward VI., and ancestress to William Penn, of Pennsylvania, that the monument is raised in Hampton Church, Middlesex, which records so many virtues and so much wisdom.* During the reign of Elizabeth, Griffith Hampden, having served as high sheriff of the county of Buckingham, represented it in the Parliament of 1585. By him the queen was received with great magnificence at his mansion at Hampden, which he had in part rebuilt and much enlarged. An extensive avenue was cut for her passage through the woods to the house; and a part of that opening, Lord Nugent says, is still to be seen on the brow of the Chilterns from many miles around, and retains the name of "The Queen's Gap," in commemoration of that visit. His eldest son, William, who succeeded him in 1591, was member, in 1593, for East Looe, then a considerable borough. He married Elizabeth, second daughter of Sir Henry Cromwell, of Hinchinbrooke in Huntingdonshire, and aunt to the Protector, and died in 1597, leaving two sons, John and Richard, the latter of whom, in after times, resided at Emmington in Oxfordshire.

The fact of London having been the birthplace of the patriot has been disputed, but apparently without reason. He was reported to have been born at the manor-house, long in the possession of his family, at Hoggstone, in the hundred of Cottlesloe, in Buckinghamshire: it was only so said, because the people of that county adored his name. Succeeding to his father's estate in his infancy, Hampden remained for some years under the care of Richard Bouchier, master of the free grammar-school at Thame in Oxfordshire.† In 1609 he was

* See a copy in Noble's Cromwell, vol. ii., p. 64. This is an extract:

"To court she called was, to foster up a king,
Whose helping hand long lingering sutes to speedie end did bring.

Two queenes that sceptre bore, gave credytt to the dame,
Full many yeres in cowrte she dwelte, without disgrace or blame."

Query—Do these lingering sutes in any way allude to the royal quarrels of her ancestor?

[For the authority of this page, the reader may consult the admirable life of Hampden by Lord Nugent, whence it is derived, p. 4–6, vol. i.—C.]

† Anthony Wood.

* This rests on the authority of Wood, who ascertained it indisputably by reference to the matriculation books at Oxford.

† Vol. ii., p. 62.

entered as a commoner at Magdalen College, Oxford, where his attainments gained him reputation, and he was chosen, with others, among whom was Laud, then master of St. John's, to write the Oxford gratulations on the marriage of the Elector-palatine with the Princess Elizabeth.* In 1613 he entered the Inner Temple as a student of law. And now, whether, at this youthful period, he had been induced, from his cheerful habits and fascinating manners, to enter into the dissipations of the age, and had begun the life of "great pleasure and licence" which Clarendon,† not, as it seems, unjustly, has charged upon his earlier years, we have no means of knowing; but it is certain that he never, at any period of his life, abandoned intellectual exertion, or neglected the literary labours to which his taste always inclined him. Accordingly, at the Inner Temple, he did not fail to make considerable progress in his new study; and we find the courtier, Sir Philip Warwick, bearing testimony to his "great knowledge, both of scholarship and law." Nor does the next circumstance of his life to which our attention is directed indicate any taste on his part for "licence" of the more abandoned sort. He was married in the church of Pyrtton, in Oxfordshire,‡ 1619, to Elizabeth, only daughter of Edmund Symeon, Esq., lord of that manor and estate. To this lady he was tenderly attached, and often, after her early death, paid sorrowful and affectionate tribute to her virtues, talents, and affection.

Hampden entered the House of Commons the following year, having taken his seat for the borough of Grampound on the meeting of James's Parliament of 1620. He attached himself at once to the popular party, though certain of his friends were desirous that he should seek other means of advancement. His mother was very urgent with him to look to adding a peerage to the dignity of his family. "If ever," says this lady, in a characteristic letter preserved in the British Museum, "if ever my sonn will seeke for his honour, tell him now to come; for heare is multitudes of lords a making—Vicount Mandvile, Lo. Thresorer, Vicount Dunbar, which was Sr. Ha. Constable, Vicount Falkland, which was Sir Harry Carew. These two last of Scotland; of Ireland divers, the deputie a vicount, and one Mr. Fitzwilliams a barron of Inghland, Mr. Villers a vicount, and Sr. Will. Fielding a barron. . . . I am ambitious of my sonne's honour, which I wish were now conferred upon him, that hee might not come after so many new creations." But this counsel was not followed. The discovery is due to Lord Nugent,§

* "These verses," says Lord Nugent, "published at Oxford, 1613, in a volume entitled 'Lusus Palatini,' contain little worth remark, unless it be the last three lines:

"Ut surgat inde proles,
Cui nulla terra, nulla
Gens, sit parem datura."

Remarkable when it is remembered that from this marriage Rupert was born, who led the troops at Chalgrove, by whom Hampden was slain; but also that from it sprang the succession to which stands limited the guardianship of the free monarchy of England. † Hist., vol. iv., p. 61.

‡ Register of Pyrtton, June 24, 1619. He died on the anniversary of that day.

§ I shall have frequent occasion to refer to Lord Nugent's recent and interesting "Memorials of Hampden." It is much to be regretted, however, that, with every advantage of research, his lordship should not have succeeded in communicating more. [To this remark of Mr. Forster, I would and it is in all respects very grateful. It throws a steady light on Hampden's early character, and is a comfort and a guide to our understanding in following his after-exertions. Here was no personal vanity; no private interest; no boundless ambition; no reckless or unsatisfied desires. He always saw a nobler dignity than was to be won in James I.'s presence chamber, and that and immortality he achieved together.

In considering the character of Hampden, it will not appear strange that for many years he made no considerable figure in Parliament. In disposition he was unobtrusive; of "rare temper and modesty," to use the words of Clarendon; whilst his wonderful energy of mind was under exact discipline. He saw that the leading members of the opposition were sufficient to their present task, and cared not to thrust himself unnecessarily forward. Recording his votes for freedom always, he waited a fitting opportunity for greater personal exertion. But as he was resolved wisely not to anticipate the call of the occasion, so he prepared himself not to disobey it. In the retirement of his yet private life, he earnestly investigated the great political questions of the time. It is interesting to be able to add, that Lord Nugent has seen a curious manuscript volume of Parliamentary cases and other papers, at Mr. Russell's, at Checker's Court, in which he says there is abundant evidence of the pains which Hampden took to fortify himself in the science of precedent and privilege. A great part of that volume is filled with extracts from what are called "Mr. Hampden's notes." We may imagine the effect produced on his mind by such studies; nor do we wonder to hear from Clarendon that at this period "he retired to a more reserved and melancholy society;" while we feel to love him the more for it when the historian adds that he yet preserved his own natural cheerfulness and vivacity, and, above all, a flowing courtesy to all men.

In the first Parliament of Charles, however, he was by no means idle. He made himself a prominent member of the famous Glanville committee, already referred to. "The cases of the three Buckinghamshire boroughs," says Lord Nugent, "there is little reason to doubt, were in reality drawn up and put forward by Hampden, although ostensibly managed by Hakewill. This is all the more probable from its appearing, from Hampden's correspondence,* that Hakewill had before been frequently employed by him to conduct suits and arbitrations for him respecting his property in that county." In consequence of these petitions, Noy and Selden were ordered to make search in the record, and the committee reported that all four had the right, and ought to be admitted accordingly; furthermore declaring it to be "the ancient privilege and power of the Commons in Parliament to examine the validity of elections and returns concerning this House and Assembly," in opposition to the former decision of James add my humble opinion, that the Memorials of Hampden by his lordship afford an invaluable commentary upon the men and events of the times, and especially would I call attention to his most admirable estimate of the character of James I., p. 18-31, vol. i.—C.J.

* This correspondence Lord Nugent does not adduce. Why? It would have been an interesting addition even to his interesting "Memorials."

that they should be judged in chancery. Whether Hakewill was aware or not of the full extent of the object for which he was working, does not appear. It seems, at all events, probable that the greater number of the opposite party were not; and that those who were, did not at the beginning think it prudent to give the alarm. King James, however, had shrewdness enough to detect the tendency of this measure; and accordingly, notice thereof being given to him, he stated his unwillingness to have the number of the burgesses increased, "declaring," says Glanville, "he was troubled with too great a number already, and commanded his then solicitor, Sir Robert Heath, being of the House of Commons, to oppose it what he might; and most of the courtiers then of the House, understanding the king's inclination, did their utmost endeavours to cross it." The report, nevertheless, was in the end confirmed by the House. "Whereupon," says Glanville, "a warrant under the speaker's hand was made to the clerk of the crown in the chancery for the making of such a writ, which was issued out accordingly; and therefore were elected and returned to serve in the same Parliament, for Amer-sham, Mr. Hakewill and Mr. John Crew; for Wendover, Mr. John Hampden, who beareth the charge, and Sir Alexander Denton; for Marlow, Mr. H. Burlace and Mr. Cotton."

On the dissolution of Charles's second Parliament, Hampden resolutely refused the loan; and on being asked why he would not contribute to the king's necessities, startled the querist with these memorable words: "That he could be content to lend as well as others, but feared to draw upon himself that curse in magna charta which should be read twice a year against those who infringe it.*" The privy council, not being satisfied with his own recognition to appear at the board, although answerable with a landed property nearly the largest possessed by any commoner of England, committed him to a close and rigorous imprisonment in the Gate-house. Being again brought before the council, and persisting in his first refusal, he was sent into private detention in Hampshire.

His sufferings had now made him prominent known; and in the celebrated third Parliament, to which he was returned as member for the borough of Wendover, he achieved the entire confidence of the popular party, and took part in the preparation of the petition of right.

"From this time forward," Lord Nugent says truly, "scarcely was a bill prepared or an inquiry begun upon any subject, however remotely or incidentally affecting any one of the three great matters at issue—privilege, religion, or the supplies, but he was thought fit to be associated with St. John, Selden, Coke, and Pym on the committee." On the 21st of March, a few days after the meeting of Parliament, he was placed upon the committee on "an act to restrain the sending away persons to be popishly bred beyond seas;" and on the 28th, on one "to examine the warrants for billeting soldiers, or levying money, in the county of Surrey." On the 3d of April he was on the committee on a bill "to regulate the pressing men as ambassadors, or on other foreign service, so as to promote the good of the people as well as the service of the state;" and during the course of the same month he was engaged in others, "for the better continuance of peace and unity in the Church and Commonwealth;" "on the foundation of the Charter House;" on acts against "scandalous and unworthy ministers;" concerning "subscription, or against procuring judicial appointments for money or other rewards;" and "on the presentments of recusants made by the knights of the several shires." On the 10th of May he was put upon the committee "on the case of the Turkey merchants," whose goods were detained till they should pay the tonnage and poundage; and afterward on the committees for "redressing the neglect of preaching and catechising;" "on the petitions of Burgesse and Sparke," who had been persecuted by the Bishop of Durham; "to search for records and precedents;" "to consider the two commissions for compounding with recusants;" and "for explaining a branch of the statute 3d of James." On the 13th of June he closed for the season his laborious share in this sort of business with two committees, the one "to take the certificates of the Trinity House merchants for the loss of ships," and the other "to meet that afternoon on the Exchequer business."

On the reassembling of this Parliament after the prorogation, and when the disgraceful invasion of religion and property, committed in the interval by Laud and Charles, had inflamed the passions of the leading members in regard to both these questions, Hampden's exertions became absorbed in the committees that were appointed to discuss them. His name is to be found on the committees for preparing bills for enlarging the liberty of "hearing the Word of God;" and "against bribery, and procuring places for money and other rewards;" and on the committee to prepare a bill to explain the statute 3d James "concerning the appropriation of vicarages." He was also put upon committees "to view the entries of the clerk's book and to search the entry of the petition of right;" and "to examine a person who had petitioned the king with articles against Dr. Williams, bishop of Lincoln, the keeper;" and again, "concerning the differences in the several impressions of the 'Thirty-nine Articles.'" Again, "to examine the matter and the information in the Star Chamber;" and "concerning the particulars of Sir Joseph Eppesley, and all others where commissioners are drawn to answer before the Lords;" and "to search the course and precedents in the Exchequer concerning the injunction against merchants' goods detained for the non-payment of duties;" and, lastly, "to prevent corruption in the presentation and collation to benefices, headships, fellowships, and scholarships in colleges."

Hampden took no part in the stormy scene of the day of the dissolution—that "most gloomy, sad, and dismal day for England," as Sir Symonds d'Ewes has termed it, "that had happened for five hundred years"—and therefore escaped the fierce vengeance under which Eliot perished. Before that brave and virtuous man entered his prison, he committed his two sons to Hampden's care.

Upon this circumstance I have already remarked in the memoir of Eliot. It is enough to add here, that, besides in the thought of that great person's sufferings having served the cause that was dearer to him than happiness or life, the sorrow with which we contemplate them has some redemption, in the delightful view which they have been the means of handing down to us of the character of Hampden, and his generous and gentle feeling. We find in him, at this trying period, nothing wanting in the qualities that command respect and love for their amiable and exalted nature. He appears to us the guardian of the two young Eliots, turning his great mind anxiously to their improvement, leaving nothing undone for their welfare, and disclosing, throughout his correspondence with their father, a fine fancy; a heart of honour full, as of gentleness; of true wisdom and scholarship, as of kindness and intrepidity. This it was which made Hampden a patriot: his love for all men, and for all good and graceful things. In looking at his life, these letters are of the last importance; the feelings they disclose enable us to judge his latter years by a true test, and to discover the secret of his bold endeavours then—the end to which he looked in all his patriotic toils and enjoyments—unbounded love and gentleness to mankind.

* Rushworth, vol. i., p. 428, &c.

These letters, then, I will here present to the reader, as they have been copied* from the manuscripts in Lord Eliot's possession. They follow in the order of their dates, and refer occasionally to circumstances which have been already explained in this work.†

The first alludes to Eliot's younger son, and to the passages of the "Monarchy of Man" forwarded for Hampden's perusal.

"Sir,—If my affections could bee so dull as to give way to a sleepy excuse of a letter; yet this bearer, our common friend, had power to awaken them, and commaund it: to the publike experience of whose worth in doing, I can nowe adde my private of his patience in suffering the miseries of a rough-hewn entertainment, to bee tolerated by the addition of your sonne's company; of whome, if ever you live to see a fruite answerable to the promise of the present blossoms, it will bee a blessing of that weight as will turne the scale against all worldly afflictions, and denominate your life happy.

"I returne your papers with many thanks, which I have transcribed, not readd; the discourse, therefore, upon the subject must bee reserved to another season, when I may, with better opportunitie and freedome, communicate my thoughts to you, my friend. Till then, with my salutations of all your societie, and prayers for your health, I rest,

"Your ever assured friend and servant,

"JOHN HAMPDEN.

"Hampden, January 4th."

The son here alluded to was Hampden's favourite. The character of the elder son, whose college riots are touched on with so indulgently slight a hand in the next letter, has been described‡ before.

* With one exception, the fifth letter, which is to be found in the British Museum, and therefore appears never to have reached Eliot.

† Life of Eliot, p. 35-41.

‡ Ibid., p. 36.

"Sir,—I hope you will receave yor sonnes both safe, and that God will direct you to dispose of them as they may bee trained up for his service and to yor comfort. Some words I have had wth yor younger sonne, and given him a taste of those apprehensions hee is like to finde wth you, wch I tell him future obedience to yor pleasure, rather than justification of past passages, must remove. He professeth faire, and ye ingenuitie of his nature doth it without words; but you knowe vertuous actions flow not infallibly fro. the flexiblest dispositions: there's onely a fit subject for admonition and government to worke on, especially that wch is paternall. I confesse my shallownesse to resolve, and therefore unwillingnesse to say any thing concerning his course; yet will I not give over the consideration, because I much desire to see yt spiritt rightly managed. But for yor elder, I thinke you may with securitie returne him in convenient time, for certainly there was nothing to administer from a plott; and in another action^{yt} concerned himselfe, wch hee'll tell you of, hee receaved goode satisfaction of the vice-chancellor's faire carriage towards him. I searched my study this morning for a booke to send you of a like subject to yt of ye papers I had of you, but finde it not. As soone as I recouer it, I'll recommend it to yor view. When you haue finished ye other part, I pray thinke me as worthy of ye sight of it as ye former, and in both together I'll betray my weaknesse to my friend by declaring my sense of them. That I did see is an exquisite nosegay, composed of curious flowers, bound together with as fine a thredd. But I must in the end expect hony fro. my frend. Somewhat out of those flowers digested made his owne, and giving a true taste of his owne sweetnesse, though for that I shall awaite a fitter time and place. The Lord sanctify unto you ye sowrenesse of yor present estate, and ye comforts of yor posteritie.

"Yor ewer ye same assured frend,

"JO. HAMPDEN.

"April 4th, 1631."

The delicacy and beauty of the criticism at the close of this letter could scarcely be surpassed. Eliot, in answer to the letter, proposes to send his younger son, Richard, to the Netherlands, to learn the art of war in the company of Sir Horace Vere. This he thinks will be the best mode of employing to a good purpose his quick and vivacious humour. He states, also, his elder son's desire to go to France, but his own wish that he should remain at Oxford till he should have obtained his "licence" or degree at that university. Hampden replies in an animated strain. Most beautiful and touching is his closing allusion to their mutual friendship. Well did his after life "improve" and approve the "noble purchas" of Eliot's affection!

"Sir,—I am so perfectly acquainted with your cleare insight into the dispositions of men, and abilitie to fit them with courses suitable, that, had you bestowed sonnes of mine as you have done yor owne, judgement durst hardly have called it into question, especially when, in laying the designe, you have prevented ye objections to bee made against it; for if Mr. Rich

Eliot will, in the intermissions of action, adde study to practise, and adorn that lively spirit with flowers of contemplation, hee'll raise our expectations of another Sr Edw. Veere, that had this character, 'All summer in the field, all winter in his study;' in whose fall fame makes this kindome a great loser; and, having taken this resolution from counsell, with ye highest wisdom (as I doubt not you haue), I hope and praye ye same power will crowne it with a blessing answerable to our wish.

"The way you take with my other frend declares you to bee none of ye Bp of Exeter's converts, of whose minde neither am I superstitiously; but, had my opinion beene asked, I should (as vulgar concepts use to) haue shewed my power rather to raise objections than to answer them. A temper between Fraunce and Oxford might have taken away his scruple, with more advantage to his yeares—to visit Cambridge as a free man for varietie and delight, and there entertaine himselfe till ye next spring, when unversitie studies and peace had beene better settled than I learne it is; for, although hee bee one of those that, if his age were looked for in no other booke but that of the minde, would bee found no ward if you should dye to-morrow, yet 'tis a great hazard, methinkes, to see so sweete a disposition guarded with no more, amongst a people whereof many make it their religion to bee superstitious in impietie, and their behaviour to bee affected in ill manners. But God, who onely knowes ye periods of life, and opportunities to come, hath designed him (I hope) for his owne service betime, and stirred up yor providence to husband him so early for great affaires. Then shall hee bee sure to finde him in Fraunce, that Abraham did in Sichem, and Joseph in Egypt, under whose wing alone is perfect safetie.

Concerning that lord who is now reported to bee as deepe in repentance as hee was profound in sinne, the papers, &c., I shall take leave fro. your favour, and my straight of time, to bee silent till the next weeke, when I hope for the happinesse to kisse your handes, and present you with my most humble thanks for yor letters, wch confirm ye observation I have made in the progresse of affections, that it is easier much to winne upon ingenuous natures than to meritt it. This, they tell me, I have done of your's; and I account it a noble purchas, wch to improve with the best services you can commaund, and I performe. shall be ye care of "Your affectionate frend and servant,

"JO. HAMPDEN.

"Hampden, May 11th, 1631.

"Present my services to Mr. Long, Mr. Valentine, &c.

"Do not thinke by what I say, yt I am fully satisfied of your younger soune's course intended, for I have a crotchett out of ye ordinary way, wch I had acquainted you wth if I had spoken wth you before hee had gone, but am almost ashamed to communicate."

The mention of the "lord" in this letter refers to Mervyn Touchet, the infamous Lord Audley, of whose removal from the Tower, and trial and sentence, Eliot had spoken in a previous letter.

The next letter is from Hampden to one of the sons, his "young friends." It is to Richard, his favourite, who had been, for a time only, admitted to live with his father in the Tower:

"Sir,—I receaved yor commaunds by ye handes of Mr. Wian, and was glad to knowe by them that another's word had power to commaund yor faith in my readinesse to obey you, wch mine, it seemes, had not. If you yet lack an experience, I wish you had put me upon ye test of a worke more difficult and important, yt yor opinion might bee changed into beliefe. That man you wrote for I will unfainedly receive into my goode opinion, and declare it really when hee shall have occasion to put me to ye prooffe. I cannot trouble you with many words this time. Make goode use of the booke you shall receive from me, and of yor time. Be sure you shall render a strict account of both to

"Yor ever assured frend and seruant,

"JO. HAMPDEN.

"Present my service to Mr. Long. I would faine heare of his health.

"Hampden, June 8th, 1631."

All the remaining letters are to Eliot. This which follows is merely an apology for not writing; but how gracefully it is worded!

"Noble Sir,—'Tis well for me that letters cannot blush, else you would easily reade me guiltie. I am ashamed of so long a silence, and knowe not how to excuse it; for as nothing but businesse can speake for me, of wch kinde I have many advocates, so can I not tell how to call any businesse greater than holding an affectionate correspondence with so excellent a frend. My onely confidence is, I pleade at a barre of love, where absolutions are much more frequent than censures. Sure I am that conscience of neglect doth not accuse me, though evidence of fact doth. I would add more, but ye entertainment of a stranger frend calls upon me, and one other inevitable occasion; hold me excused, therefore, deare frend; and if you vouchsafe me a letter, let me beg of you to teach me some thrift of time, that I may employ more in your service, who will ever bee

"Your faithful servant and affectionate frend,

"JO. HAMPDEN.

"Commend my service to ye soldier, if not gone to his colours.

"Hampden, March 21."

The sweet and nervous style of the next, which is a criticism on the "Monarchy of Man," illustrates the literary taste and skill of Hampden:

"Sir,—You shall receive ye booke I promised by this bearer's immediate hand; for ye other papers I presume to take a little, and but a little, respitt. I have looked upon yt rare piece onely with a superficial view, as at first sight to take ye aspect and proportion in ye whole; after, with a more accurate eye, to take out ye lineaments of every part. 'Twere rashnesse in me, therefore, to discover any judgement before I have ground to make one. This I discern, that 'tis as compleate an im-

* This letter is addressed "To my honored and deare friend Sir John Eliot, at his lodging in the Tower." I copy it, as I have said, from the British Museum. The date seems to me to be an obvious error for June. "The soldier" referred to is Richard Eliot, of whom he speaks in the next letter, as fearing him to have gone age of ye patterne as can be drawne by lines ; a lively character of a large minde ; the subject, method, and expressions excellent and homogeniall, and, to say truth (sweete heart), somewhat exceeding my commendations. My words cannot render them to the life ; yet (to show my ingenuitie rather than wit) would not a lesse modell have given a full representation of that subject : not by diminution, but by contraction of parts ? I desire to learne ; I dare not say. The variations upon each particular seeme many ; all, I confesse, excellent. The fontaine was full ; ye channell narrow ; yt may bee ye cause ; or that the author imitated Virgill, who made more verses by many than hee intended to write. To extract a just number, had I seen all his, I could easily have bidd him make fewer ; but if hee had badd me tell which hee should have spared, I had beene apposed. So say I of these expressions ; and that to satisfy you, not myselfe, but that, by obeying you in a commaund so contrary to my owne disposition, you may measure how large a power you have over "JO. HAMPDEN.

"Hampden, June 29th, 1631.

"Recommend my service to Mr. Long ; and if Sr Ol. Luke bee in towne, expresse my affection to him in these words ; ye first part of ye papers you had by ye handes of B. Valentine long since. If you heare of yor sonnes, or can send to ym, let me knowe."

The present of a small buck from the seat at Hampden accompanied this next very graceful note. By the postscript it appears that John Eliot, the elder son, had been permitted to go to France as he desired.

"Deare Sir,—I receaued a letter from you the last weeke, for weh I owe you ten, to countervaille those lines by excesse in number that I cannot equall in weight. But time is not mine now, nor hath beene since that came to my handes ; in your favour, therefore, hold me excused. This bearer is appointed to present you with a buck out of my paddock, weh must bee a small one to hold proportion with ye place and soyle it was bred in. Shortly I hope (if I doe well to hope) to see you ; yet durst I not prolong ye expectation of yor papers. You have concerning them layde commaundes upon me beyond my abilitie to give you satisfaction in ; but if my apology will not serve when we meete, I will not decline ye service to ye betraying of my owne ignorance, which yet I hope yor love will couer.

"Yor ever assured frend and seruant,

"JO. HAMPDEN.

"Hampden, July 27.

"I am heartily glad to learne my frend is well in Fraunce. Captaine Waller hath beene in these parts, who I have seene, but could not entertaine ; to my shame and sorrow I speake it."

The next refers to the emigration schemes*

* An ingenious attempt has been made by Mr. Towill Rutt to show that Hampden had interested himself so far in the "New World" as actually, in the recess between James's last two Parliaments, to visit it in person. But Hampden had recently married ; and, as no mention is made of Mrs. Hampden in the record of the visit, does Mr. Rutt think the patriot had tired so soon of her society ? The attempt is too ingenious, however, to be passed altogether, and therefore I present it to the reader from the pages of the Examiner journal, where it appeared some years since : "In a work printed at Boston, N. E. 1736," in which the patriots of the time took so great an interest.

"Noble Sir,—I hope this letter is conveyed to you by so safe a hande yt yors will bee ye first yt shall open it ; or, if not, yet, since yor enjoy, as much as without contradiction you may, ye libertie of a prison, it shall bee no offence to wish you to make ye best use on't, and yt God may finde you as much his, now you enjoy ye benefit of secondary helpees, as you found him yors while, by deprivation of all others, you were cast upon his immediate support. This is all I have, or am willing to say ; but yt ye paper of considerations concerning ye plantation might bee very safely conveyed to me by this hande, and, after transcribing, should bee as safely returned, if you vouchsafe to send it me. I beseeche you present my service to entitled, A Chronological History of New England, by Thomas Prince, M. A., at p. 129, from 'Winslow's Relation,' one of the earliest printed tracts, 'I find the following narrative : '1623. March. News comes to Plymouth that Massasoit is like to die, and that a Dutch ship is driven ashore, before his house, so high, that she could not be got off till the tide's increase. Upon which the governor sends Mr. Edward Winslow and Mr. John Hampden, a gentleman of London, with Hobomak, to visit and help him, and speak with the Dutch. The first night we lodge at Namasket ; next day, at one, come to a ferry in Corbiant's country, and, three miles further, to Mattapuyest, his dwelling-place (though he be no friend to us), but find him gone to Pakanokit, about five or six miles off. Late within night we get thither, whence the Dutch had departed ; find Massasoit extreme low, his sight gone, his teeth fixed, having swallowed nothing for two days ; but using means, he surprisingly revives. We stay and help him two nights and two days. At the end of the latter, taking our leave, he expresses his great thankfulness. We come and lodge with Corbiant at Mattapuyest, who wonders that we, being two, should be so venturesome. Next day, on our journey, Hobomak tells us, that at his coming away, Massasoit privately charged him to tell Mr. Winslow there was a plot of the Massachusets. That night we lodge at Namasket ; the next get home.' Edward Winslow, one of the fathers of New England, first appears, '1620, Dec. 6,' among 'ten of their principal men,' whom they 'send out in their shallop to circulate the bay' in search of a landing-place (p. 76). Hutchinson (Hist. Mas., i., 187) says 'he was a gentleman of the best family of any of the Plymouth planters, his father being a person of some figure at Droitwich, in Worcestershire.' The following entry in the Chronological History (p. 140) may fix, with great probability, in the absence of any information on the subject, the date of Hampden's return to England : '1623, Sept. 10. This day the Ann sails for London, being laden with clapboards, and all the builders and other furs we have ; with whom we send Mr. Winslow, to inform how things are, and procure what we want.' Edward Winslow printed his Account of N. E. to Sept. 10' during this visit to London, whence he returned in 1624. After governorships of Plymouth and missions to England, he settled there in 1646 as agent for the colony. In 1665 he was appointed by the Protector one of 'three commissioners to superintend and direct the operations of Penn and Venables,' and 'died on board the fleet, in the West Indies,' aged 60, leaving a 'name' that 'in New England will never be forgotten.' Such was the associate of John Hampden. Of the other dramatis personæ, Massasoit was a 'great sagamore,' who, 'in 1621,' had visited the governor, when, 'after salutations, the governor kissing his hand, and the king kissing him, they agree on a league of friendship,' which 'lasted to 1675.' Hobomak was 'a chief captain of Massasoit's,' and Corbiant 'a petty sachem.' Dr. Holmes, of Cambridge, N. E., in his American Annals (1808), says (i., 185), 'Mr. Hampden wintered (1623) with the Plymouth colonists, and desired much to see the country, and is supposed by Dr. Belknap (Biog., ii., 229) to be the same who afterwards distinguished himself by his opposition to the arbitrary demands of Charles I.' From these early associations, Hampden would probably be foremost, in 1638, to promote that well-known project of emigration which Charles, so fatally for himself, interrupted by his prerogative. It appears, in the Parliamentary History, that from Feb. 1621-2 to Feb. 1623-4, Hampden's senatorial duties must have been entirely suspended. Thus there would be abundant leisure for the visit to America.* [I see nothing to militate against Mr. Rutt's view of the case. In an age that called for sacrifice, Hampden would readily quit his home for public service.—C.]

Mr. Valentine, and Mr. Long, my countryman, if with you, and let me bee honoured with the style of

"Yor faithful frend and seruant,
"JO. HAMPDEN."

The last letter contains a noble compliment to the genius of Eliot.

"Sir,—In the end of my trauailes, I meate ye messengers of yor love, weh bring me a most gratefull wellcome. Yor intentions outfly mine, that thought to have prevented yom, and conuince me of my disabilitie to keepe pace with you or the times. My employment of late in interrogatory with like affaires hath deprived me of leisure to compliment, and ye frame of dispositions is able to juttle the estyle of a letter. You were farre enough above my emulation before; but, breathing nowe the same ayre wth an ambassador, you are out of all ayme. I believe well of his negociation for ye large testimony you have given of his parts, and I believe ye King of Sweden's sword will bee ye best of his topikks to persuade a peace. 'Tis a powerfull one nowe, if I heare aright, fame giving Tilly a late defeat in Saxony wth 20,000 losse, the truth whereof will facilitate yor worke, the Spaniard's curtesy being knowne to bee no lesse than willingly to render that which hee cannot hold. The notion of these effects interrupts not or quiet, though ye reasons by weh they are gouerned do transcend or pitch. Yor apprehensions, yt ascend a region above those clouds weh shadow us, are fit to pierce such heights, and or to receave such notions as descend from thence; which while you are pleased to impart, you make the demonstrations of yor favour to become ye rich possessions of "Yor ever faithful frend and seruant,

"JO. HAMPDEN."

"Present my seruice to Mr. Long.

"Hampden, October 3.

"God, I thanke him, hath made me father of another sonne."

The melancholy progress of the public affairs during this correspondence, and after it had been closed by the death of the illustrious prisoner,* has been amply described. In retirement at his estate in Buckinghamshire, Hampden continued to improve the literary tastes and acquirements in which he already excelled so highly, and, it is said, while the crisis of affairs approached more nearly, began to prepare himself for the last extremity they threatened. Davila's history of the civil wars of France became his manual—his vade mecum, as Sir Philip Warwick calls it; as though in the study of that sad story of strife and bloodshed he already saw the parallel which England was to afford so soon. The bitterness of spirit with which he thought of these things may have been greatly increased by the death of his wife,† which happened at about this time. At last, however, he abandoned his retirement, dismissed the thought of a solitary and secluded life, and became one of the acknowledged leaders of the people. He imitated in this the great and virtuous Coligny, described in his favourite work.

In the autumn of 1635, ship-money writs were sent into Buckinghamshire. Many gentlemen of that county refused to pay, and among them Hampden. Accordingly, on the 25th of January, 1635-6, new sheriffs having been in the interval appointed, a writ was issued, directed "To Sir Peter Temple, Baronet, late high sheriff, and Heneage Proby, Esq., now appointed high sheriff for the county of Bucks," directing the one to deliver, and the other to receive, the original warrant, as well as all accounts and returns concerning the levy of the former year. This return was accordingly made by the assessors of the different parishes; and, among others where payment had been delayed, a return by those of the parish of Great Kimble, a village at the foot of the Chiltern Hills, round which the principal property of John Hampden lay, and in the immediate neighbourhood of his house. The return contains the names of those who, with him, had tendered their refusal to the constables and assessors, together with an account of the sums charged upon each person. Among the names of the protestors, it is to be observed that the constables and assessors had the courage to return their own, and at the head of the list stands that of John Hampden, "as a passport." Lord Nugent justly says, "for the rest to an honourable memory, so long as the love of liberty shall retain a place in the hearts of the British nation."

This protest, however, was not thought sufficient, by the then rampant tyranny of Charles, to excuse Sir Peter Temple for his default of arrears. He was summoned before the council-table: ill health prevented his instant attendance; and an officer was at once sent to hold him in close custody at his own residence at Stowe. Lord Nugent found one of his letters, written under these circumstances, among the manuscripts there. It is worth quoting, as an illustration of the occasion and the time:

"Deere Mother,—In haste I write to you. I hauing my handes full, cannot write to you with my owne handes, I hauing byne lately ill at London, and takeing physicke. Yet must I leaue the meanes of my health to doe the kinge seruice. I was sente for on the 30th of June, by a messenger, to attend the kinge on Sundaye, the 3d of July, about the shippe-moneye; wherein I am blamed for the sheriffe's actions that nowe is, and am compelled wth a messenger, nowe wayting on me, with all the distresses and imprisoneings that maye be imposed on the countrey. But the sheriffe must answere what is done by me in the future tyme. I am to attende the kinge at Theobalde's, on the 17th daye of July, to giue an accompte to him what I haue done in the seruice, and, as he likes my proceedings, I am to continue in the messen-

* Eliot and Hampden, it is worth adding, had changed portraits some time before, and both these portraits are now in the possession of the Eliot family. That of Hampden, the only original in existence, and a portrait of noble expression, has been engraved for this work, by the courteous permission of the Earl of St. Germain's. A close and earnest look at the engraving, which is exquisitely faithful, will furnish an eloquent description of the face of Hampden.

† She lies buried in the chancel of great Hampden church, where an epitaph on a plain black stone records her merits and her husband's affectionate regrets. See Memorials by Lord Nugent, vol. i. p. 206. She left Hampden three sons, John, Richard, and William, and six daughters. Elizabeth, the eldest of these, married Richard Knightley, son of the friend of Pym and Hampden; and the second, Anne, was afterward married to Sir Robert Pye, of Berkshire.

ger's hande, or be releassed, or worsse. My lyfe is nothing but toyle, and hath byne for manye yeares, to the commonwealth, and nowe to the kinge. The change is somethinge amended for the presentt, but yet released of neither. Not soe much tyme as to doe my dutye to my deere parentes, nor to sende to them. Yett I hoped that they wolde haue sente for a bucke, or what Stowe wolde afforde, before thys tyme. But, seeinge they will not, I will spare myselfe soe much tyme as to pressente nowe unto them one by thys bearer.

"Although I am debarred from father, mother, wife, and children, and state—though some of them farre absente—wyth thys I pressente my dutye, wyth these unhappy lynes, and remayne

"Yor sonne, that loues and honoures

my father and you,

"PETER TEMPLE.

"Stowe, thys 8th of July, 1636.

"To his deere mother, the Lady Hester Temple, at Dorsett, theis pressente."

The history of Hampden's immortal trial, in which for many days, though in the midst of public dangers and disquiet, the fundamental laws of our country were contested without reproach or passion, has been sufficiently glanced at in these pages. "The judgment," says Clarendon, "proved of more advantage and credit to the gentleman condemned than to the king's service." Then indeed Hampden "became the argument of all tongues, every man inquiring who and what he was, that durst at his own charge support the liberty and property of the kingdom, and rescue his country, as he thought, from being made a prey to the court."* Even courtiers and crown lawyers spoke respectfully of him; for, adds Clarendon, "his carriage throughout that agitation was with that rare temper and modesty, that they who watched him narrowly to find some advantage against his person, to make him less resolute in his cause, were compelled to give him a just testimony." The court continued, after the trial, to levy the hated tax more recklessly than ever, but it soon became the recklessness of despair.

The third Parliament was summoned, and Hampden—whose share in the immediate causes which led to that memorable event has been described in the memoir of Pym—having returned from London to his native seat, was solicited, by the grateful men of Buckinghamshire, to become their representative. In this character, and with all the new influence it gave him, he soon again left Hampden, never, except at rare intervals of some few hours' duration, to return to it again. "His mansion," says Lord Nugent, "still remains. It stands away from both the principal roads which pass through Buckinghamshire, at the back of that chalky range of the Chilterns which bounds, on one side, the vale of Aylesbury. The scenery which immediately surrounds it, from its seclusion little known, is of singular beauty, opening upon a ridge which commands a very extensive view over several counties, and diversified by dells, clothed with a natural growth of box, juniper, and beech.† What has once been the abode of such a man can never but be interesting from the associations which belong to it. But, even forgetting these, no one, surely, who has heart or taste for the charm of high, breezy hills, and green glades enclosed within the shadowy stillness of ancient woods, and avenues leading to a house on whose walls the remains of the different styles of architecture, from the early Norman to the Tudor, are still partly traced through the deforming innovations of the eighteenth century—no one, surely, can visit the residence of Hampden, and not do justice to the love which its master bore it, and to that stronger feeling which could lead him from such a retirement to the toils and perils to which, thenceforth, he entirely devoted himself."

Hampden has left no record of his eloquence behind him, but its influence is stamped immortally on Clarendon's account of him at this momentous period. "Mr. Hampden," says the noble historian, describing the leading members of this Parliament, "was a man, it may be, of the most discerning spirit, and of the greatest address and insinuation to bring any thing to pass which he desired, of any man of that time, and who laid the design deepest. He was a gentleman of a good extraction and a fair fortune, who, from a life of great pleasure and license, had on a sudden retired to extraordinary sobriety and strictness, and yet retained his usual cheerfulness and affability; which, together with the opinion of his wisdom and justice, and the courage he had showed in opposing the ship-money, raised his reputation to a very great height, not only in Buckinghamshire, where he lived, but generally throughout the kingdom. He was not a man of many words, and rarely begun the discourse, or made the first entrance upon any business that was assumed; but a very weighty speaker, and after he had heard a full debate, and observed how the House was like to be inclined, took up the argument, and shortly, and clearly, and craftily so stated it, that he commonly conducted it to the conclusion he desired; and if he found he could not do that, he never was without the dexterity to divert the debate to another time, and to prevent the determining anything in the negative which might prove inconvenient in the future. He made so great a show of civility, and modesty, and humility, and always of mistrusting his own judgment, and of esteeming his with whom he conferred for the present, that he seemed to have no opinions or resolutions but such as he contracted from the information and instruction he received upon the discourses of others, whom he had a wonderful art of governing and leading into his principles and inclinations, while they believed that he the bare brow of a lofty hill called Green Haly, on the side of which is cut, in the chalk, the form of a cross, which is seen from all the country round. This monument, of a very remote antiquity, is known by the name of the White Leaf Cross, and is supposed by Mr. Wise (in a learned letter to Browne Willis on the subject of Saxon antiquities) to have been designed in commemoration of a victory gained by Edward, King of the West Saxons, over the Danes, early in the tenth century. It appears, however, with more probability, to have been intended as a memorial of the last battle of Hengist and Horsa with the Britons, which was fought over the extensive plain of Risborough and Saunderton, when, on this height, and on the Bledlow ridge which adjoins it, the Saxon princes planted their victorious standards to recall their troops from the pursuit.

* Clarendon.

† The woods of Hampden terminate to the north upon wholly depended upon their counsel and advice. No man had ever a greater power over himself, or was less the man that he seemed to be, which shortly after appeared to everybody, when he cared less to keep on the mask." The character of Clarendon himself is too well known to render any modification of this language necessary. The circumstances which explain the colour he always strives to give to the profound policy of the popular leaders have had abundant illustration in these pages. It is enough now to show that that policy is, even thus, confirmed by him; and that upon him, equally with the men of their own party, the genius of its great authors impressed itself—the more deeply, perhaps, that it was so obstinately resisted.

To the business affairs of this Parliament Hampden applied himself with his accustomed zeal. On the 16th, three days after its meeting, he was on a committee to examine all questions relating to election returns, and other privileges; and on the 17th, on one to report upon the state of the journals and records. On the 18th, on one concerning the violation of privilege, at the close of the last Parliament; and on the 20th, on another to prepare an address to the king, praying "that the like infringement of their liberties might not be practised in future, to their prejudice and his own." On the 21st he was on the committee appointed to inquire into the effect of the commission lately granted to convocation; and on the 22d, on two others—one upon the case of Smart, a prebendary of Durham, who had petitioned, as a prisoner, against Bishop Neile; and the other to prepare the heads of a conference with the Lords concerning the petitions from the country. On the 23d he was on one to expedite the matter of this conference, by stating the reasons for postponing the supplies until effectual means should have been taken to prevent innovations in religion, to secure the property of the subject, and the privileges of Parliament, and to prepare an answer on these heads to the king. On the 24th he was manager of that conference; on the 25th he reported it to the House; and on the 1st of May we find him reporting a second conference, touching some matters which had occurred in the first.

The disgrace of Williams has been alluded to: the wily prelate had long been striving to regain his position by petitions to the king; or, by a summons before Parliament, to make an effort for it that way. Sentence, however, interrupted his schemes at last, suspending him from all his offices and dignities, and imposing upon him a fine of £10,000, and imprisonment during the king's pleasure.

Finding the Lords not disposed to assert with spirit the question of privilege in his behalf, he endeavoured to engage Hampden, during this session, to make his case one of Parliamentary grievance. With this view, it may be supposed, he affected his old patriotic arts to engage the patriot's sympathy. Be this as it may, among the manuscripts at Lambeth is a sheet of notes in his handwriting, under the title of "Remembrances to Mr. Hampden," dated April 27th, to which the answer is found appended. The style of cold civility in which Hampden declines this business was that of a man who already suspected that the public virtue of the bishop was wavering, and that he was preparing to embark again in the course of court favour, into which, on his enlargement and elevation to the archbishopric of York, he soon relapsed. Hampden's answer was as follows:

"My Lord,—I should be very ready to serve you in anything I conceived good for you and fit for mee; but in your lpp's present commands I doubt that to make overture of yor intentions, and be prevented by a suddaine conclusion of ye Parlt, wch many feare, may render yor condition worse than nowe it is. To begin in or house is not ye right place; the most important businesses of the king and kingd are press'd on with such expedition yt any of a more particular nature will be but unwellcome, and hardly prosecuted wth effect; besides that there is at this instant a tendernesse betweene ye Lords and us about priviledge; and for my owne unfittnesse, I neede mention no more but my disability to carry through a businesse of this nature, though yr l^{ty} may easily conceave another incompetency in my person. In these regards I humbly desire yor lp to excuse mee, and thereby to lay a newe obligation upon mee of being, Your lpp's most humble servant,

"Jo. HAMPDEN."

"Westm^r, Apr. 29, 1640."

In the Long Parliament, Hampden again sat for Buckinghamshire. His exertions in the great interval of excitement before it met have been already detailed. He had married again during the present year, and now his wife joined him, with his family, in London, and the establishment at Hampden was broken up. The lady's name was Letitia Vachell, the daughter of a gentleman of Coley, near Reading. She survived Hampden very many years, during which she again resided on her husband's old estate.

Hampden discharged himself of his duties, at this the final crisis of the English liberties and laws, as became the virtue and courage of his character. He who had been formerly, though ever pursuing the strictest line of duty, yielding and gentle, was now stern and resolute; he who had kept within the letter of precedents while yet serving the cause in his private capacity, now found "the eyes of all men fixed upon him as their Patriæ Pater, and the pilot that must steer the vessel through the tempests and rocks which threatened it." What wonder that, with such responsibility, his views became larger and more extended! What wonder if, from a meek bearing, as Lord Clarendon tells us, "his nature and carriage seemed much fiercer than before?" Thrust from the legitimate ground of warfare on which he would willingly have taken issue, he rose, by his resources of mind and heart, and shifting from the narrower grounds of precedent and privilege, fell back on the great rights of mankind, out of which, and for which, all laws arise. It is useless to deny that Hampden had then become (as Clarendon terms him) a "Root and Branch man." All his subsequent acts prove it. He had taken higher ground, and would no longer be contented with lopping off the branches, but was resolved to lay the axe to the root, of the tree of corruption. Why does Lord Nugent shrink from contemplating his character in this view? It would have helped him to conclusions more just, and to reflections more beneficial, than those which disfigure the latter portion of the first volume of his "Memorials," where he speaks of "the memory of Hampden not being stained by any appearance of his having been concerned in Strafford's attainder." If his name does not appear in the proceedings, neither does that of Oliver Cromwell: but what will the noble author of the "Memorials" infer from that? That Cromwell opposed the attainder? Is it even pretended that Hampden opposed it? By no means!* We are simply told by Lord Nugent that, "being only doubtful as a matter of precedent, but clear to him in respect of the guilt of the accused person," and knowing that, if it did not pass, "all law but that of the sceptre and the sword was at an end," he—did what?—he stood by with all his lofty thoughts of the thousands of families whose quarrel he had embraced, and left the burden of the deed necessary for their happiness to his great fellow-labourer Pym, that he might himself escape the odium of having departed from a strict letter of precedent, and might appear graceful to an aristocratic posterity! And Lord Nugent thinks he is adorning the memory of Hampden while striving to inflict this stain upon it, and talks of the injustice which has been done to the great patriot on this point by Clarendon and others. Why, if it be indeed true that he retired from the division on the attainder before the question was put, no doubt he had admirable reasons for doing so, and rested meanwhile on the surety of its passing; for even Lord Nugent does not pretend to say that he had not its success much at heart. Why, then, blame Clarendon? for it seems to me that what Clarendon says (in one of his passages of covert and falsely-coloured meaning) of Hampden's character so far bears out Lord Nugent, and that they both conspire in this instance to reflect no additional honour on the patriot. "He begot many opinions and motions," says that historian, "the education whereof he committed to other men; so far disguising his own designs, that he seemed seldom to wish more than was concluded; and in many gross conclusions, which would hereafter contribute to designs not yet set on foot, when he found them sufficiently backed by majority of voices, he would withdraw himself before the question, that he might seem not to consent to so much visible unreasonableness."*

* Nugent's Memorials, vol. i., p. 297.

But this is merely another of Lord Clarendon's dexterous attempts to mislead, and it is to be regretted that a friend to the "good cause" should in any way countenance it. What is Lord Nugent's authority for his opinion that Hampden shrunk from the side of Pym during the progress of Strafford's attainder? I will quote the entire passage of the "Memorials." "Falkland, it appears clearly from Sir Ralph Verney's notes, on the 15th of April, spoke in answer to Digby and in favour of the bill—Hampden never; and on the 16th, while Hampden was on one committee to prepare heads for a conference 'concerning their lordships' resolution to hear counsel in matter of law, and to desire that their lordships would use all expedition to give an end to this trial as much as in justice may be,' Falkland was on another which was appointed to prepare heads for a conference 'concerning the further proceedings,' on the report of which committee it was that the bill was passed. In debate, Hampden never alluded to the proceeding by bill but once. On the 16th of April, when it was discussed, pending the attainder, whether the Commons should continue to hear the earl's counsel at the bar of the Lords, or proceed with the bill, St. John, having said that, 'being possessed of a bill, they had made themselves judges, and being so, it were a dishonour to hear counsel anywhere but at their own bar;' and Colepepper having said, 'if we reply to Lord Strafford's counsel before the Lords, we prejudice our cause in taking away the power of declaring treason,' Hampden, according to Sir Ralph Verney's notes, in opposition to his fellow-managers, urged that they should proceed, not by bill, but by trial at the Lords' bar. 'The bill now depending doth not tie us to goe by bill. Our counsell hath been heard; ergo, in justice, we must heare his. Noe more prejudice to goe to heare matter of law, than to heare counsell to matter of fact.'" Now the latter words do not bear out the previous statement of them. It has been justly observed† that there is good reason to question whether, in this discussion, it was considered as an alternative to hear the earl's counsel at the Lords' bar or proceed with the bill, for by the result of that day's debate it appears that both were done, the committee answering, "after some deliberation with the House, that since the Lords had so resolved, they would not deny it to be there present, and to hear what his counsel could say for him; but to reply any more in public they neither could nor would, because of the bill already past; only if the

* "But why then, it is asked, if Hampden disapproved of the precedent of a bill of attainder, did he not make head against it as manfully as he had before supported the impeachment? Plainly because, in a case doubtful to him only as a matter of precedent, but clear to him in respect of the guilt of the accused person—in a case in which the accused person, in his estimation, deserved death, and in which all law but that of the sceptre and the sword was at an end if he had escaped it—when all the ordinary protection of law to the subject throughout the country was suspended, and suspended mainly by the counsels of Strafford himself, Hampden was not prepared to heroically immolate the liberties of England in order to save the life of him who would have destroyed them. Hampden probably considered the bill which took away Strafford's life (and, indeed, it must in fairness be so considered) as a revolutionary act, undertaken for the defence of the Commonwealth. That in his conscience he believed it to be an act of substantial injustice to the person arraigned, no man has any right to conclude. I moreover aver, that there is not more ground for imputing a participation in that measure to him than to Lord Clarendon, and not near so much as to Lord Falkland." Nugent's Memorials of Hampden, vol. i., p. 379, 380. Lord Clarendon supported the measure, and so, most certainly, did Lord Falkland.

* I have ventured to reprint these remarks on this great error, as I conceive it to be, of Lord Nugent's book, from a periodical for which they were written at the time of its publication. I have seen no reason to alter my opinion during the last six years, and I again use the same expression of it, because it became the subject of remark and quotation in a subsequent controversy between Mr. Southey and Lord Nugent, and I would not be supposed to have merely stolen my present opinion from the "professor of the hip-and-thigh school," so often referred to there. I have had no reason hitherto to avoid avowing myself as that "hip-and-thigh professor." † Quarterly Review, vol. xlvii., p. 501.

Lords should take any scruple in the matter of law, they would be ready to give them satisfaction by a private conference." So that Hampden's opinion, it appears, prevailed, and the bill nevertheless proceeded. It has not been discovered that on any other occasion he alluded to the bill; and it is obvious that there is no ground here for such a charge as that of Lord Nugent, or such a mere party statement as Lord Clarendon's.

Very certain and unequivocal indeed must be the evidence that should so impugn Hampden's memory. Sufficient has been said in the progress of this work to prove that no one of that age—not even Pym himself—looked at the great question of resistance to tyranny on larger or more extended grounds, or in a more philosophic spirit. It was Hampden who first dared to anticipate a broader field of warfare than the floor of the House of Commons, and to prepare himself for a more real struggle; and, constantly in communion with his friend and cousin, Oliver Cromwell, it was Hampden who advised with him great projects of freedom; whose penetrating spirit first pointed to that remarkable person as likely to become, "in case of a breach with the king, the greatest man in England;" and whose virtue, at all times equal to his intellect and courage, would most surely, had not death stepped in, have prevented even Cromwell's traitorous usurpation on the English Commonwealth.

Hampden's course in this Parliament was given at the time the great questions of Pym's life were detailed. Hampden was second to Pym alone, and to the aid of everything which the wisdom and vigilance of that great statesman planned, he brought an influence of almost irresistible power. He was, as I have shown, an especially earnest promoter of the grand remonstrance and of the anti-episcopal measures. In regard to the latter, it may be important here to use, as an illustration of his real opinions, even one of the most artful and disingenuous statements of Clarendon. Describing the first debate on the bill for taking away the bishops' votes, and mentioning Lord Falkland's support of it, "Mr. Hyde," in the dignity of the historian Clarendon, observes: "The House was so marvellously delighted to see the two inseparable friends [Falkland and Hyde] divided in so important a point, that they could not contain from a kind of rejoicing; and the more, because they saw Mr. Hyde was much surprised with the contradiction; as in truth he was, having never discovered the least inclination in the other towards such a compliance; and therefore they entertained an imagination and hope that they might work the Lord Falkland to a farther concurrence with them. But they quickly found themselves disappointed, and that, as there was not the least interruption of close friendship between the other two, so, when the same argument came again into debate, about six months after, the Lord Falkland changed his opinion, and gave them all the opposition he could: nor was he reserved in acknowledging 'that he had been deceived, and by whom,' and confessed to his friends, with whom he would deal freely, 'that Mr. Hampden had assured him that, if that bill might pass, there would be nothing more attempted to the prejudice of the Church;' which he thought, as the world then went, would be no ill composition."*

And why had that bill ceased to be a "good composition?" Because it was refused by the House of Lords when first presented there. It was the old story of the sibyl and her leaves; and though two hundred years have passed, that story is again in the course of rehearsal. No one should have known better than Clarendon the great truth which the very distinction he himself has marked between the early and later years of Hampden so strikingly illustrates—that justice deferred, and rights withheld, will always enhance the price at which safety and peace must, in the end, be purchased.

Hampden's mission to Scotland to overlook and check the king is already before the reader; and I now approach the only speech which remains upon record with his name attached to it. It purports to have been spoken on the memorable morning already so fully described, after the impeachment of the five members, among whom Hampden's eminence and boldness had of course placed him. I quote it, without abridgment, from a small quarto pamphlet of the time.

"MR. SPEAKER,—It is a true saying of the wise man, 'That all things happen alike to all men, as well to the good man as to the bad.' There is no state or condition whatsoever, either of prosperity or adversity, but all sorts of men are sharers in the same: no man can be discerned truly by the outward appearance, whether he be a good subject either to his God, his prince, or his country, until he be tried by the touchstone of loyalty. Give me leave, I beseech you, to parallel the lives of either sort, that we may in some measure discern truth from falsehood; and in speaking, I shall simulate their lives.

"I. In religion towards God. II. In loyalty and due subjection to their sovereign, in their affection towards the safety of their country.

"I. Concerning religion. The best means to discern between the true and false religion is by searching the sacred writings of the Old and New Testament, which is of itself pure, indited by the Spirit of God, and written by holy men, unspotted in their lives and conversations: and by this sacred word may we prove whether our religion be of God or no; and by looking in this glass, we may discern whether we are in the right way or no.

"And looking into the same, I find by this truth of God that there is but one God, one Christ, one faith, one religion, which is the Gospel of Christ, and the doctrine of the prophets and apostles.

"In these two Testaments is contained all things necessary to salvation; if that our religion doth hang upon this doctrine, and no other secondary means, then it is true; to which comes nearest the Protestant religion, which we profess, as I really and verily believe; and, consequently, that religion which joineth with this doctrine of Christ and his apostles, the traditions and inventions of men, prayers to the Virgin Mary, angels, saints, that are used in the exercise of their religion, strange and superstiffling worshipping, cringing, bowing, creeping to the altar, using pictures, dirges, and such like, cannot be true, but erroneous, nay, devilish : and all this is used and maintained in the Church of Rome, as necessary as the Scripture to salvation ; therefore is a false and erroneous church, both in doctrine and discipline, and all other sects and schisms, that lean not only on the Scripture, though never so contrary to the Church of Rome, is a false worshipping of God, and not the true religion. And thus much concerning religion, to discern the truth and falsehood thereof.

* Hist., vol. i., p. 413, 414.

"II. I come now, Mr. Speaker, to the second thing intimated unto you, which was how to discern, in a state, between good subjects and bad, by their loyalty and due subjection to their lawful sovereign ; in which I shall, under favour, observe two things.

"(1.) Lawful subjection to a king in his own person, and the commands, edicts, and proclamations of the prince and his privy council.

"(2.) Lawful obedience to the laws, statutes, and ordinances made, enacted by the king and the Lords, with the free consent of his great council of state assembled in Parliament.

"For the first. To deny a willing and dutiful obedience to a lawful sovereign and his privy council (for as Camden truly saith, the commands of the Lords, privy councillors, and the edicts of the prince are all one, for they are inseparable, the one never without the other), either to defend his royal person and kingdoms against the enemies of the same, either public or private ; or to defend the ancient privileges and prerogatives of the king, pertaining and belonging of right to his royal crown, and the maintenance of his honour and dignity ; or to defend and maintain true religion, established in the land, according to the truth of God, is one sign of an evil and bad subject.

"Secondly. To yield obedience to the commands of a king, if against the true religion, against the ancient and fundamental laws of the land, is another sign of an ill subject.

"Thirdly. To resist the lawful power of the king, to raise insurrection against the king, admit him adverse in his religion, to conspire against his sacred person, or any ways to rebel, though commanding things against our consciences in exercising religion, or against the rights and privileges of the subject, is an absolute sign of a disaffected and traitorous subject.

"And now, having given the signs of discerning evil and disloyal subjects, I shall only give you, in a word or two, the signs of discerning which are loyal and good subjects, only by turning these three signs already showed on the contrary side.

"(1.) He that willingly and cheerfully endeavoureth himself to obey his sovereign's commands, for the defence of his own person and kingdoms, for the defence of true religion, for the defence of the laws of his country, is a loyal and good subject.

"(2.) To deny obedience to a king commanding anything against God's true worship and religion, against the ancient and fundamental laws of the land, in endeavouring to perform the same, is a good subject.

"(3.) Not to resist the lawful and royal power of the king, to raise sedition or insurrection against his person, or to set division between the king and his good subjects, by rebellion, although commanding things against conscience in the exercise of religion, or against the rights and privileges of the subject, but patiently for the same to undergo his prince's displeasure, whether it be to his imprisonment, confiscation of goods, banishment, or any other punishment whatsoever, without murmuring, grudging, or reviling against his sovereign or his proceedings, but submitting willingly and cheerfully himself and his cause to Almighty God, is the only sign of an obedient and loyal subject.

"I come now to the second means to know the difference between a good subject and a bad, by their obedience to the laws, statutes, and ordinances made by the king, with the whole consent of his Parliament. And in this I observe a twofold subjection : in the particular members thereof dissenting from the general votes of the whole Parliament ; and, secondly, the whole state of the kingdom to a full Parliament.

"First. I confess, if any particular member of a Parliament, although his judgment and vote be contrary, do not willingly submit to the rest, he is an ill subject to the king and country.

"Secondly. To resist the ordinances of the whole state of the kingdom, either by stirring up a dislike in the hearts of his majesty's subjects of the proceedings of Parliament ; to endeavour, by levying of arms, to compel the king and Parliament to make such laws as seem best to them ; to deny the power, authority, and privileges of Parliament ; to cast aspersions upon the same and proceedings, thereby inducing the king to think ill of the same, and to be incensed against the same ; to procure the untimely dissolution and breaking off of the Parliament before all things be settled by the same, for the safety and tranquillity both of king and state, is an apparent sign of a traitorous and disloyal subject against his king and country.

"And thus, having troubled your patience in showing the difference between true Protestants and false subjects and traitors in a state or kingdom, and the means how to discern them, I humbly desire my actions may be compared with either, both as I am a subject, Protestant, and native in this country, and as I am a member of this present and happy Parliament ; and as I shall be found guilty upon these articles exhibited against myself and the other gentlemen, either a bad or a good subject to my gracious sovereign and native country, to receive such sentence upon the same as by this honourable House shall be conceived to agree with law and justice."

Mr. Southey thinks* that this speech inculcates the "doctrine of passive obedience," and Lord Nugent thinks it a very constitutional speech. It is a matter of surprise that so eminent a writer as Mr. Southey, and an intellect so acute, should think it likely, or even possible, for such a man as he thinks Hampden to have been (the fiercest of rebels and the most insincere), placed in the circumstances under which the above is said to have been spoken, to deliver himself of such a "doctrine." What advantage was to be gained by it—or, rather, what advantage was not to be lost? On the other hand, Lord Nugent has been wanting in candour, and, taking the argument as he was content to rest it, must be said to have been worsted by his more experienced opponent.*

* Quarterly Review, before referred to.

It occurred to neither of the disputants that the passages in dispute may have been garbled or incorrectly reported. Of this there cannot be a single doubt. The only writer who copies the speech is Doctor Nalson, whose slavish propensities are well known, and whose "collections" were published by Charles II.'s special command; yet even he cautiously introduces it thus, "I find among the prints of that time." The editors of the old Parliamentary History, though with a strong Royalist tendency, were more honest; and they have refused to admit the speech in its present state into their work, on the express ground that it "was judged, by some learned gentlemen, to be surreptitious."† The outline is likely to have been correct enough, and probably it was this that furnished the interpolator with the hint on which he worked.

